"She did look very young, passing up that avenue of her friends."—p. 2.

UNDER THE ELMs.—I.

WHEN John Milward was going to be married the whole town rose from the lethargy into which it had fallen, and exercised itself in conjectures about the match; and when the appointed day actually came round, the whole town presented itself at or about the little church to witness the solemnity.

John was not one of those nervously-conscious young gentlemen whom you expect to see upon such occasions, when you ask for the happy man; the callow period of vanity was over for him; in fact, as Miss Griffiths remarked, audibly, as he passed up the church, "he was forty, and he looked it."

Certainly he was most cool and self-possessed, not pinching at his waistcoat to see which pocket the ring was in, or even looking round the church for some friend who had promised and failed. The fact is, Miss Griffiths was right, John was forty, and looked every hour of it. Now, ten or a dozen years, though they don't make much difference in a man, make a great deal in a bridegroom. John, moreover, was a lawyer, and the operation of the law is mighty in seizing upon sentiment and working it out of the system.

I wish I could describe to you Mary Marshall, such as she was those few minutes after which she was Mary Marshall no longer. Miss Griffiths said she looked like a child. I think Miss Griffiths was right. She did look very young, passing timidly up that avenue of her friends, and (after the ordeal in the vestry-room) the way she leant on John's arm coming down the church, and the way, from time to time, she looked up into his face, would have touched you, it was so child-like in its confidence and in its weakness.

I like to see in a man strength and virility—that strength which hath respect unto weakness; and in a woman well-put confidence and yielding—the deference that springs from force, not fault, of character (her desire unto her husband); and I like to see these twain one.

The parish church at Ockley crests a little hill. Ockley-on-the-Hill the town is strictly called, to distinguish it from another Ockley more in the south of England. The lands about it had belonged to an old monastery, and traces of this church tenure are to be found in the nomenclature of the place. The Abbot's Walk is a fine double row of elm-trees, running for nearly half a mile, not in a straight line, as these walks generally do, but with an abrupt bend halfway up. As our church and the community that gathers round it have long ago usurped the seat of this old monastery—a solitary haunt then—so the Abbot's Walk, if it can be said to belong to any one pre-eminently in his parish, belongs to the abbot's successor, the rector.

The avenue of trees leads directly up to the church, and leaving the church and availing yourself of their shade or shelter, as the case may be for the whole length of their stretch, you come directly upon the parsonage. It rises out of its grounds, a solid, quaint-looking house, with its gardens, rich in vegetable promise, sloping gently to the south.

It was under the elms that John and his young wife passed, on this first day of their marriage, with the rector, who was an old friend of the bridegroom's; and Mrs. Seymour herself stood at the garden gate, dragging a little "encumbrance" by the arm, to welcome the bride and bridegroom—dear friends both of them to her; and to be the first to call Mary by her new name. Mary was a connection, or distant relative, of Mrs. Seymour's; and it was at the parsonage, in fact, that John met her.

"It's all very well, Grace," he would say to her, when he used to come up of a Saturday evening—his week's work done—"it's all very well for Tom to say, 'Don't grumble, and be contented,' and so forth: he can go in and write his sermon, with nothing to disturb him, except the howling of that child, and then come and talk over all his plans and grievances to you; but there's nobody to care for, or look to, me, once the office is shut and Bellamy goes."

"Isn't there Miss Griffiths?" said Mrs. Seymour, who could not help hearing what everybody was saying; "she's about your own age, John."

But John muttered some impatient word, dashing his heel into a great block of coal upon the fire, so that the sparks flew about the grate.

After this, Mary Marshall had come to the parsonage, and John's visits grew more frequent; and thus, you see, she became Mary Milward.

"So you see, Tom," said Mrs. Seymour to her husband, later on that day, as the carriage that was bearing off the new couple appeared like a black spot in the chalky road that skirted the hill—"you see, Tom, John has at last got somebody to care for him."

He made no direct answer; he was watching the carriage, now just nearing a wind in the road, after which it would be seen no more. He kept it in his view as long as he could, and then, looking sadly enough at her, he muttered, "In sickness and in health, till death them do part."

It was not the words, so much as the way they were said, that prompted her to put her arm through his, and that made them both walk slowly and sadly about the garden—not for long though, for Master Johnny, a three year old bully, comes and makes them join in his games with his sister—if possible, a smaller mite.

Honeymoons come to an end, as we all know; and in a short time Mr. Bellamy, the clerk, takes his proper and secondary post, while John rules again from the office throne. Spring has now softened into summer, and the elm-trees are green and luxuriant, and the walk under them almost the only retreat from the fierceness of the sun. Of evenings, after office hours, you might see John, with his young wife, enjoying the shade of this walk, or, oftener, on his way to the parsonage to gather the strawberries, which, so long as their season lasted, were a great attraction to an early tea in the arbour.

Mary was looking very well all this time—full of spirits and hope; and so the good-natured parson was full of hope too, and tried to check those fears and forebodings which would come upon him at times, or if he could not check them, at least he said nothing. As for John, it was quite a refreshing thing to see how this parchmenty old lawyer became rejuvenescent, and how fully her influence brought up to the surface all those kindly thoughts and emotions so dissonant to the stern doctrines of the law. In the office, and in the society of Mr. Bellamy, his clerk, he was as shrewd, as practical, and as inflexible as ever; but when this sharer of his daily toils closed the doors, and left at six o'clock—when for the rest of the evening he was associated with a gentler partner, then all his statutes, his recognisances, his fines, his double vouchers, and his recoveries, vanished like a mist.

These summer evenings were very pleasant to him, after the loneliness of his bachelor life; and pleasant, too, the autumn—for summer passes from us like a dream—when the blood was in the branches overhead, before the wintry winds and frosts had made the old trees skeletons once more.

The elm-walk of Ockley, it will be remembered, is not a straight row of trees, but the avenue, starting from the church, continues right on for half a mile or more, and then suddenly bends round to the right, and discovers the parsonage, with its garden and grounds. Just at this bend, and at the left hand side of the walk, there is a short path, or, rather, passage through the trees, and this ends in an arbour. All down the elm-walk there are seats, at intervals—some rude enough, and others put up by the different mayors of Ockley, as memorials of their years of office; but there is no one of these so favoured or so frequented as that in the little arbour we have described. This was John's favourite haunt; and here, early in the autumn evenings, you might find him and his wife resting after their stroll up and down.

The position of the arbour, placed just at the angle where the trees bend round, gives a very peculiar view. The elms seem to form, not one, but two noble avenues, leading directly up to it. John could thus see through the trees at one side the parish church—a stunted building, with nothing venerable about it except the ivy which sprung up, rank and luxuriant, clustering over the dwarf turrets, and half-concealing the old sundial, as if in quiet scorn of time; and then, at the other side was the parsonage, with the setting sun all red behind it, and the long shadows of the elm-walk lengthening over the sloping pleasure-ground that lay in front, while around them and behind them the hill-side was all golden with the harvest; the valleys also were thick with corn.

As they sit there on this autumn evening—the first touch of cold in the air just perceptible—up come from the parsonage Tom Seymour and Grace.

"Now what are they talking of, I wonder?" says John to his wife; and, indeed, the clergyman seemed to be speaking very impressively. They had watched him from the time he had left the house till now, when he was quite near them, and he had been talking all the way to his wife, turning round to her and shaking his finger, "as if he were preaching a sermon," says John.

Poor John! he was himself the text of the homily.

"I ought to have told him long ago, Grace," said Mr. Seymour; "I wanted to tell him, only you overruled me. I wish I had done it at the time. Look at her sitting out there, without a shawl or a cloak on her, and the air's as frosty as winter."

"Well, well, have it your own way, Tom; only let me speak to him; men don't understand these things, and you'll make him believe that she's in consumption already."

Mr. Seymour so far yielded to his wife, and with this compromise of matters they reached the arbour.

"Isn't it very late for you to be out, Mary?" he said. "I've brought a cloak for you. You don't keep that husband of yours in proper order at all. If I were to have Grace out as late as this, I should not hear the end of it from her for a week."

He took the light cloak that lay across his arm, and pinned it round her neck. She was so young and pretty, laughing archly at his awkwardness in managing the pin, and looking up to him so winningly the while. He drew her arm lightly through his, and they walked homeward under the trees. Mrs. Seymour followed with John, and the good clergyman had to wait for near an hour, sitting with Mary in her own little drawing-room, while his wife and her husband walked and talked slowly there in front of the house.

All this was early in the autumn; but a few months later had brought a great change—a great sorrow upon that little household, and a gloom even upon the whole village; for which of us is there whose heart is not touched when the sentence goes forth for the young—that sentence which awaits him and all of us? Outward consolation we take and give, that they have gone to a better place—that they are now beyond trial and sorrow. So we speak, and their memories are sacred to us, each according to his own worship; are they not God's ambassadors, legates to tell us of a kingdom where youth and beauty suffer no change?

Every one grieved in poor John's sorrow; it was not only his good friends at the parsonage, but the whole village had pity for him. They stopped the doctor at his door, hopefully, to ask the last piece of news; and the poor would waylay the clergyman with an interest as sincere.

Autumn was now nearly gone, and the storms were rude and riotous in the branches of the great trees overhead; cold winds, that scarcely visited the outlying hamlets and villages scattered over the slope of Ockley Hill, caught the town itself, and burst upon it with unbroken fury; drizzly November days rotted the fallen leaves into the clay, and made the whole landscape tristful and wretched. These were sad days for John; but Mrs. Seymour—a true friend in distress—came up each morning, and spent nearly the whole day at the house. She had a pleasant way with her that no one could resist, and John, too, longed to come to her for consolation; the burden laid upon him now seemed greater than he could bear.

"We mustn't despair, John. While there is life there is hope; we mustn't despair. If she has only strength to get over this, she may live longer than either of us;" and then, in her cheery, chatty way, she went on to tell him how Mrs. Morley had been twice as ill, was obliged to be carried up and down stairs every day by her husband;—"twice as ill! Why, don't you remember that she could not speak above her breath? and look at her now!" The poor fellow took these little scraps of comfort thankfully and tried to believe them.

And she knew the truth the whole time, and all her pleasant manner faded off when she left the house; and late of nights, when the children had gone to bed, she and her husband would sit over the fire, talking very sadly of the sorrowful future. What was to become of their old friend, if death were to come and sever from him that life which was already part of his own? Home and its pleasures and treasures were late guests for him, and if he were bereaved now, he would be indeed bereaved! And then they thought over their own young days, when they had come to the parish newly-wedded, and what a comfort it was to them to find some familiar face amongst all those welcoming strangers; and how they twitted John, and said he was born to be an old bachelor; and yet they regarded him in some sort as their own property, protecting him from some feminine attacks, and assisting and playing up the treacheries of their own favourites. And then Mary Marshall had come—poor Mary! whom they had never once thought he'd have taken—and with her had come, for John, content, and new life, and peace, and that one thing he had hoped for and yearned after through the long years. And then they thought of his married life, and, dear—dear! how the eight or nine months stretched out in their recollection, as if the time itself took its limits from the great changes which it had brought with it. The spring, and the summer, and the autumn; the honeymoon, and the return, and the first settling in the old house; whilst the elms budded with early spring, or made his walk underneath cool with their shade, or showed new hues and colours beautiful beyond those of the dreamy summer. Poor fellow! very late guests indeed, were home and its pleasures for him; and the winter was come already.

No wonder was it, when the clergyman and his good wife sat and talked thus together, that all her pleasant manner should fade away, and that the thoughts of the future should be very gloomy.

Meanwhile the poor sufferer grew worse and worse, less fit, day after day, to meet the struggle that was in store. It was touching to see her, so young and so beautiful—a loveliness beyond the beauty of health. Those blue eyes, their sparkle all gone, but large, and wistfully looking up at you. Her mind, too, had put on a new beauty, as if God were preparing her for that kingdom which she was so soon to see.

Soon there came a day when John sat waiting anxiously in that little drawing-room, which more than any other room in the house was full of associations and memories of her. It was a still day in mid-winter, and the ground outside was hard and crisp with the frost. He had sat there waiting and thinking for full half an hour, and a world of strange hopes and fears had come and gone, and left him still anxious. He could hear steps over his head, up there in the sick-room, and he knew that the doctor had been sent for, and that the dreaded time had come. He paced up and down the room silently, listening with intense attention for every sound overhead, or for every footstep upon the staircase. He heard the carriage drive up to the door, and the soft tread of the doctor above. Everything that his eye caught seized upon his mind, and forced it down to the one train of thought. Her wedding presents lay scattered over the table; the pair of bronzes on the chimneypiece, that she used to take such pride in, were the rector's gift; her piano, closed and silent now, had the music that he liked—the pieces he was sure to call for, during that half hour between dinner and tea, lying ready to hand. On the walls were his portrait and hers; hers so graceful and fresh in the blue and white sprigged muslin, in which he had first seen her, not a year ago—these things all came upon his sight, and pressed themselves like shadows upon his brain, while he listened for every sound overhead.

What a dull, still day it was, the frost velveting the leaves of the ivy that hung from the wall. Tired with walking the room, he twisted his chair from the fire, and looked out upon the little garden.

There was a robin hopping about the ground, and taking short flights from one bush to another. He watched it, half amused with the vain way it perched from tree to tree, disposing itself, as he thought, with a manifest eye to effect. It was off again, and this time he found it niched in the handle of a spade, and from this perch it poured forth the softest and saddest trill of a song, so sad that his thoughts wandered no longer, but returned to the old subject.

He turned from the window, drew down the blind, and sat over the fire. Her chair was there, at the other side of the hearthrug; little knick-knacks of ornament on the chimneypiece told him of her. He had avoided this room since her illness, and now everything in it seemed so strange without her. He could hear footsteps overhead—a stealthy tread down the staircase—the hall-door shut gently, and the doctor's carriage drive away. He listened for the slightest sound. The great house-clock in the landing ticked, ticked, ticked, measuring out the race for the strong and the fleet. Then he heard a step again in the sick-room, and how delicately must he have listened, when he knew that the door up-stairs was opened.

He heard the rustle of the dress upon the landing. Why did she come so slowly? She hesitated. She stopped, and then went back again into the room.

He buried his face in his hands, and dreaded to think what all this might mean. Again he heard the door softly opened, and the footstep upon the staircase, and all along the passage, and down till she came to his own door, and then, after hesitating a moment outside, he heard the handle gently turned, and he knew that she was in the room. He dared not look up; he dared not speak and ask, but his face was still buried in his hands.

She came and stood by his chair, and touched him. "John," she said, and as she spoke he felt her tears drop upon his hand; "John," she said, "God is very good; we cannot tell what is laid up for any of us, but we know that his mercy endures for ever."

She took the hand which he held out to her, and she led him with her out of the room. They passed up the staircase, where the old clock ticked sadly and solemnly as they went by it; they moved along the passage, and pushed open the door of the room. The nurse met him, holding in her arms the little baby, wrapped in flannel, and crying feebly. He pushed it aside with his arm;—boy or girl, what was it to him—he pushed it aside, and walked straight to the bed, the curtains were drawn, but with trembling hand he opened them and looked in. So still, so fair, so peaceful; but passed away! The eyes that had always sought his, closed now, and the little busy throbbing heart chill and still for ever.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE PIETY OF GRATITUDE.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

AVID, on one occasion of his chequered life, was so disquieted, and cast down so low, as to detect himself distrusting God's mercy and promise. His depression was the penalty of his having forgotten God's former dealings with him. Then he suddenly checked himself by recalling his past deliverances, meekly confessing, "This is mine infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High."

To aid the readers of THE QUIVER to make a similar improvement of their former mercies, especially those associated with passing judgments, I beg their attention to a few thoughts on the piety of gratitude. Gratitude is more than recognition; it is a thankful commemoration of special acts of the Divine goodness. Our country has been the scene of a series of visitations from pestilence, from the results of foreign war, and scarcity of food, arising from a grievous murrain among our flocks and herds. One after another the judgments have come and gone, and it is a solemn question for each one to put to himself: What impressions have they left surviving? "It becometh well the just to be thankful." Are we habitually so? Does gratitude for past mercies find its way into our prayers, abiding as a welcome, happy, sacred guest in our hearts? If not, the use of the old judgments, like bees perishing with their sting, has passed away with their inflection, and only left our hearts harder than before. The old mercies which, perhaps, softened us at the time, like water on cement, being forgotten and unimproved, have had that petrifying effect upon our emotions which sets into the prophet's "stony heart." A rule of grateful recollection, and rehearsal of God's movements towards us, would have helped us to keep alive their sanctifying powers. There is no duty of personal piety more bounden, or more edifying, than these thankful reminiscences. They constitute the religion of the memory, from the neglect of which that noble faculty of the mind is excluded from its proper ministry. The terms

"unthankful and unholy" are bracketed together as cause and effect. Thanksgiving becomes gratitude only when it embraces the past in its fervent recognition of present blessings. Thanksgiving which ignores the past, and accepts present mercies only as so many earnest of their future supply, like "a form of godliness without the power," is a hollow mockery of grateful feeling, whose reaction blunts the devout sentiment, and defiles the sacrifice of praise. Thanksgiving, as an act of true personal piety, requires an exercise of feeling, of expression, and of remembrance.

First, it must be felt; the claim on our praise must be realised. St. James distinguishes between the man who "says he has faith," and the heart-felt believer who has faith indeed; and St. John, between the man who "says he loves God," and the true filial love of a child of God. We should sit down beside the heap of loving-kindnesses, which "the God of all consolation," in his never-failing providence and grace, has accumulated round our hearths and homes, in order to form some estimate of what we owe him. We must try to appreciate their amount, and it will assist us in the effort if we institute similar calculations of the mercies shown to, or withheld from, others. St. James's words—"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction"—imply, among other meanings, that a religion of thankfulness is apt to be quickened by such visits of brotherly love and charity. A more earnest spirit of grateful piety may be kindled at the moving spectacle of a widowed mother, struggling and toiling in the midst of the little orphan circle that has lost its centre, magnanimously hiding her tears, with a kind of manly resolution, lest the young hearts, who have no other resource but hers—little hearts that could not bear much sorrow, should feel their loss too keenly when they saw that she was vanquished by it. Oh, holy martyrdom of many a mother! That widowed heart, broken as it is, is yet strong enough to bear the whole burthen of the fatherless creatures, without wincing, or betraying a fragment of the agony it cost her. Lean hard as you please, young orphan children, on that bruised and fractured spirit—she who in pain and sorrow bore each one of you, and yet kissed the little infant, unconscious cruelty, in the earliest pangs of its parentage, has still love enough to prolong the anguish of its birth, by assuming the willing burthen of its life, and play out the mother till death them do part.

To really magnify our own mercies, we should look at them through the glass of others' miseries; to feel the warmth of our own firesides, we should glance at the cold hearth extinguished in his dust, who has lately returned, ashes to ashes; to estimate the sweet peace and privilege of a spared household, whom the destroying angel has not touched, even with his wing in passing, we should translate our sympathies to the bereaved family, smitten, like the homes of Egypt, with a darkness that may be felt, and with the death of more than the firstborn. Their "great cry" should be as a pathetic accompaniment to our jubilant and thankful psalmodies; and thus, walking from the house of mourning into the house of prayer, our strongly-impressed and solemnised conviction should be, like that which David sang: "O God, my heart is ready, my heart is ready; I will sing and give praise with the best member that I have." "Awake, lute and harp." But these are not the only instruments, nor indeed the chief ones, in the melodies of spiritual praise. God's harp, when "the wind that bloweth where it listeth" sweeps across its tender chords, like an Æolian, waking sweet and gentle echoes of heavenly music—that harp, like the upper tabernacle, "is not made with hands." That harp is the sanctified soul itself—an attuned and harmonised soul, pitched to the joyous note of "glory to God in the highest;" and when its glad hosannas sing, "Awake, lute and harp," it adds, "I myself will awake right early." This was the second essential characteristic of thanksgiving, that it should be expressed as well as felt; as the term implies, not merely thanks, but the giving of thanks.

Thanks is a sweet old Saxon word, ancient as our language, and sacred in its Scriptural associations. Like "alms," "thanks" is seldom, if ever, used in the singular, as if to imply, by its soft, grateful plural, the obligation to frequency, the rule of repeated reminiscences.

If the congregations that crowded our churches on the last fast-day, when the hand of judgment tolled the dread service, and fear was the handmaid to the public devotions, soon, and so soon, unhappily, dwindle down to the few solitary strangers, who, like the Samaritan leper, return to give glory to God;—if the joyous chimes of thanksgiving be less attractive and influential than the grim knell of the plague, both plague and passover, judgment and mercy, will have visited us, as a people, in vain. Their dread functions will only have ministered to our greater condemnation. God often strikes again, where the first blow leaves no impression, or one that was too soon effaced. When the earth is unsoftened and unfruitful under the hail-storm, "the clouds return after the rain." Let us not, by our insensibility to God's obvious presence of late years in the midst of us, tempt him to come back in that shape again.

Let us acknowledge, after all our increased and now considerable experience with the various forms which, for instance, cholera assumes, that its mysteriousness is fearful as its fatality; that David alone defines it accurately as "a pestilence that walketh in darkness," like the angel in the cloud, or like Him who, under cover of midnight, turned the camp of the Assyrians into their sepulchre, and left not a living sentinel to salute the break of day! We cannot disguise the fact, that the awful malady seems now to be naturalised among us, as a chronic epidemic, and thus becomes one of those rough, sharp, faithful preachers, whose invariable text is, "Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye know not the Son of man cometh!"

The comparative failure of remedial agents is another mark of special interposition on the part of God. Medicine, unable to compete with the power of the plague, like the magicians of Egypt, involuntarily admits, "This is the finger of God!"

It is a strong enforcement of the bidding, "Cease ye from man," and a solemn adjuration to us all: "Turn ye to the Lord your God." "My song," said David, "shall be of mercy and of judgment." Not of mercy oblivious of the judgment, nor of judgment distrustful of the mercy, but of both, praising God for both, grateful for both, whether they visit us in a national or individual form; and thus, by his grace, neither the one nor the other will have been sent on their awakening errand in vain.

Lastly, this thankfulness must be remembered. The use of man's emotion is to "feel after God." The use of his speech is to express that feeling; the use of his memory is to store it up in the mind. Monuments are helps to memory, and God's monuments are his ordinances. If you would diligently remember God, habitually refresh your memories by waiting upon him in his ordinances, and in them continually call to mind "his lovingkindness, which is better than life." Look back to gracious antecedents of his love and mercy, many of them known only to the recipients, and say with the grateful Psalmist, "I will remember thee concerning the land of Jordan, and the little hill of Hermon." We do not know what were the mercies which David received in the vale of Jordan, or on the hill-sides of Hermon. We should never have heard of them but for his grateful strains of remembrance; and his lesson on the piety of gratitude would have been lost to the Church, had he not recalled them, perhaps, long years after their occurrence. We may be sure if "the man after God's own heart" found such an exercise of memory profitable, it cannot be otherwise than "to the use of edifying" for our own souls. It sets to music Christian experience; it is singing and making melody in our hearts unto the Lord, whether the themes of our thanksgivings be joyous or mournful; whether they wake their echo in a valley of Baca or a festival of Cana.

I knew an aged Christian, whose life was one of large acquaintance and close communion with God, who at stated seasons used to introduce into her family-worship most of the past memorabilia of her household—both its joys and sorrows, its gains and losses; her children that were spared to her, and those of whom she had been bereaved, mentioning by name both the living and the dead, in one common act of praise and thanksgiving. They were very solemn occasions of deeply pathetic interest to all who heard her. For she could speak of the departed without faltering lips, and bless God without a tear, that she "sorrowed not as others, without hope."

The piety of gratitude, undiminished by trials, and untarnished by forgetfulness, wove a peculiar charm into her personal religion. The sorrowful things among her reminiscences, operating as the effect of a shade, only threw out in more beautiful relief the brighter tints of her life-picture; both, like the cloud, or the luminous pillar, commemorating the presence and glorifying the leadings of her covenant God!

May that blessed Spirit, whose office it is to "bring to our remembrance all things which the Lord hath said unto us," and all that he has done for us, and with us, sanctify our memories, and make them inner means of grace, by recalling all we owe to our long-suffering, gracious God, for past blessings and warnings; for past deliverances, whether in national or individual trials and dangers, and whether from public or personal besetting sins, that so among the oblations we lay upon thy altars, O Lord of hosts—Lord of hosts of mercies, as well as of hosts of men and angels—we may "offer year by year continually" the sacrifice of a holy thankfulness, which can never cease to be sufficiently grateful for mercies more in number than the hairs of our heads, and, like their loving, gracious Giver, enduring for ever.

God puts a sustaining, reassuring power into the piety of gratitude. It enables the soul to reason itself out of its present misgivings, by falling back into the arms of past reliefs. Hence the force of David's plea: "O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan." The old mercy shall staunch the blood of the fresh wound; or the old judgment, which proved a movable tabernacle, shall rise up from the tomb of memory to certify the believer "He will not always chide: neither will his anger last for ever."

Hence the policy, as well as duty, of obedience to the precept: "Remember all the way" (the rough as well as the smooth way) "the Lord thy God hath led thee."

BABY PRAYING.

KNEELING lowly, saying slowly
 Short and simple infant's prayer,
 In words broken, and scarce spoken,
 Angels bending closely there;
 And our great God, throned in splendour,
 King of kings and Lord of lords,
 Hearing mid the mighty thunder
 Every one of baby's words:
 Thunder of the nations' making
 As they pour their loud acclaim,
 Thunder of the heavens shaking
 Where the lightnings burst to flame.

"Father, mother, sister, brother,
 And good Margery, my nurse," These she prays for, daily prays for;
 Then repeats her pretty verse
 All about the tiny sparrows,
 And the lilies white and tall,
 And in heaven the long bright star rows,
 And the God that made them all:
 These, and names of olden story,
 Joseph, Moses, Samuel,
 And Himself, the Lord of glory,
 Who became a child as well.

Guileless baby! ah, it may be,
 She can better pray than we:
 Touching nearly, seeing clearly,
 What to us is mystery.
 She has learnt her little lesson—
 Knows it: does she know no more?
 Fewer far the sins that press on
 Her young heart to cloud it o'er.
 We have thoughts, our minds dismaying,
 That from guilt's dark problems rise;
 And they come when we are praying—
 Thoughts more curious than wise.

Little maiden, lightly laden
 With the cares that make us sigh;
 Thine no sorrow of to-morrow
 Chequering this evening's sky:
 Thine no night without its slumber,
 Nor without its sun the day;
 Thine no griefs we may not number,
 And with kisses charm away.
 Silken are thy baby tresses;
 Ours are shot with early frost:
 Fond and trustful thy caresses;
 Our affections cold and crost.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE OGLIVIES OF OGLIVIE.

LN evil days the warp of our story, the threads which run from generation to generation, were spun and dyed; and though the woof is of the fairer colours which are those of our own everyday life, throughout all the pattern the darker threads must run.

I am not going back to the times which exist for us only in books. The "bad old times" of which I speak still live in the minds of those few whose memories stretch back to the opening of the century, the memories and the men alike fading. But many of us retain vivid impressions of them, as depicted to us by living witnesses, now silent for ever.

They were times of war. The babes of that generation were cradled in war and nursed in war; at war they played as children, and to war they were marched as men.

They were times of famine. As early as 1795 mobs in London were shouting round the King's coach for "Peace and Bread!" and as the century closed this foe of the poor came to a very death-grapple.

And, worst of all, they were times of widespread domestic corruption. Through all the miseries of war, and above all the groanings of the people, rose the maddening sound of the riot of a senseless crew.

In Bleakshire, in the corner of the island where this story is transacted, the suffering was extreme. There, if anywhere, the invader was expected to descend. The flower of its youth were tempted, bribed, or pressed into active service. Its stiff soil and inclement skies made it the first to suffer from the prevailing dearth. And there, in town, and camp, and castle, grew rampant a more reckless libertinism than was, perhaps, to be found anywhere else throughout the land. The private history of its noble families is rife with strange and tragic stories of these days. Some date from them their decay; others it swept from the face of the earth, which could no longer support their iniquities.

Even in these evil days the Oglivies of Oglivie had an evil name. In the little fishing villages that nestled here and there along the coast of Bleakshire, setting their backs to the bare rock and their faces to the rude sea, to grapple with it for very life, wild Sir Alexander was regarded, by sober men and pious matrons, as a man reprobate and accursed, who was destined to die "an ill death" as soon as he had filled up the measure of his iniquity. In the little moorland farms, dotted over the bleak uplands where he and his companions from "the castle" ranged in the shooting season, startling the lonely places with their oaths, and blasphemies, and half-drunken laughter, the mother sent her blooming daughter "ben the hoose," and served them herself with the warm milk into which they emptied their flasks of rum and brandy, while she strictly charged the maiden on no account to peep from her covert till they were gone. The people felt towards him as they might towards a bird of prey, against whom they could only act in self-defence, and not always succeed in that. The castle was his eyrie, and thither he gathered others like himself. Lesser birds of prey trooped in his train and sheltered within the sweep of his wing. There was the secret still on the moors, where whisky was made that never paid tax to the King, but paid tithe to Oglivie; and there was the strange barque that at midnight sent on shore a cargo purchased with something brighter and redder than gold. But with him and his deeds my story, happily, has little to do; only all stories have their roots in the past, and "wild Sir Alexander," sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind, was preparing an aftergrowth of misery for the time to come.

Castle Oglivie was a fit home for such a man. Built on a rock, its granite walls battered by the storm, its garden sown with salt by the spray-laden winds, so that no tender flower would grow there, the moan of the sea filled it for ever. But it was no fit home for women. It seemed fatal to all gentle things. It was said that the brides who crossed its threshold shuddered as with a death-chill; and, for two generations, at least, they had speedily been carried out again, to rest where no chill could reach them, either of granite walls or hearts of stone.

So it had fared with the first wife of "wild Sir Alexander." Her ways were quiet and sober, and her husband had left her to pine alone, as soon as a single summer of her wedded life was over. The winter and life's heaviest disappointment struck their chills into her heart, and she died, leaving twin daughters to be reared in the inclement soil where she had perished.

But where she had perished they had lived and grown, sheltered by the kindly arms of humble nurses, and nurtured by the pious care of a poor dependant. They grew up unheeded by their father, who was now here, now there—only swooping down upon his lands, from time to time, with some of his riotous town companions, to hatch some fresh mischief, and to carry off what he could to the gambling-tables of Bleaktown or London.

The sisters had learned to cling to each other in fear and trembling at his coming, with the storm of curses it brought upon everybody and everything at the castle. At least, the one clung and trembled, while the other stood firm in the front and did battle when need was. The one sister was the shadow of the other in every way. They were never apart so much as an hour. Wonderfully alike in feature and gesture, the one was yet thinner, fainter, and feebler than the other; like the same note on different keys. Where Miss Janet was low and plaintive, Miss Margery was loud and indignant. Miss Janet left to herself would have been wavering and purposeless, but she seemed, in following her sister, less to bend than to be inspired by the stronger will.

As they grew older, their father was more with them. He began to lack the means for his expensive pleasures abroad, and to indulge in them more at home; and the girls would stand at their room-door in the dark, and listen with a curious awe as the sounds of voices, and the rattle of dice, and the shout of laughter echoed through the rooms below far into the night. White with terror, they had hearkened to the still more terrible sounds of strife: and when, after a heavy fall, they had seen their father carried insensible to his room, they had reason for their dread, that some day he would be carried there a dead, if not a murdered man; but the next morning he would be gulping down half a tumblerful of brandy, and going out for the day, swearing that everything was going to the dogs.

Thus their girlhood passed, and their first youth went by, till two forlorn women, with premature lines in their colourless faces and premature threads of grey in their red locks, looked out upon the changeless and yet unresting sea, and on a horizon of life as wild and as monotonous.

Of the comings and goings of Sir Alexander Oglivie, his household kept no reckoning; but it was after a more prolonged absence than usual that, one night, early in the last year of the century, he returned bringing a lady with him. The sisters were sitting by their fire—necessary in these bleak regions almost all the year round—listening to the wail of the March wind, when they were roused by the stir of the arrival; and shortly after, Sir Alexander came to them, leading in a fair young creature, faint and weary with travel, so it seemed, wet with salt seawater and disordered by the blast. To his daughters, struck dumb with astonishment, he presented her as his wife, and requested—only the tone was a command—that she might be kindly cared for. To their somewhat cold greeting she returned no answer, and as he left her in their hands, and went off to join the man he had brought with him, Sir Alexander added, "She will do no harm with her tongue at least."

Wonderingly, but still kindly and with awkward attempts at tenderness, they tried to find out her wants, and tend and comfort her—their new mother, more like a younger sister to them; but, except sobs and loudly-uttered sighs, she made no attempt to reply, and they set her down as a foreigner who did not understand their speech. On the morrow they were to learn why their questions had remained unanswered, and they felt a shock of mingled pity and horror on hearing that their father's wife was deaf and dumb, that their new companion would never be able to understand or to answer word of theirs.

On the morrow, in presence of the sisters, took place a parting between the new Lady Oglivie and one who had accompanied her to the castle on the previous night. He was a seafaring man, of bold and resolute bearing. They had seen him there before. The parting was proof of near relationship between him and the dumb girl, who clung about his neck with tears and passionate mute entreaties. In the presence of the stranger, Sir Alexander made his daughters promise to treat her, as his wife, with dutiful love and care, and the look with which the former led her to a seat beside them, and left her there, was half appeal half menace.

The new Lady Oglvie must have been a wealthy bride, for there was plenty of gold going at the castle after she came, and it had been scant enough before her coming. How it had been come by was another matter, and one which no one inquired into. Sixty years ago wealth and wives were not always come by in the peaceable way in which they are acquired in our soberer and less picturesque days. But though there was greater plenty at the castle, its lord did not long remain there. As in earlier days, he absented himself, leaving his dumb wife to the care of his daughters, who were faithful to their promise, to the letter and also to the spirit. Resentment against their father, strong in Miss Margery, fainter in Miss Janet, mingled with pity for the dumb sharer of their sorrows.

The last night of the century was one of storm and tempest more furious than any in the memory of man. It began in the afternoon of the previous day, and raved throughout the next with unabated fury. Along the iron-bound coast of Bleakshire the German Ocean rose and dashed itself in insurrection. The huge waves leapt into the jaws of the rocks and were churned through their teeth into a milky froth. The wind rushed, and shrieked, and trampled, and trumpeted into the coves and gulleys whirling balls of foam over the highest cliffs. The dawn of the new year's morning saw sixty wrecks, great and small, along that coast alone.

All the afternoon, the dumb wife sat watching the sea from her favourite station in a deep bay-window over the cliff. As the wind and the sea rose, a wild restlessness seemed to take possession of her. Pacing up and down the room was no noticeable feature, for that was her common custom, and halting in the window for another look over the sea. But she would go down and stand on the cliff and pace about there, till she had to crouch before the blast, and hold fast by the tufts of coarse grass that grew on the bank, to keep her from being whirled away. She was impatient too of the presence of the sisters, and made passionate signs to be left alone. How they longed to be able to soothe her with words, but, alas! they could only understand her meaning when material wants were in question. They had no mutual language for the wants and desires of the soul. At length, she sought them eagerly, pointing from the window to a ship nearing that perilous shore under bare poles. The darkness was coming down, and the ship in peril; but her own peril had come to the poor dumb wife, and she went down in it, pleading with outstretched arms and wild appealing eyes for something, they knew not what. He might have known if he had been there.

In that wild night the heir of Oglvie was born. In the morning light a motherless infant lay on Margery Oglvie's knees, and the ship in the offing had disappeared.

CHAPTER II.

THE HEIR OF OGLVIE.

MARGERY and Janet Oglvie welcomed the weak and sickly infant left in their hands, as hungry creatures welcome food. They were too near, too identical as it were, to fill up to each other that hunger of the woman's heart, to spend itself and to be spent on another. They felt their hearts withering, though they could not have said that this was what made their lives look poorer and sadder, and more colourless day by day; and the coming of the child was like rain on the dry grass.

They got a nurse from one of the little clusters of labourer's cottages on the estate—a tall, soft, sweet-spoken Highland woman, who had lost her own baby, and was ready to give the little stranger all the fondling care she would have given to her own: for in her part of the country the relation of foster-mother is held in great esteem. But as time went on, instead of loving her nursling, as the honest creature was prepared to do, she began to shrink from it more and more. All her nursing would not plump out the small skinny limbs. The wee white face grew more and more weird-like every day, and the secret of the nurse's care came out at last, in tears and lamentations, while she owned her belief that the "bairn was no cannie." In other words, the superstitious creature considered that the child was not altogether of the earth, and that it was hardly safe to nourish and cherish it. So the nurse went away, and the sisters took on themselves the task of rearing their baby-brother. Then it dawned on them that there was something strange about the child.

"See how he stares about, and never seems to notice anything," said Janet, as she looked on the little creature in her sister's lap. "Perhaps it's because he is like his mother. Oh, Margery, what if he is like her!" she added, with a burst of unwonted tears.

"Hush, Janet!" said Margery, "I've been thinking of that, though I did not like to speak; and if it is so, it's the judgment of God, and we have no right to rebel against it."

The hard look which came into her face was perhaps more rebellious than Janet's tears.

"Could we not find out, Margery?" ventured the latter, after a pause; "it would be better to know the worst. Let us make a noise and see if it will scare him."

But the child began to start and cry, as was his wont, and so they were obliged to put off the experiment till he was asleep. As soon as he was laid in his cradle, Janet whispered, "Now!" but Margery sat down in her chair, and took her knitting and began to rock gently with her foot, answering, also in a whisper, "No, let him sleep awhile first."

Down in that woman's heart there was a deep well of tenderness, though it came little to the hard surface. She sat there an hour in silence, schooling herself to wake an infant from its sleep.

"Try now," she said, breaking it at last.

Janet brought a heavy bell to ring over the cradle; but her sister seized it ere it swayed. "That would raise the whole house," she whispered, with a flush of impatience, betraying her pride, and reticence. "Let something fall." Janet went to the hearth and made a vigorous clash of metal, by letting fall one of the fire-irons; whilst Margery continued rocking gently with her foot. Not a start, not a movement stirred the cradled child, from whom "the world was at one opening quite shut out." The sisters looked at each other, and Janet knew by Margery's face that there was nothing to be said.

Since it had turned out a weaking, Sir Alexander had shown but a feeble interest in his heir; and when Margery at his next advent made known to him the calamity of his child, he answered with a curse, which Margery flung back with her steel-blue eyes, as she said, "You need not call for curses, for they will come sure enough, only the curse causeless shall not come!"

There are some in our days who believe that an evil course of life, especially a life of habitual drunkenness—and such was very common among the gentry fifty years ago—induces a kind of moral insanity. I for one believe it: there comes a time when the most powerful motives fail to move the man of sin. He has brought on himself paralysis of the will, and can no more escape, that is, humanly speaking, from the power of his bad propensity, cost him what it may, than a paralytic can run from the fire which is leaping towards his bed. So it seemed to fare with Sir Alexander Oglivie. Neither fearing God nor regarding man from his youth up, he went on his way, more and more defying the judgment of Heaven, more and more heedless of every human obligation. Making himself mad with cursing, mad with passion, mad with drink, his life of pleasure had turned into a life of torture, to which he added day by day. But the end was at hand.

He and another, a near kinsman, and brother in iniquity, were riding to the castle along the high road on the cliff. They had been to the camp near Bleaktown, and both had been drinking and losing at play all night, and now it was fair broad daylight. Sir Alexander's horse became restive from the rude handling of his half-tipsy rider, and Gilbert Oglivie, who was comparatively sober, had more than once urged restraint. But the demon of rage was in his kinsman's heart, and every now and then he plunged his spurs into the creature's sides, at the same time reining him tight as he darted forward. Suddenly, at a narrow and dangerous part of the road, the animal, who had lost his temper too, and with greater reason than the other who mastered him, reared and swerved till his fore-legs for a moment actually overhung the precipice. In another, Sir Alexander had swung him round and flung himself off. No sooner were horse and man standing on solid ground, than the master brute began to use the whip with all the force of ungovernable rage. But it seemed as if the nobler animal had thrown off restraint, and defied him, rearing, plunging, and kicking, and baffling his showering strokes.

"Now stop, Oglivie, stop!" cried his sobered companion.

He did not stop, but stepping back for vantage ground to inflict a heavier blow, he reeled a pace too far, and disappeared over the cliff.

He was not gone, however. In his left hand he held the bridle, and the powerful creature stood the tug and strain, backing against the bank behind him, though trembling in every limb with the sudden shock.

"Hold on!" cried his companion, dismounting, and flinging himself on the ground full length, while he looked over the edge, and reached his hand; but Sir Alexander had clutched a ledge of rock, and could not seize it without greater danger. He loosed the bridle and seized another ledge, and by planting his feet in the fissures of the rock, would soon have scrambled to the path, but in a moment the ledge crumbled in his hands, the loosened rein was jerked from his hold, and he fell, rolled rapidly over the stones, and then dropped noiselessly into the abyss below.

What were Gilbert Oglivie's feelings at that moment no one ever knew. A poor man passing to his work had witnessed the close of the tragedy, and was on the spot in time to keep the other from going over the cliff after his kinsman.

"Ye maun ride round, sir—a cat couldna keep her feet below the broo o' that craig!" was the countryman's speech; and seeing it was too true, Gilbert Oglivie rode round, and warned the servants at the castle, and told them to prepare the ladies for the worst.

On his return with the dead, Margery refused to see him. Her father had "died by the judgment of God"—that was her stern verdict; but neither truce nor parley would she hold with any who had aided and abetted the course on which that judgment overtook him.

The estate was not entailed, but had been settled by deed on the children of Sir Alexander and their heirs, passing first to the male children, and then to the females. So that it had not been in the father's power to alienate the property, as he might otherwise have done.

Margery and Janet were, however, left totally unprovided for, with the exception of a small property called "The Forest House," several miles inland, which they inherited from a relative. It was found, too, that their father had appointed them guardians of his children by the second marriage, in the event of his death, by a deed drawn up at the time of that marriage, and which, they surmised, was none of his suggesting.

To this house of theirs, with the allowance provided for the infant, the sisters resolved to retire,

They were still young women, though people spoke of them as old. "Old maids" they were called, at the time when other women are in the midst of the cares of early motherhood.

Margery, as usual, led the way. "It's a dull house we're going to," she said to her sister; "but not duller than our days will be."

"Do you think he will ever be like other bairns, Margery?" said Janet, alluding to a still darker fate in store for the unconscious heir.

"Never, never," answered Margery; "the bairn's a born idiot. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation," she murmured, bitterly; "but there will be neither third nor fourth in our line."

Poor Margery! she forgot the redeeming clause of the terrible penalty—the loving ones who are made the channels of mercy even to those on whom that penalty falls most heavily.

CHAPTER III.

DELAUBE.

IN the early part of the last century, the house of Delaube had been built to receive an Oglivie and his foreign wife. The origin of the name no one thought of. It was among the things forgotten, and its poetic meaning, de l'aube, "of the dawn," had been lost sight of in the neighbourhood. It was built of the white-and-blue granite of the district, which, when fresh from the quarry, sparkles like sugar-loaf in the sun. The granite was rough hewn and the house plain and unpretending. It rose three storeys high on its little hill, down which its garden ran, cut into terraced slopes, with steps of granite between. An old-fashioned garden, with old-fashioned flowers of the hardiest sorts, was the garden of Delaube. Hardy flowers they needs were, facing as they did the east wind and the sea. The sea, however, was miles away, though always in sight—a cloud of grey in hazy weather, a belt of shimmering silver in the sunshine.

Between the house and the sea stretched the lands of Oglivie, beginning with a broad belt of fir-wood at the foot of the little hill. Round the back of this hill the firs had marched their ranks, and up its western slopes; nay, they had clothed it all round, as with a sombre cloak, save on the east, where the garden ran into the few small fields that formed the miniature domain. From the windows could be seen, far away in the west, the grand outlines of the Highland hills. The house caught the first glimpse of the dawn, flushing out all over in its light; but whether because of this, or because it had witnessed the dawn of a new day to the first dwellers there, it had been named Delaube, no one knew or cared.

The century was twenty years old; the bad old times had passed away. George III. had died, old and mad and blind, the saddest and most sobering spectacle that was ever perhaps offered to a nation, to teach it the vanity of earthly greatness. There was peace at last. The passions of war had worn themselves out, its wounds were healing over, and its sad and miserable wrecks had drifted into quiet havens, or altogether disappeared.

But there are sadder wrecks than even these: the wrecks of stormy passions and lives of sin.

Just such a stranded wreck in the sea of life was Gilbert Oglivie, of Delaube. It is needless to go back upon his past. He had been much abroad, his branch of the family having close ties with France, and his wife also being a Frenchwoman. Till the breaking out of the Revolution, his only son had remained among his mother's relatives in Paris, and shortly after his return to his father's house, had joined a militia regiment in which the former held command.

But not many years of active life remained to Gilbert Oglivie, in which to retrace his steps towards a better life than he had led in company with his cousin, wild Sir Alexander. It was said that he had begun to do this; but, be that as it may, while yet, as it seemed, in full vigour, he was smitten with paralysis, and condemned to drag out what was left of life as a hopeless cripple.

At the time of his enforced retirement, there was nothing left of his modest fortune, except his place at Delaube, which he and his son had visited at intervals and kept up; if maintaining an old servant there could be said to keep it from falling into decay. At one time Louis Oglivie had been more at the place than his father, having, for reasons of his own, exchanged into a regiment stationed near Blacktown. But that was before his father's calamity.

The young man had been a universal favourite, except with his father, who cherished for him a sort of contemptuous toleration, rather than affection. Gilbert Oglivie was of great stature and stately bearing; his son was small and almost effeminate. The father was handsome, the son might with justice have been called beautiful; but Louis Oglivie was gay and volatile, and wanting in the only virtues which his father recognised in a man—the will to do and the soul to dare. His was one of those sweet, but easily-spoiled natures, whose hearts when they are corrupted, seem to rot to the very core, and to leave them a mere pulp of soulless selfishness.

When the militia were disbanded, at the close of the war, Louis Oglivie went back to Paris, and Delaube had not seen him since. He had taken his leave with very little ceremony; for, instead of complying with his request for money, his father had insisted on his taking possession of his little daughter, then a child of five years old, an encumbrance to which he was by no means inclined.

So it had come to pass that little Peggy Oglivie was left at Delaube, where nobody wanted her, except perhaps Jean, the faithful old servant who had nursed her father. She was left there simply because she was not wanted anywhere else.

And in the household on which she had been thrust there was neither youth nor love. She alone was of the dawn; round its other inmates the shadows had gathered, and were gathering, for the coming night.

Gilbert Oglivie sat all day in the chair to which Jean and her helpmate, "Tammas," carried him every morning, and which was wheeled out into the garden, when the weather would permit. There he sat looking out, with his grey eyes hidden under their thick and grisly eyebrows, on the distant line of sea and sky, with what thoughts of the past for company no one knew. He had taken little or no notice of the child, only when she had begun to chatter to the things about her, speaking to the little birds, and to the bushes, as if they could understand her speech, he had one day called to Jean to take away "the brat," and Peggy had been ignominiously carried off to the region of cabbages and currant-bushes to the rear, where she made herself, in a very short time, equally happy.

For Peggy had, fortunately, been gifted with one of those natures which are irrepressible as light itself. She was regardless of the frowns of fate, in the shape of the grandfather, in whose name every louder outburst of grief or glee was summarily checked by Jean. She would toddle up to him, with some mere knot of a bud or flower which she had plucked stalkless, or some unripe fruit which she had gathered from the ground, and expect him to share in her delight. Poor little one! it was like calling on the dead to live.

And yet in time the fearless confidence of innocence won its way, and Gilbert Oglivie would pat the fresh cheek with his long thin finger, and even once, when Jean, hearing her voice louder than usual in front of the house, would have snatched her away, he sternly bade her leave the child alone, while Jean went back to her kitchen, shaking her head over the perversity of men who were never twice in one mind.

On windy days Tammas wheeled his master out as usual, and knew that, unless the storm brought rain as well, he must be left there to encounter the blast in his own way. Nothing seemed to rouse him so much as the wind. He pressed his close-fitting skull-cap of black velvet down upon his brows, while the blast lifted the grey locks which escaped from beneath it, and leaning forward, seemed as if every moment he would burst the bonds which held him and go forth a free man once more. Alas! it only roused a mad rebellion in the soul which had that helpless body for its prison-house, which vented itself in curses on those limbs which would never more obey the will of their owner, and in wild words against the Power which withheld complete destruction of soul and body.

On one of these days little Peggy had crept up behind her grandfather's chair, and had listened to words which one would not think it well for a little child to hear. The words she but half understood, but the mood was sufficiently intelligible, and she crept away again, awed and thoughtful, taking refuge with Jean, who was baking in the kitchen.

After standing beside her quietly for some time, and not, as usual, making demands for meal to bake miniature cakes with, the child plucked at Jean's skirt and whispered, gravely, "Why is grandfather angry with God? is he bad, Jean?"

Jean stopped to look down at the questioner, and comprehending well enough what had taken place, she answered, with equal gravity, "You must never say that again, Peggy. Grandfather's a sore sufferer; the hand o' his Maker's heavy on him, and ye maun pity him, my bairn! How would ye like to be tied to a chair frae morn to night, and never be able to move without a helpin' hand?"

Very silently the child had stolen away again, and drawn near to the old man, and, leaning her head on his arm, looked up in his face with a look of wistful concern, and lisped out, "I am velly solly for poor grandpapa." Pity from any other source would have roused the lion nature of the man to rage, but for once he drew the child into his bosom and kissed her.

Such was the home and such the surroundings amid which, with little change from day to day, Peggy Oglivie grew to be a douce and yet merry little maiden of ten years old.

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—I.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

"I SHOULD like to break them, I should!"

"Oh, Miss Edith! break what?"

"Break the nasty spectacles."

"What! your dear grandmamma's glasses, do you mean?"

"Yes I do!" answered the little lady, sharply. "She says she uses them because they make things grow bigger, and I know that's why my faults look so big to her; all the little, littlest things I do—ever so little—grow as big, as big through granny's nasty spectacles!"

The servant, in whose ears this grievance was volubly poured forth by the little girl, smiled as she answered, "Then you must ask grandmamma to take them off when you are going to do some of those very naughty little things."

"That would be no good; for if I had time to think of that, I should have time to think it was naughty, and I shouldn't do it."

"Then you do not like coming to stay with grandmamma, I suppose?"

"Yes, I do, because she's very kind when I am good; and I like the country so much better than London; I always feel well here, and have not got to take nasty physic, as I have at home."

"Well, we can't have everything we like in this world, missy, can we?" said Hannah; "so, when you come in the country, you must put up with granny's spectacles, musn't you?" and Hannah gave the finishing touch to the glossy hair she had been arranging, and sent the little girl down to the drawing-room, to await the announcement of dinner.

Grandmamma was not in the room when she entered, so she seated herself on a settee, in the large bow-window, which looked out into the loveliest of gardens, and began trying to think how she could manage to overcome the only thing that marred the pleasure of her visit to Monksford.

In this lovely and retired village Mrs. Everley had lived for years, beloved by all who knew her, a perfect English lady, bearing her years—now numbering some seventy winters—bravely, with all her intellects unimpaired, inspiring respect in every one who saw her, by the gentle dignity, and yet unvarying cheerfulness of her manners.

Edith Everley, the child of her eldest son, was her most frequent visitor, perhaps, for her mother had an idea that she could not well fulfil her duty without constantly dosing her little ones. Thus poor Edith, though naturally a sturdy, healthy child, so frequently presented a sickly white face from this pernicious system, that she was obliged to be continually sent to grandmamma, for change of air. There, in the sweet country she so loved, continually out enjoying the exercise and air, so necessary for her, she soon regained her natural colour, and astonished them at home so much by her healthful appearance, that they deemed Monksford the most miraculous place in the world. And dearly Edith loved a visit there, but for this one exception we have related—the unhappy knack granny had of thinking things so very wrong, in which Edith could see no harm!

She was pondering, as I have said, coiled up on the large settee, her head resting against the side of the open window, and her bright golden hair mingling with the jessamine leaves and blossoms, when grandmamma entered the room.

"Well, little one, very hungry?" she asked.

"No, grandmamma; not very."

"I have something pleasant to tell you. Mrs. Drayson has a syllabub and hay-party this afternoon at the farm, and has asked you. You would like to go, would you not?"

"Oh, yes, grandmamma," answered the little girl.

"Oh, yes, grandmamma," echoed the old lady. "Why, that's not the tone in which my little excitable Edith usually receives such communications. What's the matter?"

Edith blushed as she answered, "I was thinking of something else."

"May I know what it was? It must have been something very serious to prevent your springing off the settee, and endangering the safety of my little cups and saucers on this table, at the thought of a syllabub-party."

"I was thinking about—about your spectacles."

"My dear child!—my spectacles!—what of them?"

"Why, they—they make everything so big," said the child, hesitatingly."

"Of course, love, they do; for my eyes have been active servants to me for many years, and are weak and weary now, so I need the help of glasses to enable me to see to work and read."

"Yes, I know; but——"

"But what, Edith, love? There is some mystery about these glasses. What is it? You have not been trying them on, and broken them?" said the old lady, with a sudden thought, looking in the basket where she usually kept them.

"Oh! no, granny dear; I have not, indeed!"

"Then, what is it? Tell me, like a good girl."

"Well, I think you put them on whenever I do any little, little thing that you call naughty; and it makes it seem such a big thing!"

Mrs. Everley laughed heartily, as she drew the child tenderly towards her, and said—

"Your father, oddly enough, used to say the same thing. He declared, when he was a little boy, I always used to put on spectacles to look at his faults, and in those days, you know, I did not need spectacles; but he felt, as you feel, darling, that I magnified little faults into great sins. The fact is that small faults uncorrected become sins, and with my mental glasses I could see them as they might be, if neglected; and so now, deary, I see your faults just as I saw my own children's, and am as anxious to make you, as I tried to make them, 'perfect, even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect.' But here is Sibley, announcing dinner, so we must go. Some day I will tell you, as a little moral lesson, what I saw through my glasses when your papa, and uncles, and aunts were little, like you."

As soon as dinner was over, Edith said, "Will you come and tell me now, granny dear, about papa and all of them, when they were little? it will be such fun!"

"Why, no, love, I cannot, to-day; you are going to the farm, you know, and you have only time to get dressed, and reach the house, as the little folks are all asked at five."

"Oh, dear, how tiresome!" said Edith, pettishly.

"Tiresome! then do you not want to go?"

"No!" answered Edith, with a little angry founce.

"Shall I write a note to Mrs. Drayson, and say my little girl feels so out of temper that she cannot join her party to-day?" said Mrs. Everley, mildly.

Edith made no answer; but her pretty, rosy lips were pouted out, her brow knit, and her handkerchief was twisted into a rope by the little angry fingers, which seemed as though they must vent their anger on something.

Grandmamma took from the basket her spectacles, and, putting them on, looked for some moments fixedly at the child; and then she said—

"Edith, I will tell you what I see now through my glasses. I see a little fair face, disfigured by an angry, petulant temper; a little heart, in which God has placed the sweet spirits of Love, and Trust, and Hope, admitting as guests the evil spirits of Self-will, Passion, and Perversity, which in time will drive out those gentler spirits, and make their abode in that poor little heart, to the endless wretchedness of its little owner. Do not let them do so, my child; go and be dressed, and then come and kiss granny; and take to your party the little bright face I am accustomed to see."

Ashamed of her ill-humour, and yet feeling some difficulty in overcoming it, Edith ran out of the room without a word, and went up into her own. Hannah was there waiting to dress her.

Surprised at the flushed and angry face of the little girl, she asked what was the matter.

"Nothing," said Edith, flinging herself into a chair, "but I don't want to go to the party; I hate parties, I hate syllabub. What's one got to do there but to sit on the stupid old hay, and be smothered in it by a lot of rough boys? I hate it!"

"Not like parties! not like romping in the hay! Oh, Miss Edith! which of them enjoyed themselves as much as you last time?"

"I did not—I did not, Hannah!"

"Oh, Miss Edie, dear, Miss Edie! if grandmamma's spectacles were on now, what would she see?"

"She has had them on—the nasty things! and that made me crosser. I wasn't half cross, till she said she could see all sorts of nasty things through them; I hate them, I do!" and rushing to the bed, she was about to hide her face amongst the clothes, as was her custom in her little fits of anger, when she caught sight of the sweetest little hat laid beside her dress and jacket, ready for her to wear.

She stopped suddenly, and looked at Hannah, who was smilingly watching her.

"Where did that come from?" she asked.

"Grandmamma saw through her spectacles that your hat was too shabby for a party, missy," said Hannah, "so she has bought you that."

"Oh, how nice! I must run and thank her."

"Wait, and let me dress you first."

Edith was about to say, "no," but she thought better of it, let Hannah dress her quietly, and then flew down-stairs, to kiss and thank grandmamma.

"Ah! that is well, my darling," said Mrs. Everley; "now go and join your party, making a resolution to govern that temper, which my troublesome glasses," she added, smiling, "magnify into an evil passion, which may wreck my little grandchild's happiness here and hereafter; and, to-morrow I will tell you about my children, when they were little."

Away went the little girl, after again affectionately kissing her grandmamma, and in an hour she was amongst the gayest of the gay at the party, rolling in the hay, dancing, laughing, and singing, forgetting the little cloud which had passed over her, and looking forward to the tales grandmamma was to tell her with as much pleasure as, I trust, my little readers are looking forward to the next number of THE QUIVER.

THE BIVVER

— Saturday, September 28, 1867. —

(Drawn by C. J. STANILAND.)

"She shall be as one of our own children, John."—p. 13.

UNDER THE ELMS.—II.

MANY weeks elapsed before John Milward again appeared in Ockley, and when the neighbours saw him once more, they knew that they saw an altered man. He was every day and all day in the office now, at hard, unflinching work, thriftily seeing to his business, and managing his affairs. Every one had sympathy and pity for him. The rector's wife took the poor little stranger, whose arrival had been so unwelcome, and into such a scene of misery, and promised to be to her that mother whom she had lost.

"She shall be as one of our own children, John," she had said to him, and he had let her take the little thing away without a word; not that he was ungrateful, or failed to realise the kindness, but he could not speak of these things now.

Who that had seen him as he stood in the little churchyard, watching the rude dust and ashes flung upon that dust that was dear to him as his own life—who could have thought that there were greater miseries still in store, and that darker days—much darker days—were to come upon him yet? For had he not now the sympathy of all? Did not every one of those who thronged round the grave show, as plainly as sad faces, and the assurance of a look can show, that they had pity for him in this his great sorrow?

As if as a respite from the cares that were upon him, he now gave himself up utterly to his business. The routine work of the past year, with its day of toil succeeded by the rest and pleasure of the evening, was as a thing of the past—a dream that had vanished. The old, hard, unflinching work was his lot now.

Mr. Bellamy had an assistant now, and the two clerks could scarce get through the business which John's resolute industry attracted to him. Those Saturday nights at the parsonage became fewer and fewer, and at last almost ceased. In their stead came the struggle after increased connections and agencies, whose importance would have before kept him aloof. He worked hard, and would give to those who worked with him no opportunities of idleness, or even of rest, which he denied to himself. Every one was talking now (for in Ockley the folk were always in a sort of conversational turmoil) about the heavy business he was doing, engrossing it from all quarters to himself, and the amount of money which he must have been making was fixed at a sum fabulous indeed for a little country town. Unfortunately, talk did not end here, and those gossips at Ockley had something more to tell of besides mere industry and its rewards. Sad news this was to all his friends, and even those who most fed upon scandal would have wished this tale could have been told of any other.

"But do you think he can be guilty?" said poor Mrs. Seymour, who had been out in the village, and heard it all for the first time. "Tom, surely he cannot be guilty." She could not join in the town-talk, and had at once, then and there, scouted the whole thing as untrue, and not to be entertained for a moment; but when she came home, and thought how he had absented himself from them, her heart misgave her.

"Tom," she said, "surely he cannot be guilty."

"We have no right to assume that he is, my dear," said her husband; "we mustn't assume that he is."

"But, Tom, every one condemns him, even Mrs. Sutcliffe is down upon him; I met her to-day at the Morley's, and she says that it must all come out soon; that Mr. Rivers insists that he never signed the bill at all, and that it's a forgery."

"Yes, my dear, the whole truth will be known soon."

She knew, from the way he said it, what he thought was the truth, and this grieved her more.

"Tom," she said at last, "if John has quarrelled with us, even though it is his own fault, we ought to forget it now. We are his oldest friends here, and when he's in trouble we should not pass him by. The whole truth will be known soon, you say, and then he will not want our help, or, or—we may not be able to give it to him." And then she reminded him how kind John had been to her when she came, a stranger, into the place; and she spoke of poor Mary, too, and brought in from the next room her little child, which they had adopted, and she and the little unconscious infant pleaded with him there, each in her several way, till he could resist no longer, but yielded, and was won over. Then she walked with him down the lawn to the gate, warning him all the way to speak gently and kindly to his old friend. She needed not have done it, for what she had said already had awakened all the old feelings of friendship.

Now, while all this scene was going on, John sat in the little arbour, looking down the two tree-avenues at the church and the parsonage. It was not his wont to come here, or to come anywhere, at this hour; but he had left his house this evening, and closed the door behind him for the last time, and he was flying from the place which had witnessed all his pleasures and happiness, before judgment and condemnation should come upon him. Passing up the walk for the last time, hurriedly, and with his face askance from the passers-by, he stopped at the little path into the arbour, and a better impulse tempted him to visit it too. From it he could see the grounds of the parsonage and the avenue leading to the gate; and, as he watched, the door of the house opened, and Tom Seymour walked down the lawn, his wife talking to him the whole time, and stopping him with some last words, even at the gate. He saw his old friend coming towards him under the trees, and he left the arbour and wandered into the wood, dreading such a meeting. But when the clergyman had passed he returned to his seat, and once more his eyes rested sadly upon the parsonage, containing all which remained to him of that dream of his past life. He looked at it long and thoughtfully, and then left the harbour, and skirted along the trees till he reached the garden gate; he passed up the avenue and through the open door into the hall. He hesitated to turn the handle of the dining-room door, and walk in. Many months had passed since last he was in that house, where once he was a daily visitor. He had wronged the owner of it; he had wronged him and quarrelled with him, and yet, day after day, he was taking the greatest of all kindnesses at his hands. He dared not to face him. But then he thought of Grace; how soft and kind she had been to him in his sorrow and bereavement! and, thinking of all this, he turned the handle, and walked in. He found the room empty—no one in it; but he could hear voices from the next room, for the nursery door was half open, and he sat down and listened.

How well he knew her soft and gentle voice! and, hearing it, and the words she spoke, what a picture came before his mind!—a picture so vivid and so touching, that he rose from his chair, and pushing open the door, peeped in. She was bending over the cot in which the child lay—bending very low, so as almost to touch it, and the little thing put out its hand and caught at her hair, and dragged it in its little fingers, till her long black tresses fell over its face. Then she caught up the little child and hugged it closely to her, and danced it up into the air till it screamed with shrill delight; while her own face lit up and shone out through the long hair that was tossed and scattered over it. "For she's my own little daughter—my own little daughter, and papa's coming to see her to-night. Father's been a very naughty father, and has not come to her for a long time—oh, for such a long time! But he'll come to-night—father'll come and see her to-night."

This was the sight he saw—these were the words he heard; and, with these words ringing in his ears, he slunk out of the house and fled from the place, a guilty and miserable man.

* * * * *

So much of my tale I have put together baldly, hinting at what has taken place, rather than telling it, because all that you have heard happened a long time ago—full nineteen years ago.

Nineteen years, then, have passed over our heads, and here we are back at Ockley. How changed the place is! it's twice as big and three times as busy. This is the railway station, the branch line through Ockley Vale has been opened these two years, and half a dozen trains go and come from London daily.

"What's the bell for, porter?"

"Seven-five up train due, sir." And here, in fact, it comes! looming along through the tunnel.

The passengers for Ockley-on-the-Hill jump out and claim their luggage. They are not very many in number, and we have no difficulty in singling out the one who has interest for us. Time, that is at its silent work with all, has dealt gently with him;—only the grey hairs have become white, and the lines are deeper in the face, and the steady, determined mien and walk are gone. He has come back a sadder man and a better. He looks with a kind of wonder on the porter who piles his luggage on the cab; and when the man asks the direction, he hesitates a little.

"Jordan and Ivatt's Hotel," he says, at last; "drive to Jordan and Ivatt's Hotel."

The man looks confused; but the porter shouts out, "The Old Bath Hotel," and tells the traveller that Jordan and Ivatt have retired these ten years, and the hotel is now managed by Mr. Edward Carpenter. With these words the cab drives off.

So Jordan and Ivatt have retired, and the old house is now administered by Mr. Edward Carpenter. Our traveller wonders can this be the waiter he recollects there as Ned. What other changes will he see in the place? He looks eagerly from the window, but sees familiar points only from time to time. Almost everything has a strange face for him; not now, though, for he's in his own street, and, in fact, here's the hotel—just the same place as ever.

The best of plain dinners is served to him in that private room; and after it, he sends for his host, Mr. Edward Carpenter, that he may have a little talk with him. The quondam Ned is delighted to come, and freely pours forth to the stranger all the gossip of the town.

"And indeed, sir, you seem to know the place very well;" but the traveller explains to him that he had a friend who belonged to the town a long time ago—twenty years or more—and who was always talking of it to him; after this he goes on with his questions.

Ned has a great deal to tell him. The old Earl of Doublegloster is dead, died unmarried; and there was a sale up at Cheddar Castle last week. Dr. Brougham bought most of the pictures. The old doctor's alive still, and doing a great practice: he tires a pair of horses every day.

"And the rector?" the stranger asks, timidly.

"Right well, sir, right well. He was put out a bit at first about Mr. Henry's marriage; but it's all settled now, and that's Mrs. Seymour's doing: she managed it."

"And whom is he going to be married to?"

"That's where it is, sir. Mr. Henry, he's a most fit to marry any one, showering his money about everywhere, as if he had lots of it. And Miss Mary's nice too—nice and nice looking; but they can't live on their looks, you know.

"But who's Mr. Henry in love with?"

"There you have me again, sir, for not one of us knows very well who she is. Some says she's a cousin of Mrs. Seymour's; and then there's others say she's a daughter of old Milward, the attorney, who ran away from this twenty years ago; and more's the pity there should be anything against her, for she's as good as gold. At first there was terrible work to break it off; but it's all settled now, and they're to be married in the morning."

Much more did the landlord of the "Old Bath Hotel," say,—many things about many persons; but he had lost his listener. John sat silent and let him go on, till he stopped himself; and then let him go away. And when at length the room was cleared, and the door locked to keep off all intrusion, he paced up and down, turning over in his own mind the bitterest of all thoughts. This, then, was the promised end; this was the day to which he had been looking forward for so many years. In that far-away country, where he had lived an honourable life, cancelling, as he believed, by acts of charity and hours of repentance the bitter past, restoring fourfold aught he had taken from any man by false accusation—in that distant country he had thought that all the happiness of his life might be collected into the single day when he would return to his own town and his own family: and now the day had come, and the first stranger he met had to tell him of "old Milward, the attorney, who ran away twenty years ago."

So, full of all these thoughts, hard and stern as they were, he left the hotel, and wandered about through the streets. Every house that he passed was familiar with those years that he had never forgotten, and woke up for him some fresh association; and then he looked curiously at the new quarter of the town—parts that had been planned and built while he was away, till at last, and quite unexpectedly, he came upon the old church. It seemed to him more insignificant than he ever thought it before, and quite depressed by the weight of ivy that clung to it and hung from every part of it; but there was the fine avenue of trees as grand as ever.

How many strange remembrances came crowding in upon him, as once again he walked under their shade; how many trifling incidents that could scarcely have found a halting-place in his memory were fresh now as when they first happened! So that it was more instinct than intention that made him turn off from the main road and find his way into the arbour. He looked down the side avenue, and saw the old parsonage, with its gardens and grounds just as he had left them. Soon the half-closed door was thrown wide open, and he strained his eyes, watching the crowd of people that came out from the drawing-room and wandered over the garden. He tried to single out from them the two or three whom he would have gladly seen; but the distance was great, and his sight was not as keen now as it had been twenty years ago, the last time he had looked from the same place. As he sat there, with this view before him, he tried to collect his thoughts and think over his plans for the future. He had come out full of wrath and bitterness, but, somehow, the old things that surrounded him softened and abated all his anger. He would not remain longer in the place; he would not, by his presence, throw any shade over his daughter's happiness, nor disturb the peace of the rector by coming forward and asserting his forgotten relationship. The selfish happiness, which he had looked forward to as a dream, must pass as a dream from him. He would leave the place to-night—no, not to-night; he must see her somehow, and the husband who was to be hers till death should part them; after that, he would go away—anywhere, it mattered not where; but she must nevertheless be the richest heiress round Ockley; in that, at least, he must not be disappointed. This all settled, he returned to the hotel.

Next day came with great importance for the village. Every wedding was a festival day at Ockley; but there had been so much wondering at and talking over, and assertion, and repetition, and contradiction about this wedding, that when the day actually came, it was quite a red-letter day. Never had the church looked so small, or so insufficient to the crowd that thronged about, and never was a crowd so friendly—for, indeed, they were all friends, and had come upon a friendly mission.

The rector was there, of course, standing within the rails and reading out the service; he has aged greatly since we saw him last, and the years have left their marks, deepening the lines in his face; but Mrs. Seymour is very little altered—only the grey hairs have given way to the white ones; her glance is still as warm and assuring as ever. And not only the rector and his wife, but all our old friends have assembled for this occasion; the doctor's brougham is waiting outside for him at the church door, and his coachman has got a little boy to hold the horse, and is himself watching the ceremony, safe from being seen, up in the organ-loft; and there, I declare to you, in one of the state pews, is our old—our very old friend, Miss Griffiths, who has not missed a wedding at Ockley these many years.

But all this time the wedding has been going on, and the bride and bridegroom, kneeling side by side, have answered or repeated the solemn words of the minister, and now they all rise to pass into the vestry-room, where their names will appear different for the last time. The people swayed and thronged up the aisle to get a view of the procession as it passed; they were a good-humoured crowd, and bore the crushing, and even made room for an old man who was amongst them, and seemed more eager than any of them. He forced his way to the very front row, and stood there for a moment looking at the group; then, stick in hand, he crossed the little chancel of the church, and passed through the knot of bridesmaids and wedding guests till he came to the bride and bridegroom, and spoke to them.

"I am an old man," he said, "and a stranger to these parts, and I am here to give you both my blessing;" and he took the bridegroom, who seemed a little embarrassed, by the hand. "Don't mind my being a stranger," he said to him: "the blessing of an old man never did the young any harm;" and then he put out his hand to the bride, but it trembled when she took it in hers, and his voice faltered and would not give out his words, and holding her hand still in his, he looked down upon the ground, as if his purpose were all gone; then, in a few soft words, she thanked him, but he, when he heard the voice, started and looked up, and saw her face now for the first time, and the words came to him quickly enough, for he saw her blue eyes wistfully looking up to him through the bridal veil, and for a moment she seemed to him as his own wife, whom he had led from this very altar, full of hope and youth, twenty long years ago. The words came to him very quick now, so that he dreaded to speak them out, and the tears gathered fast, but he caught her in his arms and kissed her, lest he should spoil her happiness with the one word "daughter!" then he returned into the crowd, and, wondering, it made way for him, and so he passed out of the church.

They would have forgiven him, would frankly have forgiven him all; they would have welcomed him back to Ockley, and have made the day of his return a holiday through the whole town—but this was not to be. He had to learn the bitter truth, that neither man's repentance nor man's forgiveness can cancel a past act; they might pardon and he might grieve, but justice and judgment belong not to man but unto thee, O Lord, to whom also belongeth mercy.

W. L. W.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

"Go, and do thou likewise."—Luke x. 37.

HE parable of the Good Samaritan arose out of a question put to our Lord by one who was professionally engaged in the study and interpretation of the law of Moses. "A certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him." It seems that he had some insidious design in making this inquiry. We know that the Lord was frequently beset by captious cavillers, eager to make out some charge against him: thus the Sadducees made their strange inquiry about domestic relationships in the world to come; and the Herodians put a question about paying the tribute money. Still, there was nothing to awaken offensive suspicion in this man's question. He may only have desired to bring forward a most important subject, to see how the Lord would deal with it.

Be the motive what it may, it is a question of life and death, demanding the most solemn consideration of every man, woman, and child. "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" With what weight of meaning every word falls upon the ear! Yet, momentous as it is, how very few ever put the question in serious earnestness to themselves. Ten thousand other questions, public and private, agitate and absorb men's minds—questions of successful labour, realising wealth, or fraud, or sloth, or dulness, ending in poverty and shame, questions of all kinds are suggested by pride or pleasure, by envy, or ambition—these things are discussed every day with persevering avidity; but this question which relates to the soul, and its interest in the world to come—how sins are to be pardoned—how the sinner can stand in conscious safety before God in the last great day—by what means he can secure a good hope when life's vain dream shall end—to this great question, how few give any serious consideration! It is laid aside as a gloomy and unwelcome intrusion disturbing more congenial thoughts. "If we must think of it," say they, "at least, let us put it off till the time when sickness, and graves, and funerals, and such like repulsive things, can be no longer forgotten." But do not you, reader, incur the peril of such neglect. If life, slowly but surely, is leading us to death,—if the busy stream of this world will soon be merged into the vortex of the next,—if the broad road is thronged with the unforgiven and the careless, and if men that live without Christ must die without hope—then, as you value the soul, as you desire peace with God when you die, and bright hopes when death is over, let nothing hinder you from putting the lawyer's question to your own heart, "What must I do to inherit eternal life?"

Mark the Lord's answer. Had the man been awakened to know his own condition of guilt before God, the Lord would, at once, have revealed him—self as the way of life and peace. But this lawyer, like the young ruler in another chapter, had no such conviction of sin. The Lord directed both of them therefore to the law, that by the law they might gain the knowledge of sin. "The law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ." "Jesus saith unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou?"—Thou knowest the law, ceremonial and political, which Moses gave to Israel, for thy business is to teach it; thou knowest all the six hundred and thirteen different commandments the law contains; thou knowest the ten great precepts of the moral law—but, give me its spirit and meaning: say, what is the sum and substance of the whole? What are the commandments, which if a man will obey he shall obtain eternal life? "What is written in the law? how readest thou?"

Many of my readers are habitually studying the Bible. Question yourselves about its spirit and meaning: what is written, and how you are reading? Ask yourself to give an account of some portion you have just read—give the substance—repeat distinctly the leading points of instruction which the chapter contains. What—what is written in the law? And ask, too, the Lord's question: How readest thou? Some people read the Scriptures ignorantly; some read them negligently; some read them sceptically; and some read them, like the Ethiopian treasurer, that they may there find the way of salvation; but, how readest thou?

This man had evidently read the moral law with an intelligent insight into its meaning. He could lay his finger distinctly upon its great aims and obligations. He saw clearly that love is the fulfilling of the law; that a man's supreme love to God is the sum of the first table, and love to his fellow-man is the sum of the second. "And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself." He learned this summary of duty out of the moral law. He knew more about his duty to God and man than all the wise philosophers of Athens, or Alexandria, or Rome. Our Lord commended his knowledge and discernment of truth: "Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live." Go, and put thy knowledge into practice; love the Lord thy God supremely as thou hast said; love thy neighbour as thyself; and thou shalt inherit the kingdom of heaven.

Perhaps he perceived already the drift of the Lord's inquiry, and was willing to clear himself. He felt anxious to put himself right with the Lord in this matter. He repelled any suspicion that he had not kept the law—"As to the first table, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' of course I love him; and as to loving my neighbour as myself, I love those whom I ought to love. No man thinks he is to love every one. There must be some limitation. There are persons whom I ought to love as I love myself: tell me who they are, and my love to them shall not be wanting. I acknowledge that I am bound to love my neighbour; but the question I want to know is this, 'Who is my neighbour?'"

Now here we see that in his answer the Lord rather met the scribe's thoughts than the words of his question. The Lord did not immediately tell him who his neighbour was; he does not point out the particular man whom he ought to love, but he turns his thoughts to the love which he is bound to cherish. He leaves out the specific instance, and speaks about the principle within. The true love of your neighbour is not an act towards certain individuals, or a thing of outside circumstances; but it is a principle of benevolence ever reigning in the heart. I do not say that this man or that is your neighbour, but I bid you see that you have the love, and compassion, and readiness to do good actively ruling in the breast, and you will soon find who the neighbour is on whom you may expend your love. "You ask who is your neighbour. I will show you a man, that loved his fellow-creatures as he ought to love. Give me attention, and I will describe his character. In the emergencies of life set this man's example before you; consider him well; receive the instruction he is meant to give, then go, and do likewise."

These are the circumstances: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves." We know nothing of his rank or nation, or character. That was purposely left out. He was a man, and as such, had a claim upon the sympathy and aid of his brother man. The road along which he was journeying was as celebrated for its insecurity to travellers, as for the beauty of its scenery. It was infested by highwaymen. A gang of these brigands fell upon the solitary man. Not content with plundering him of all his property, and even stripping off his clothing, they treat him with such merciless barbarity that he is almost killed. Lying on the roadside already half dead, they leave him to his fate, and make off with the booty. As the traveller lay there faint and bleeding, "by chance there came down a certain priest that way." The translation, "chance," is incorrect and objectionable. Nothing occurs by chance. It was not chance, but the coincidence of providential events, that led "a certain priest to go down that way," just as the wounded wayfarer lay expiring by the roadside. It was his golden opportunity for doing good. Providence laid before him that special conjunction of circumstances, whereby he might show that he loved his neighbour as himself. But he lost his opportunity.

He was returning from Jerusalem. Clad in priestly vestments, he had been engaged in the sacred offices of the Temple, offering the sacrifice, diffusing fragrant incense, conducting the worship of the people; and now, his sacerdotal offices discharged, he is returning homeward to Jericho. He was exactly rubrical in the performance of official duties; but, of justice, mercy, and faith—the weightier matters of the law—he took no cognisance. To lessen human misery formed, in his estimation, no part of his sacred calling. God will have mercy, and not sacrifice; this priest will have sacrifice, but not mercy. Of all the varied forms that hypocrisy loves to assume, that is the most flagrant and repulsive which conceals a cold, unsympathising heart under the garb and sacredness of religion. It is hateful even to man, but infinitely more offensive to the Most High. “To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord: I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats. Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and the Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. These things I delight in, saith the Lord God.”

“And by chance there came down a certain priest that way: and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side.” Attracted, as it seems, by some groans of distress, the Levite crossed half over the road, saw some one lying there who had been plundered, and ill-treated, then turned away, “and passed by on the other side.” Perhaps the Levite had observed that the priest went straight on, without even stopping to notice the dying man; and the thought occurred to him, “If my superior passes on, why should I delay and concern myself about a dying man?” Men seldom want a precedent to sanction their ungenerous neglects. Selfishness easily creates converts. The example of another’s indifference soon quenches the glow of sympathy. The Levite, prompted by generous impulse, crossed half-way over, and just looked on. But his heart rebuked his eyes. On second thought, he crossed back again, and passed by on the other side. If there had been an ox or an ass helplessly prostrate under its burden, he would have rendered immediate help; but here lies a man—a neighbour, a brother man, of like sympathies with themselves, and yet these two ecclesiastics, just returning from their sacred offices, can hear the expiring groans, can see him gasping for his last breath, and not move a finger to abate his suffering or save his life.

Do you ask, “And who is my neighbour?” Look there! See that man dying of wounds, and fever, and neglect. Does your creed recognise the duty of caring for your brother man? Then show it; here is your opportunity. If your bosom glows with any generous feeling, ask not who is your neighbour; the stern events of life will teach you who your neighbour is, and where he lies. See him there, on that highway, helpless and sinking. Go up to him, feel for him, as every man ought to feel for his brother man. Do him the kindness he needs—act the part of a loving neighbour to that suffering man. Do not, like the priest, just glance and then pass by; do not, like the Levite, glance and approach two steps nearer, and still pass by. Here, in this world, you may pass him by; but know this—he will lie right across your path, and bear his testimony against you, in the world to come.

“But a certain Samaritan”—I can imagine the altered countenance of the scribe, as soon as our Lord uttered the hated name, Samaritan. Aliens in blood, aliens in language, aliens in religion, the Samaritan hated the Jew as much as the Jew hated the Samaritan. “But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was.” The priest hardly looked at the wounded traveller, the Levite looked and came partly towards him; but the Samaritan went right up to him—looked, examined, felt for him. Stranger as this traveller is, and alien, still, he is a man—has the wants and feelings of a man; his countenance is wrung with anguish; his looks implore pity; his upraised hand feebly beckons for help. Nor does he ask in vain. With good men, sympathy is ever stronger than prejudice. Samaritan though he was, “he had compassion.” His heart bore sway. Forgetting all antipathies, regardless of the business on which he was journeying, heedless of robbers who might attack him too, he came to the spot where the traveller lay, stooped down to examine, closed his gaping wounds, stopped the bleeding, soothed the pain, bandaged his wounded limbs, and, when sufficiently revived, raised up the fainting sufferer, placed him upon his own beast, and walked carefully by his side until he had brought him to an inn.

Nor did he leave him even then, but remained all night watchfully ministering to his wants; and “on the morrow,” when duty required him to pursue his journey, he still commended the sufferer to the special care of the innkeeper, and with liberal hand engages to meet any further charges to be incurred during his absence.

Fixing his eye with indescribable meaning upon the scribe, the Lord appealed to his own judgment: "Which now of these three—the priest, Levite, and Samaritan—thinkest thou, acted the neighbour to him? . . . Which of them showed the love; which of them did to that suffering traveller what he would like another to do towards him?" Unwilling to let the name Samaritan pass through his lips, still the scribe's conscience dictated the right answer: "He that had mercy upon him." The priest and the Levite acted not the neighbour's part; they left the man to die. With breathless haste they hurried home, and told of their marvellous escape; how they had actually seen some poor traveller lying on the roadside, stripped and plundered, and apparently in the agonies of death; and how fortunately, fleeing with the utmost speed, they escaped the perils of those mountain passes. They were not his neighbours. But this stranger—Samaritan though he was—he that denied himself that he might do good to a brother in need; he that loved him with a generous heart, that soothed his sufferings, dressed his wounds, and saved his life—this is the one who was "neighbour to him that fell among thieves."

"Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise." Be this the spirit in which thou shalt spend thy life. Cherish in thy bosom love like his. Go where thou wilt, and thou shalt find "neighbours" everywhere, lying among the straitnesses and perils of life, who need thy compassionate attention. Copy this Samaritan. Let thine heart tenderly sympathise with the distressed; thy will be fixed in resolute self-denial; be unwearied in thy acts of kindness; thy benevolence large-hearted; engage others to help, while thou sparest not thyself in trouble or expense; think of this Samaritan, what he felt, and did, and gave; and then, wherever suffering abounds, and help is needed—go, with a heart and hand like his—"Go, and do thou likewise."

Instructive as this parable is to teach the obligation of Christian benevolence towards the needy and distressed, yet we are admonished by almost all Scripture interpreters that this parable yields some grapes of still richer flavour, which it were well for us to stay one moment and taste. At any rate, the parallel is instructive.

For in the pitiable and perilous condition of this wounded traveller, we see a vivid portraiture of the whole human race after the Fall; and, as the man in the parable fell among thieves, who plundered and stripped him, and left him to die of his wounds, so here are we reminded of the robbery far more ruinous, wounds more grievous, and destitution more shameful, inflicted upon our fallen nature by him who was a "murderer from the beginning." In the treatment of that traveller we see the wounds and despoilment of sin, for every sin is a deep gash, from which the life-blood of the soul is fast ebbing away. And, altogether, in the plight of that traveller—lying by the roadside, weltering in pools of blood, and heaving the convulsive sighs of death—I see an emblem of man, as sin and Satan left him, wounded, and without strength and ready to perish.

And the helplessness of the sinner is here depicted. Priest and Levite may pass by, but they bring no deliverance. Moses brought the law; but the law, like the prophet's staff upon the face of the lifeless child, left man lifeless still. Priests, and prophets, and sacrifices were all alike powerless to bring health to the wounded, life to the dying, or salvation to the lost. "And he saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor."

But what the law could not do, nor priest, nor Levite, nor prophet, "God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in trespasses and sins," has accomplished for us. Christ came to seek and to save that which is lost. Let the world, in scorn and ignorance, say of him, if they will, "Thou art a Samaritan." If by a Samaritan, you mean One who thought of us in our low estate, when none else could or would; who left yonder heavens, came down here, and had compassion on us; who took on Him the form of a servant; came to bind up the broken-hearted, to give the oil of joy for mourning; who, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor; then, I say, beneath the emblem of this good Samaritan, and his benevolence to the dying traveller, we see the Divine Saviour himself, bringing health to the wounded, peace to the guilty, and salvation to the lost. And just as the Samaritan carried the wounded traveller, walked by his side, and carefully provided for every want, so does the Lord gather his people into his arms—lead them day by day in all tenderness—supply all their need—and never cease to remember them, but in all the changes of life, their sorrows, and perils, and fears, evermore abides with them—a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother—unchanging and unchangeable, until he has brought them safely home, and presented them to the Father, in the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy.

But the parable bears directly upon the claims of Christian benevolence. It is not enough to cast a glance of admiring approbation upon the assiduous zeal in doing good which is here so graphically depicted, but each of us, in our walk of life, is commanded to go and do likewise. A case of great and urgent need came unexpectedly before this good Samaritan. He took much personal trouble to discover the facts; he felt tenderly for the distress, which he ascertained by diligent investigation on the spot; he yielded to the spontaneous impulse of his heart; spared no trouble or time or money; did his utmost to meet the case with effectual relief; he loved his neighbour as himself. This is walking in love. He feels that cases of such suffering have a claim on his benevolent regard. The man may not be my neighbour according to the world's reckoning. He may be a stranger—a foreigner—one of different religion, an alien in heart, and language, and interest; all mutual dealings may be interdicted by custom or prejudice or dislike; be it so; still, here is a man in distress—real, genuine, undissembled distress; he may not be my neighbour, but I will be neighbour to him. He is in need, I have it in my power to help, then help I will. I cannot do much—not all I wish—but I will do all I can. I will try to bring some help to that needy and neglected sufferer lying by the world's roadside. Whether it may be some ragged child—homeless, fatherless, friendless, or, worse still, the companion of false friends, training him to crime. It may be some little girl, left, deserted on the highway of life, exposed to villany, or tempted through want to sin. It may be some widowed mother, broken in health, and hope, and spirits, crushed with care, and wasting in secret neglect. I will seek them out; I will act the neighbour to the needy, and dry some weeper's tears; I will ease some weary burden, and kindle again the bright gleam of joy in the faded eye; I will tell the guilty that there is pardon, and the depraved how he may gain the conquest over his sinful self; I will forget to indulge myself, and taste the higher joy of helping others; and thus shall I have the blessing of him that was ready to perish, and cause the widow's heart to sing for joy; yea, I shall know the blessedness of him that considereth the poor and needy, and then I shall know for my great comfort that the Lord will deliver me in time of trouble.

AN IDYL OF LABOUR.

I.

A FLUSH of ether lightens all the west,
Where amber clouds bend down to meet the plain,
Upon whose hazy margent-line they rest—
A shimmering glory, far as eye can strain.

And in the distance rise the tapering shafts
Of giant workshops, high into the air,
Where Labour plies his myriad-handed crafts, Mid pulsing steam, and beat, and roar, and whir.

And, staining the fair beauty of the heaven,
The sooty vapour rolls its cloud on high;
And, vexing the sweet silence of the even,
The labouring engine booms unceasingly.

Hark! from the turret of the old town-hall
The bells peal out a-chiming in a psalm,
And on the ear the quaint sweet measures fall
Like tongues of angels speaking in the calm

Of eventide, as in the days gone by
They spoke to holy men, when unawares
They entertained them. Oh! how soothingly
Those sweet bells bid men rest from toil and cares.

II.

Wipe off the sweat from thy brow, man,
Shake off the dust from thy clothes;
Thy day's work is over, and now, man,
Eve brings the hour of repose.

Out from the air close and steaming
With the breathing of toilers around;
Out, where the fresh breeze is teeming
With the odours of sweet pasture ground.

Where the green field, with cowslip and daisy,
Seems a carpet of silver and gold,
And the river winds, languid and lazy,
Through the meadows in many a fold.

There, bright looks are waiting to meet thee,
From faces of children, and wife;
There, glad voices ring out to greet thee—
The sunshine and music of life.

Up in thine arms with the baby,
As, crowing, he lifts his to thine;
Ah! but those tiny hands may be
Thy stay, when thy strength shall decline.

Mother and little ones gather
Round thee in love-ying strife;
Art thou not happy, O father?—
Husband, rejoice in thy wife.

The world may esteem thy lot lowly,
But manfully foil through thy time;
Labour's a mission most holy,
And duty can make life sublime.

Lift up thy head, and no fear, man,
When the lord in his chariot moves on;
The peasant, as much as the peer, man,
Is the strength of the nation and throne.

The gems on his forehead may glitter,
As he graces some pageant of state;
The sweat-beads are brighter and fitter
On thine, man, whom labour makes great.

Be loving and just to thy neighbour,
Have fear for thy Maker alone,
And know—'tis as noble to labour
As to rule from the senate or throne.

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

WILD IN THE WOODS.

PEGGY OGLIVIE, at her advanced age of ten years, was possessed of a greater amount of freedom than usually falls to the lot of girls at that, or any other, time of life. According to good Mrs. Grant, the wife of the worthy minister of the parish, she was allowed to "run wild in the woods like a little pagan." But though, to a certain extent, this was true, she was not the untaught, unkempt, uncared-for creature which the words might lead one to suppose.

Quaintly dressed in garments of wonderful material, and still more wonderful make, her appearance was yet that of a little lady. Her skirts of white dimity, and spencers of stiff brocade, were improvised by Jean out of the contents of an old wardrobe which had belonged to her grandmother, and which had the grand, primitive quality of being made to last for ever.

Jean had carefully instilled manners into her little charge, at the risk of spoiling the work of Nature, for the girl was innately graceful and gracious. The faithful nurse had also taught her to read, with the "Shorter Catechism" for a primer, and the Gospel of St. John for a lesson-book.

Both Jean and her good man, Tammas, were from beyond the hills. Gaelic was their native tongue, and they spoke English with remarkable purity, so that Jean's teaching was not that of an ordinary Scotch peasant. But, having carried her tuition up to a certain point, she could go no further, and therefore she contrived that, at the age of eight, Peggy should be sent to the parish school, under the escort of Archie and Sandie Grant, the minister's sons, who had to pass the foot of Delaube every morning on their way thither. They were two or three years older than Peggy, and being kindly laddies, with no little sisters of their own, they took freely to the part of big brothers to the shy little lady given to their charge.

But by the time she was ten, Peggy had outstripped her companions, as far as learning was concerned, and was able to lend them a helping hand at their tasks, in return for their ready championship.

The schoolmaster, a scholar himself, as the parish teachers of Scotland usually were, was a bad hand at drilling dunces, but the true scholar faréed well under his care. He could make little of Archie and Sandie Grant, except in the matter of arithmetic, and there little Peggy was almost a match for the boys. Even the terrible catechism, which brought care to the heart of the conscientious Sandie, and taught Archie to endure the lash with the fortitude of a Red Indian—if it taught him nothing else—was no trouble to her. The rhythm of its grand and musical prose got into her head, and glided off her glib little tongue, like magic.

Now, every Saturday afternoon, Archie and Sandie had to go through a rehearsal at home of all the questions learned during the week, often to the number of eighteen, and their freedom on that freest of days depended on their ability to go through the ordeal, of which the more fortunate Peggy knew nothing. She was quite at liberty to forget what she had learned, and if the meaning of much of it had crossed their minds, which it never did, it would have been well that they should forget some of the things set down there. And yet I will not say it was of no use, or, as some will have it, worse than useless. The catechism expresses the convictions of noble-minded and religious men, and the mark which it makes upon the minds of the children of Scotland is that of a body of truth to be steadfastly upheld as the background of their lives.

Except when confined at home to make up their quota of catechism, Archie and Sandie usually spent the Saturday afternoons with Peggy, in the woods round Delaube, pelting one another with fir-cones, running up and down the slippery slopes where no grass grew, but where a thick mat of pine-needles strewed the ground, and gave out their delicious scent to the tread; and finally fishing in the stream which, hidden by its wooded banks, ran eastward to the sea, at the bottom of the hill.

"Are you sure you can say them?" demanded Peggy of her companions, somewhat anxiously, as they parted at the foot of Delaube one Saturday, a little after noonday, to meet again and spend the long summer evening as was their wont.

"I'm no sure," said Sandie; "but I'll say them a' the road hame;" and with that he proceeded to smoothe out the worn pamphlet, and place it in his bonnet to shield it from the fluttering breeze, that he might con it as he walked.

The more confident Archie, who had been guilty on occasion of this same bonnet lining, reading from the book whenever he was at a loss, while he seemed to the master at his desk, to be modestly or abstractedly studying the inside of his cap, was "quite sure." He could not trust to any trick in his father's study, or his mother's parlour, besides, they were not fair game, as he considered the dominie; but he believed in letting his memory remain blank till close upon the time of the exercise, and then giving off from it a fresh impression committed to it immediately before. Sometimes his plan succeeded, but oftener it hopelessly and dismally failed.

They had made unusual preparations for a fishing expedition, and sad would be the disappointment if

Archie failed in the preliminary trial. So it was with a warning word to him that Peggy parted from her companions, calling after him, "Now, Archie! it will be all your fault if we can't go to Strathie Pool."

The afternoon sun had only just begun to slant the shadows of the fir-trees against the hill, when Peggy set out to keep her tryst. She had swallowed her dinner, which was neither more nor less than oatcake and milk, and asked her grandfather if he wanted anything.

Clear of the house and garden, the little lady flew down the hill-side by the steepest and nearest way, catching at the boles of the trees to save herself from falling, and heedless alike of hands and hair. She was all impatience, for had not Archie promised to bring a real set of fishing-tackle, rod and reel, hooks and flies included? and had not Sandie promised to make her a basket of rushes, to carry home her share of the trout they made sure of catching?

A certain point on the bank of the stream was their appointed place of meeting. Peggy reached it breathless and alone: no one was there. But that did not discourage her: she was generally first. So she dallied awhile on her own side of the water, then wandered up and down, and put her little hands, trumpet-fashion, to her mouth, as she had seen the boys do, and made the silence ring with their names. No answering shout, however, came to her listening ear; and at last she crossed the stepping-stones herself—a thing she was forbidden to do, for a false step might have landed her in a deep, whirling pool, from which she could hardly have scrambled without help on to the great smooth boulders of granite in the middle of the course.

Peggy, however, crossed in safety, climbed the opposite bank, and went on through the wood on the other side. Still her companions were not forthcoming. On she went, in her eagerness, straight on, and never heeding that the way was new to her, unlike the ways on her own side of the river—never doubting, either, that she would come out clear on the other side of the wood, as she was in the habit of doing there. Over broken ground of all kinds she skipped and scrambled, and at last, tired of running and calling at intervals, she sat down and waited what she considered a long time. Then, as she thought, she turned back toward the stepping-stones.

But the ground grew stranger to her, and there was no end to the trees, growing rank on rank as far as she could see, when she reached a knoll higher than the rest about. She had taken off her little gipsy hat and tied the ribbons together, and put it over her arm, basket-wise, filled with treasures; but now she walked slowly, and with a sense of awe, among the pillared trees, one side black in shadow, and the other red in the sunset. She was weary, but it was not that which pressed upon her heart. A new sense of the vast, the unknown, the infinite, had taken hold of her, and she sat down, sighing heavily.

CHAPTER V.

THE FOREST HOUSE.

Peggy had not sat down to cry, as many a little girl would have done. Not that she was, by any means, above crying, on occasion, but it did not occur to her to feel very miserable just then. The sharp edge of her disappointment had worn off. The beauty and stillness soothed her. She began to sing; unconsciously, because the pillared place was solemn, choosing a solemn strain—her favourite psalm set to one of the plaintive melodies of the Scottish kirk:

"The Lord's my shepherd, I'll not want,
He makes me down to lie
In pastures green; he leadeth me
The quiet waters by."

The blackbird drowned her sweet low warble with his loud clear song, and the thrush began where the blackbird left off. Her voice was lost in the sunset concert of the wood; but the light little figure could be seen against the dark background for some distance through a favourable opening in the trees, and so it came to pass that she had been seen by one who drew near in aimless curiosity, near enough to catch a few notes of her psalm.

The elderly woman who sauntered up to the tree where Peggy sat, was a great deal shyer than the child, and would have most likely sauntered past, and turned back without having courage to speak, but that Peggy rose and advanced eagerly, asking the nearest way to Delaube.

Instead of giving a direct answer to the simple question, the lady replied by asking another, in a half-startled tone: "Do you come from Delaube?"

Peggy nodded and smiled her assent.

"And what's your name?"

"Peggy Oglivie," answered the girl.

"My name is Janet Oglivie," said the lady, meekly, and as if she addressed an equal, "and I will show you if you will come with me."

The girl had no hesitation, and they turned at once in the direction from which her guide had approached. But the latter got into a flutter of excitement as she led the way, looking back every now and then to see if Peggy followed.

They soon came to a low wall, built of loose stone, overgrown with moss and grass, and overtopped by a thick screen of elder-bushes that grew within the enclosure. The trees beyond seemed to stand as thickly as in the wood, only they were of various kinds—slender birches and stunted oaks, mingling with stately pine. A wicket gate let them into a damp and obscure path, over which the elder-trees had stretched their boughs till they almost roofed it in. The air was heavy with the odour of their thick white blossoms. A sense of oppressive heaviness made itself felt about the place.

Through a high hedge into a kitchen garden, at the back an irregular mass of stone-built outhouses, Peggy was led round to the front of a house, longer and lower than Delaube, but of the same material and plainness.

"Stay here till I speak to my sister," said Miss Janet Oglivie, leaving her there, and disappearing within the house.

In a few minutes she returned, and holding out her hand to Peggy, drew her first into a square hall, and then into a long low room, darkened by the trees that grew up almost within reach of the windows. At one window, which looked westward, there was a shimmer of burning gold through the all-surrounding trees. But turning within, all was sombre and chill—wide, shining spaces of pannelled wood, straight-backed chairs, covered with black hair-cloth, set against the walls at intervals, a barren plain of shining dark mahogany in the centre—everything was hard and dark and monotonous. On the polished granite mantelshef stood a ghost-like clock, framed in a white china structure which resembled a tomb, ticking loudly in the silence. A dreary blankness of expression pervaded the apartment, or rather, it was expressionless as living death.

A lady sat in one of the windows, before a little worktable, sewing something large and white—it might have been a shroud. She had not chosen the one sunny window, but what seemed the darkest of the other three. She was dressed in black silk, and had a pale and rigid face, with eyes of steely blue, which might have played softly once, and even melted, but which were hard and fixed now. Her plentiful hair of mingled red and grey was done into three stiff bows on each side of her forehead, and behind was reared into a formidable structure, upheld by an enormous tortoiseshell comb of shining red and black.

Peggy fixed her eyes upon the point at once, till they were withdrawn by the voice of Miss Margery saying, sharply—

"So you are Peggy Oglivie." The little stranger felt herself shrinking from the keen inspection of the cold blue eyes. "And what's brought you here?" the voice went on in a harsh tone.

"Oh, Margery!" interposed Miss Janet, "she'll be both tired and hungry, for she lost her way in the wood."

"Sit down and get something to eat," said Miss Margery, stiffly.

"No, thank you," said Peggy; "I want to go home."

"Ye're no Oglivie," said the former, abruptly, (Miss Janet had left the room for some hospitable purpose): "ye'll take after your mother, doubtless."

"Jean says I'm no like my mother, for she was the bonniest leddy she ever saw."

"A bonnie leddy, indeed!" sneered the grim woman; "the less said about her the better. No, no, ye are no Oglivie," she repeated, still looking keenly at the girl, and with a dissatisfied air, as if it was a great defection from duty on Peggy's part.

There was something in the tone, which roused the girl's spirit. "I don't want to be like the Oglivies," she answered, bravely.

"And what for no, Miss Peggy?" asked the lady, secretly amused.

Gentle little Peggy hesitated a moment, from instinctive aversion to say ungentle words. But the sneer about her mother made her reply, "Because they are neither good nor bonnie."

Instead of being angry, Miss Margery relaxed into a grim smile.

"That's true," she answered, and then went on, more sternly: "The Oglivies are an ill race to come of: the judgment of God has overtaken them."

"Stop, Margery; you're frightening the bairn," said her sister, re-entering the room; "she's grown as white as a sheet."

But it was not the words of her kinswoman which had made the sensitive colour fly out of Peggy's cheeks. It was an apparition at one of the gloomy windows. A tall form crowned with a shock of red hair, from beneath which looked a weird white face, was standing there. It was the form of manhood, with the gait and gestures of infancy. He waved in one hand a flag of paper, and with the other grasped the window-sill; and seeing the strange inmate of the room, began to make the most hideous grimaces and gesticulations.

Whether from fear, or from some other instinct common to the wild, shy creatures of the wood, in an instant Peggy had shot past Miss Janet, standing in the open doorway, crossed the hall, and sped straight forward over the grass-plot, and between the trees, and out of a gate, which also happily stood open. Every faculty quickened a hundredfold, she descried a gleam of the river in the distance, and made straight for it. Instinctively she turned the right way along its banks, with the sunset flaming in her face, and reached the familiar stepping-stones, and there sat Archie and Sandie, waiting, with a philosophic patience which Peggy might well have envied.

"Where have you been, Peggy?" greeted her from both in a breath. "We were only kept in a little while. Mother came and heard me," said Archie, "before my time was up."

To all of which Peggy responded by letting fall her hat full of treasures, covering her face with her hands, and sobbing bitterly. She had not cried till she was out of the wood, but now she could not stop weeping, and the two loyal little fellows, one on each side, walked up the hill towards home with her, in silent commiseration.

CHAPTER VI.

PEGGY DEMANDS AN EXPLANATION.

JEAN's indignation knew no bounds, when she gathered from the quivering lips of her little mistress where she had been and the reception she had met with. "Ye'll never go near them again, the ill-faured (ill-favoured), hard-hearted limmers. They turned your mother away from their doors on as bleak a night as ever blew, and her in her trouble too; it's my belief her death lies at their door," she said in her heat, which was rather more than prudence warranted.

"Tell me about my mother, Jean," said Peggy, with a sudden calmness, fixing her eyes on the woman's face.

"It's very little I ken about her," answered Jean, wavering under the look, "and that little sad enough; better let it rest."

"That's just what they said," cried the girl, impatiently. "Why am I never to speak about her? Why did she die and leave me?" she went on, passionately. "You said they killed her, and if you won't tell me, I'll go to gran'father and ask all about her."

"You'll do no such thing," said Jean, in alarm; "besides, you'll vex him and make him ill, and I can tell you more than he can. So be a good lassie, and you'll hear in time."

The plea for her grandfather was a bit of domestic diplomacy on the part of Jean. There was something in the permanent affliction and helplessness of the man which appealed to the forbearance of the girl, and had done so from her earliest years. So she returned to the attack on Jean.

And Jean pacified her with an account of her mother's illness and death, in which there were discrepancies for the girl to ponder; gaps in the little history, on which she meditated till Jean was called upon to answer the awkward questions which would fill them up. And what with the sadness of the tale, and the mystery which hung about it, a shade of dreaminess came to sober the natural vivacity of the girl, and to give her more and more of the odd feeling she so well described as "walking in a story."

As time went on, Jean had been obliged to fill up most of these gaps in her narrative, and to linger on the details in order to satisfy the girl's craving for some knowledge of her unknown mother, and, in truth, to gratify herself when she was no longer in fear of its doing harm, and considered Peggy of an age to understand.

But for this lingering, the story was a very brief one. It was simply that at the darkening of a cold spring day, when the bitter east wind was blowing, and the house was shut for the night, when Tammas and Jean were sitting down to their supper of porridge and milk, a tap came to the door, too distinct to be mistaken for the wind. It was at the kitchen entrance, which looked down into the wood, just then sounding like a sea in the roar of the blast. On opening the door, Jean had found a countryman, bearing a box on his shoulders with one hand, and with the other trying to support a woman, who had sunk down evidently in a fainting condition. The man said he hoped they had come to the right place at last. The young woman wanted Mr. Louis Oglivie, but at any rate he would take her no further that night, as it would be nothing short of murder. His cart was at the foot of the hill, and he had toiled up with her and her box, and meant to leave them there. She had wanted to be taken to Mr. Oglivie's, and did not seem quite to know where; so he had taken her to "The Forest House," because there were ladies there; and she had told her story, whatever it was, the man said, and been sent away. He had lifted her into the cart again, thinking she would die every minute; and, as, he did not want to have a dead woman on his hands, they had better take her in.

During this explanation, they had carried her between them into the warm kitchen and laid her before the fire, all glowing with red-hot peat, and the flame of the pine-sticks, which Tammas threw on from time to time. When she "came to herself," as Jean expressed it, she had strength enough left to tell them the claim she had on the house, as the wife of Louis Oglivie, and to plead, not for her own sake, for she seemed past caring what became of herself, but for the sake of her unborn child, that she might stay under the roof which her husband had promised should shelter her. "She was the bonniest creature I ever saw," Jean always said at this point, "and the look in her een would have melted the heart of a stone."

Then Jean, in fear and trembling, had gone to Mr. Gilbert Oglivie, to tell him what had happened, and, in the meantime the countryman had taken an unceremonious leave.

"He was never a hard man with women, Gilbert Oglivie," Jean would go on to say, half to herself, "and he neither answered good nor bad when I told him how his son's wife had come home; and when I asked, 'What am I to do with her?' he only said, 'Make her as comfortable as you can.' Poor man! his trouble was new to him then, and I was feared to tell him; but I needn't hae been, for he was aye good to women folk."

Then Jean had sent Tammas trudging three good miles for the doctor, and he had not been in the house half an hour, after driving hot haste in his gig before the baby was born. And the mother lived through it, and would have lived, Jean asserted, but for the chill at her heart. Jean believed that she died of not wishing to live. "Mr. Louis did not mean to forsake her like that," she would say, but his regiment had been ordered to Ireland some months before, and he had left her behind, promising to prepare for her reception at his father's house. He was always for leaving things to chance, especially when he was at a distance; always averse to doing what was disagreeable to himself, or anybody else, if he was in immediate contact with the person who had to suffer.

He had failed to send money—"his pretty Peggy could get all she wanted for a time in his name, without money." He had failed to write to his father—"people would take care of her, if it came to the worst." He would run down and take her to his home." Such was the infirm purpose, the shallow heart, the selfishly indulgent nature of the man.

And the tender trust of the girlish wife was shaken, so deeply shaken, that even had she lived it must have died. Yet if she had survived her sorrow, much might have been changed for the better in the career, if not in the character, of Louis Oglivie. She would have risen up, strengthened herself, to support and strengthen him. During the few days she lived she had made this impression on the hard-headed, warm-hearted Jean, so that she would often say with a sigh, "If she had lived she would have made a man of Mr. Louie." This indeed was to be doubted, seeing that Nature had not furnished the material for that purpose.

Yet the dying girl did not seem to love her husband less because of his fatal weakness, but more perhaps. Her eyes had been opened to the feebleness of the bright, facile nature of the man she had married; but her heart yearned over that feebleness as it might over the weakness and helplessness of an infant. She seemed to be unconscious of the help and strength that was in her, and thought, in her humility, that his child might lay stronger hold on his affections than she had been able to do, and so with her last breath she had prayed that this little one might lead him. So in those last days she opened her heart to Jean.

She had her purposes and her plans. There was her little box. She had not spent a penny that she could help since he had left her. She had stinted herself in every way, that she might not contract a single debt. She had only in extremity thrown herself upon his relations, believing, too, that he would have authorised it; but his prolonged silence and her sudden illness, together with the rough journey and harsh reception, had run the sensitive spirit too low. It is idle to say that people do not die of broken hearts; that sorrow does not kill: sorrow does kill—not as the sword or the bullet kills, but in its own way, slowly but surely sapping the foundations of life, and opening the door to the death that lies in wait for us at every turn.

Even at the last, an access of hope might have saved the poor young mother; but instead of that, hope deferred sickened her heart. No letter came from her husband. The day after her death it arrived, and fell into the hands of Gilbert Oglivie, who had till then refused to see her, and who laid it in her coffin, looking on his son's wife for the first and the last time.

"AFTER MANY DAYS."

I was a calm autumn evening—a few bright streaks in the sky showed where the sun had gone down. The birds were asleep. There was no breeze to stir the branches, or sweep the honeysuckle-wreaths against the lattices of the white cottage in the lane. Nature was at rest.

Inside the cottage all was quiet. The little serving maiden sat beside her mistress's couch: that mistress was awaiting a solemn guest—even the Angel of death.

"Bessie," she said, "is it time for the coach to come in?"

"I should think it's in the inn-yard now, ma'am," answered the servant.

Another silence; then, "Was that our gate, Bessie?"

"No, ma'am; it's only next door's."

The dying woman sighed. For ten years she had listened for a well-known step along her garden path. Now, she knew, if it came to-morrow, it would be too late. And she lay and looked at the darkening sky.

"Bessie," she said, presently, "you don't remember John?"

"Yes, a little," replied the servant; "I remember his merry ways, but I don't think I should know him."

"Ah! ten years is a long time," said the patient mother, "you were quite a child then; but I should know John,—I should know his step—his very touch on the garden-gate: I shall never hear it now."

"Mr. John will have something to be sorry for," murmured Bessie, wiping her eyes.

"I don't know," said the mother, sharply; "perhaps he's dead—perhaps he's waiting for me in heaven. We have no right to judge before we know."

"But you heard he was alive five years after he ran away, ma'am," pleaded Bessie, in self-excuse.

"May his God forgive him as his mother does," sighed the invalid. "Oh, John, my boy, my only one, why didn't you remember the days when you kneeled in your little bedgown, and followed my words as I taught you to pray? Why didn't you remember the kiss I gave you when you brought home your first prize? if you'd thought of these things, you wouldn't have left me to pine for you, and die without you!"

"It seems as if your love had been thrown away ma'am," sobbed the girl.

"No, no, Bessie," said the dying woman, speaking more calmly. "It is planted in John's heart, though it's slow to bear fruit. Still, it's there, and some day it will come up. I wonder if I shall know in heaven!"

By this time the last bright streak had faded from the sky. The mother turned her face to the wall and was silent. Bessie drew the curtains, and stole down-stairs to fetch supper. When she returned, her mistress had not stirred. She was asleep, with tears wet upon her cheeks. Yes, she was asleep, but she would wake no more!

Five years later, a glorious dawn brightened over a wide Australian plain. The thick wild vegetation rustled in the fresh morning air. A solitary wayfarer, pausing on a rising ground, thought the scene seemed as free and unsullied as was the whole world thousands of years ago, before the angel with the flaming sword guarded the gate of Eden. Not quite, though; for, on his right hand, far off, lay a long, low building, with even rows of windows; and in its neighbourhood were sundry small huts, whence rose light wreaths of smoke, showing their owners were already astir. It was a convict settlement.

Suddenly the wanderer was startled by the report of a pistol among the ferns around him, and the noise was followed by blasphemous yells of pain. A tall, athletic man, dusty and blood-stained, burst from among the bushes, followed by two others with weapons in their hands. The fugitive sank down like a wounded wild beast, and the others seized him.

"I'll not go back till you carry me," said the hunted man; "you may kill me, but I'll not go back."

"Handcuff him, and keep him here while I fetch more help," said one of the gaolers. And it was speedily done, though not without a fierce struggle. And then the convict lay on the sward, chained and helpless, his neglected wound welling forth blood with every panting breath.

The startled wanderer gazed sorrowfully on the piteous scene. He was a young man, and carried his English bloom about him, unbrowned by the suns and winds of bush-life. Where now was his dream of Eden? Yet his heart was touched by the wild despairing face of the baffled man on the ground, and he drew near, and bent over him.

"Take care," said the remaining gaoler; "he can't very well do you a mischief now, but he will if he can."

"I am not afraid," said the stranger. "My poor fellow, let me bind my handkerchief about your wounded arm."

The gaoler whistled and sauntered off.

"Don't touch me," moaned the convict; "I want to bleed to death;" and he repulsed the friendly hand.

"Nay, nay," said the other, "when you long for death, don't forget, after it comes the judgment."

"I can't help it. I must take my chance. There can't be much worse than this."

"Don't say that. While there is life in this world there is hope."

"Not for me," groaned the convict.

"Yes," said the other, "at the worst in this life we may win hope for the next. We can't be worse than the dying thief, or Mary Magdalene, and yet our Saviour's love was given to them, and they are with Him now."

"It's a long while since I've had any love," muttered the miserable man.

"Perhaps it is your own fault," said the other, gently; "but certainly One has always loved you, and that is the Lord."

"I can't believe it. Why should he love me? I don't deserve it."

"Don't you believe in any undeserved love?" asked the young man.

The convict raised his dark eyes with a strange light in them, and in a very different voice he answered, "Yes, I do." And then he dropped his face, and his whole form shook with convulsed sobs.

"Then by that undeserved love, understand His love," said the stranger, solemnly. "He longs to save you. He sees you now. His love will meet you as the forgiving father met the prodigal son. Do not disappoint him."

There was no answer but those throbbing sobs; but the young missionary understood the stormy nature with which he was dealing, and was well content. He saw the other keepers approaching, and bent down again.

"I shall pray for you. Tell me your name."

"We call him Number Twelve, and a rare bad case he is," put in the gaoler.

The chained man looked up with streaming eyes. "She called me John," he said, "that name will be enough. It's my mother I mean. She's dead now. I wonder if they in heaven know about things down here?"

"If they do," said the missionary, "let your future life add a new joy to her bliss; understand God's love by its reflection in hers."

He watched the melancholy procession till it passed under the prison archway, and then he went home.

* * * * *

Twenty years later, the sun that set over that Australian plain did not illumine a silent or barren scene. There was a little village with simple shops and neat houses; and dotted about the vicinity were snug farms with large enclosures around them. There was a good inn in the village, and a coach had just set down its passengers before it. One middle-aged gentleman amongst them, looked about him with amazement.

"Well, it is changed!" he exclaimed.

"You may say so, indeed, sir," said a cheerful farmer-like man standing near.

"No room in the house, sir," said an ostler, addressing the traveller; "all the beds are full."

"Never mind," remarked the good-natured countryman, "there's a spare room in my farmhouse, and my wife and I are simple people, like Abraham and Sarah, and we're glad of a stranger's company."

So he led the traveller down a shady lane to a great, rambling, roomy house, where he was received by a buxom dame, and regaled with a plentiful supper. And then the large rustic household came tramping in to the pleasant keeping-room, and a chapter was read and a hymn was sung.

"Your lines are fallen in pleasant places," said the traveller to his host. "It reminds me of good old times in England."

"And yet we're called 'the scum' of the old country," returned the host.

"That's only the convicts," said the traveller.

"That's a great many of us," replied the farmer.

"Do you object to employing them?" asked the guest.

"I needn't, because I am one myself," responded the host, with a grave smile.

"Well, it's a noble thing to keep right, and it's a noble thing to return to right," said the traveller. "Did you ever happen to hear anything of a man named John, who was Number Twelve in prison?"

"That's me," said the farmer.

And the two looked at each other and understood it all.

"The memory of my mother's love did it," said the farmer; "and now-a-days, I like to believe she can look down from heaven and see me." I. F.

THE QUIVER

Saturday, October 5, 1867.

(Drawn by B. BRADLEY.)

"Of course she would—what else could I expect?"—p. 34.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

IT was a bitterly cold day in January, the snow lying two feet deep, in its most abominable form of whitey-brown slush in the streets; while a piercing gale, blowing from all the four quarters of the compass at once, was bringing down fresh drifts and avalanches from the roofs and chimney-pots above.

In Pall Mall—that centre of the fashionable

West End during the London season—desolation now reigned supreme. Not a single private carriage, not an omnibus, or even a tradesman's cart, to be seen; scarcely even a stray cab would, at long intervals, pass along, slowly and heavily dragging its way, with an extra horse attached, tandem-wise, in front, struggling and floundering at every step; while there, deserted, in the middle of the street, a heavily-loaded coal-wagon stood, stuck fast, the exhausted horses of which had been, after long and unavailing struggles, unhooked and driven home by their despairing driver; and its freight—just now doubly valuable—thus left to become the spoil of chance marauders.

Though now only between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, there is no noise or sound of life to be heard—except, perhaps, that of the hoarse voices of four or five great hulking fellows, who, having assembled in the gin-shop round the corner, have, on this occasion only, assumed the character of working men. Some of them with bran-new spades, from which they have not even taken the trouble to rub off the chalk shop-marks, are now howling out the dismal, though not wholly untrue, chorus of: "Poor men are we, starving at home because we've got no work to do!" not that they ever have, or would do it, even if it were offered them.

Besides these impostors, there are not half a dozen other persons to be descried in the whole length and breadth of that, at other times, well-populated thoroughfare.

Though mark that poor shivering wretch, who creeps along, trying in vain to wrap her scanty rags more closely round her, and then, with an eager and wistful look cast round, slinks into the side-door of the afore-mentioned gin-palace, where the frozen-out gentlemen hold their headquarters, there to drown, for a time at least, the bitter pangs of cold and hunger in the draught of fatal oblivion, which she will pay for with the sixpence but now begged, with a torrent of lies, cant blessings, and protestations, from that young gentleman, who has just waded, ankle-deep, across the street, and is now standing to watch where she will go from the steps of his club.

"Of course she would," he says to himself, reproachfully; "what else could I expect? But was I not wrong and weak to give the poor wretch the means? Even while she was swearing that she wanted bread for her starving children at home, didn't I know that she was lying as I listened to her? I feel quite sure that this address, which she has given me in Westminster, is false, and indeed thought so, even while taking the trouble to write it down. I might be certain that any money I gave her would be spent in gin; and yet I gave it. My real motive was, as usual, my own selfishness and personal satisfaction, for which I have given a fellow-creature the means of her own destruction, when I ought to have had the firmness to refuse it;—and yet the poor wretch may now obtain a few hours' reprieve from her abject want and suffering; but at what a price! I am an ass, weak, and false to mine own avowed principles; and feel that I ought to be ashamed of myself."

Thus soliloquised, in severe self-reproof, the Hon. Sydney Welworth, as he stamped the snow from off his gaiters and thick shooting-boots, and passed into the spacious morning room of his club, changing the dreariness of the street, and bitterness of the climate, through which he had been struggling without, for an almost similar solitude within, though in point of atmosphere affording a striking contrast, which, in the exactly opposite extreme, was perhaps even more trying and overwhelming to the senses.

In the vast and luxuriantly-furnished saloon in which he now found himself, there was, indeed, an equally desolate aspect of empty space and unwonted silence; but the intense heat which struck him as he passed in at the door was, for the moment, almost stifling.

Already at that early hour lighted up with flaring lamps and chandeliers innumerable, while there was blazing in the huge fireplace at each end of the room a furnace, at which an ox might almost literally be roasted whole, it was not much wonder that the thermometer on the centre table should actually mark the temperature a degree or two above eighty.

The only visible inhabitants of this vast solitude were two crusty old gentlemen, who seemed either to have quarrelled, or else, never having chosen to make each other's acquaintance, had been sitting each at his own separate fireside through the whole day, without exchanging a word, dozing over the papers, or only varying the monotony of their silent existence by alternately ringing the bell, at an average of about twenty minutes' interval, for "more coals."

This was apparently the only one point of sympathy between them, unless it was when they both looked round, with a simultaneous scowl and shudder, as Sydney Welworth came in through the swing doors, bringing with him a momentary gust of fresh air, to say nothing of a moral atmosphere of beaming good humour, which seemed to have the effect of making them both look even more sour than before.

Under the impression that these two were the only inmates of this almost tropical desert, the young man was turning to the newspaper desk for the last news, when he was almost startled by a deep sigh, amounting nearly to a groan of distress, which proceeded from the further corner of the room, and he then perceived a third individual, crouched in the depths of one of the large morocco lounging-chairs, handsomely, not to say elaborately, dressed, but whose well-formed features, as he lifted up his fine face from his folded arms, in which it had been buried, betrayed an expression of despair and misery quite unmistakable, and really pitiable to look upon.

"Why, Archie, my dear fellow!" was Sydney's amazed greeting, as he recognised a friend in this most melancholy being, "what on earth has happened to you? Who would have thought of seeing you in town at this time of year? though, by the way, I suppose there will be lots of you hunting fellows coming up in a day or two, frozen out from the shires, if this awful weather is to continue. But has anything dreadful happened, that you are looking so awfully down?"

"I have given up hunting; I haven't got a horse," replied Archie Scott, with another doleful sigh. "I sent them all in to Tattersall's just before Christmas, where they sold for nothing; but it is not that that I care about."

"Well, what are you going to do with yourself, then, this winter?"

"Either cut my throat, hang, or drown myself, I haven't quite made up my mind which; my predilection was rather in favour of the latter, only, before I had quite made up my mind, the Serpentine was frozen over, so now I must wait; but I shall put myself out of my misery before long, in some way or other, for it is more than I can bear;" and the poor fellow's voice quavered, and the sides of his mouth drew down with a miserable expression of despair, as if he really meant what he said.

"Stuff, man—stuff! don't talk in that ghastly fashion, even in joke," remonstrated Sydney; "but tell me, now, really what is the matter with you, and what sort of troubles you are labouring under."

"Every sort; I tell you, I am the most miserable beast alive. I really think, sometimes, that I shall go mad, when I sit and brood over all my troubles!"

"Oh, nonsense, my dear fellow! you want change of scene. Why don't you go abroad—I know you are fond of travelling—or make a round of country visits? You have hundreds of friends, all only too glad to see you; or, at any rate, make a start somewhere and get some occupation, or, if you sit here in the dumps all day, you will soon grow into the chrysalis state of one of those old fogies by the fireplace, whose only use in this world is to be a warning and a beacon to men of our age. Why don't you go to the concert to night? I hear there is a first-rate one."

"Concert, indeed!" answered Archie, in disgust, "there is nothing in this world I hate like a concert; besides, I couldn't afford it, even if I cared to do so. I tell you that I am ruined, and a beggar! A concert, indeed! as if that could alleviate heavy trials like mine! Don't talk in that unfeeling way to a poor fellow; and as to travelling, even if I could afford that, which I cannot, I tell you, it would not do me the slightest good. I have, as you say, been all over the world, and I don't think I have ever seen anything worth remembering yet, though I am not so old as I know I look. Yet I began life very early with a fixed determination to try every pleasure and excitement that exists, and I don't think that you can easily mention any that I have not tried; and there is not one of them I should ever care to try again, even if I had the means of doing so, which I tell you, I have not, for now I am a pauper, and that has settled me. Until then, though everything else had proved rotten and unsatisfactory, there was always hope, you know, at the bottom of the cup; but now that is gone, and everything else gone with it!"

"In fact," said Sydney, hardly in as sympathising tones as he might have used, "you are, as you justly say, thoroughly blasé and used up, and seem to have outrun your income. Well, there is no doubt that is a nuisance: still, things may come right in time, and might have been worse. I thought when I saw you in such grief, there was something much worse the matter—that some near relation was dead, or——"

"Dead! I wish that was only just all that had happened," exclaimed Archie, brisking up a bit. "I have only one near relation in the world, my old uncle, Lord Trencher. He will be sixty-nine next birthday, and had nearly died, the year before last, of diphtheria; but instead of doing so, he recovered, and then married the young woman whom the doctor had recommended from the hospital to nurse him through his illness!" And here the ill-used Archie brought his fist down upon the table before him with a bang which made the lamps rattle and rock again, and so startled both the old gentlemen at their respective fire-sides, that each, springing up from his chair, rung, and ordered more coals simultaneously.

"But what has your noble uncle done, or is he going to do, for you?" inquired Sydney. "I always thought that you were declared heir to all his large estates, as well as his title."

"So I was, of course," replied the other. "The old swindler! what has he done for me, do you ask? Why, my lady very soon made him give me my congé from Trencher Castle, which I have from a boy always been brought up to look upon as my home; and now he—or rather she—has written to say that she will pay my debts, and settle an allowance of—what do you suppose upon me?—why, a beggarly £500 a-year! What is the use of such an allowance as that to me! A man cannot be expected to live upon £500 a-year, you know! But that is actually how I am left, high and dry! I have sold my horses, as I tell you; no one can hunt upon £500 a-year, you know. I never did much care for shooting; besides, I have now not an acre of land, or a cover to shoot through, so I gave both my guns to my valet, when I sent him about his business. One cannot keep a valet on £500 a-year, of course! Indeed, I cannot imagine how one can get on at all, on such an absurd pittance.

"But it is not the poverty I think so much about, as the want of occupation—an object—an interest in life: that is, you see, what my hopes and expectancies used, to a certain extent, to supply; but now they are all knocked on the head. I sold out of the army two years ago, when my regiment was last ordered to Aldershot, because with my expectations, and the just then critical state of that old fellow's health, I saw no use in going down to that horrid place, to be broiled alive in the sun, or choked with the dust, for nothing. I took that step without consulting my uncle, and he chose to take offence at my doing so; and though we did not actually quarrel on the subject, I shall always think he let that hospital nurse marry him half out of spite to me. I wish now, with all my heart, that I had stuck to soldiering, for then the parades and duty gave one a regular daily occupation—something to do; instead of which, here am I now, without means, without a home, without any interest or object in life, having nowhere to go, but mooning from my lodgings to this dreary club, or from this club back to my dreary lodgings, the most miserable and unfortunate wretch in existence!

"How any one can exist in London at this time of year I cannot imagine. Until I came myself into this dismal state, I had no idea that anybody ever did; and yet, by the way, you seem to do so, and still look jolly and happy, too, under the circumstances. But, tell me, what on earth do you find to do with yourself at this time of year, when there is no park and no one to speak to? I have noticed you several times come bustling in and out of this place, or going ahead in the street below, as if you were busy, and really enjoyed being so. I do wish, my dear fellow, you would tell me what it is, and, if I can, let me try to help you."

"Well, we will see if you really mean what you say," answered Sydney, cheerily, "and are indeed in the miserable state you describe yourself to be in. If you like to come along with me now,

I may, perhaps, be able to put you in the way of something to occupy you, at any rate, and, perhaps, even interest you enough to make you forget your troubles."

"Oh, my dear fellow, I shall indeed be grateful to you! But where am I to go with you?"

"Close by here."

"What are you going to set me to do?"

"Come and see."

"When?"

"Now, directly; as it happens, I am myself due, at four o'clock, at the very place to which, of all others, according to your own account, you need an introduction; so wrap that elaborately fur-lined coat of yours about you, and let us be off, for I ought to be there now."

Leaving the two old gentlemen to themselves, to snooze by their respective fires in peace, the two friends, making their way through the snow, across Pall Mall, and round the nearest corner of St. James's Square, in less than five minutes found themselves at the entrance of a small shop, on the doorpost of which was stuck up a board, on which was printed in large letters, "The Society for the Relief of Distress."

"Oh, really, Welworth! this is too bad of you!" exclaimed Captain Scott, relapsing into his most despondent tones, "and I don't see the fun of it. To bring any one out in this horrible weather, just for the pleasure of a stupid 'sell' like this! I do detest such practical jokes, and so I tell you, and wish you a good afternoon; but next time, if you please, choose some one else to play off your tricks upon;" and the captain was walking off in high dudgeon.

"Nonsense," said Sydney; "I am playing no joke, I tell you. This is the place where you will find exactly what you want, if you will only trust me as a friend, and come up. You tell me that you are in distress, and I have brought you to a place where, I know, you will find relief."

"Yes, I am in distress, sure enough; but, though I am, so to speak, ruined, and a beggar, in comparison to what I was, and always had looked to be, still, one cannot come and apply, like a regular mendicant pauper, at a charitable institution like this, when one has £500 a-year you know: though, of course, it is such an absurdly small sum to talk about living upon."

"Well, never mind that," said Sydney, "you can but come up and see what they can do for you."

"Why, we should only find a set of old fellows, with long faces and white chokers, who will think we have gone up on purpose to chaff them, and very likely give us in charge to the police. I don't mind fun sometimes, when I am in my proper spirits, but, as I tell you, I hate practical joking; it's low, and not gentlemanly, in my opinion."

"Only just come and see. You will probably find some old acquaintances of your own up there; and I will promise you that there shall be no long faces amongst them."

"Why, is it not a Jew's," inquired Archie, suddenly jumping at a new conclusion, "who lends money to the distressed? Is it? I never have yet been driven to that sort of thing; though, reduced to the penury I now am, there is no knowing what one may come to; so, perhaps, I may as well come in and make the Israelite's acquaintance."

Sydney Welworth was so immensely tickled at the very idea of his friend's new suggestion, that, as he led the way up the narrow staircase, he shook the whole place with his violent peals of laughter, from which he had scarcely recovered his breath or composure as they entered a very small, and low room, on the first floor, or, as it really was, entresol, where there were already assembled six or seven gentlemen, of various ages, seated in a business-like manner round the table, among whom Captain Scott, rather to his amazement, recognised two Guardsmen of his acquaintance—a young baronet, who was a distant connection of his own, and, next to the latter, a gentleman who, though not a personal acquaintance, he knew well enough by sight as one of the smartest men about town, whose phaeton was the best turn-out in the park, that previous season.

Archie Scott having been introduced by his friend, and shaken hands with those whom he knew, the little conclave, which had been temporarily disturbed by the rather noisy and unbusiness-like entrance of the still highly amused Sydney, were called to order by their chairman, a noble lord, who requested the latter to take his place at the table, and though rather audibly demurring at the stranger being allowed to remain while business was going on, yet seeing that he was recognised by the majority of the party, so far gave in as to allow him to occupy a chair by the fire, while they resumed their deliberations on the several cases brought before them.

Several letters were read aloud in their turns by one of the Guardsmen, who, with a desk before him, seemed to act as the secretary of the committee, either giving a short report of the state of poverty and destitution in various districts of the metropolis, or perhaps describing individual cases of distress visited and reported upon by the writers, but all, almost without exception, urgently requesting funds for further and immediate distribution.

Each demand or petition was then strictly discussed, sometimes, it is true, in somewhat familiar, not to say unbusiness-like tone, by some of the younger members of the committee, in regard to the genuineness of the cases, or the relative discretion of the almoners, and then different sums of £20, £30, £50, and—in some few very urgent instances—even £100, were voted as grants to be sent to the various districts, according to the relative amount of distress and the number of the population in each, which particulars they seemed to have all ready for them set forth on the paper containing the agenda, which was lying before the chairman, in a way, which at first astonished and then began to interest Archie Scott considerably.

When the business was disposed of, and the members were rising from their seats, Sydney begged leave to stop them for one moment, as he had a case of real distress to report, which was not on the paper, and, to poor Archie's great confusion, he introduced him to his old and new friends as being in the greatest possible distress, and an applicant for any relief which it was within their power to afford him. With a trifle of more than perhaps fair exaggeration, he then described how his friend had been induced to come and ask their kind assistance, under the impression that he was about to be introduced to one of those benevolent members of the Hebrew persuasion who kindly accommodate ingenuous and confiding youths by temporary loans, or by discounting their bills at a trifle of sixty per cent.; but though they might not be able or willing to accommodate his gallant friend quite in that way, yet still they might perhaps be able, by putting new interests and untried pursuits of pleasure in his way, to do something for him, at least, in dissipating the feeling of ennui and depression with which he was at present devoured. This, he was quite sure, they would be only too glad, on his recommendation, to do; and he therefore begged now to propose, that his friend, Captain Archibald Scott, late of her Majesty's Piebald Light Dragoons, be appointed almoner, to act for the Society for Relief of Distress, in the best district at present vacant in the eastern part of London.

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL AT THREE O'CLOCK.

WAS near that reverend chancel,
While yet the evening sun
Poured through the glowing window,
Ere the anthem had begun ;

Where banner, sword, and helmet
Told of the hard-fought day,
And sculptured marble pointed Where warriors' ashes lay ;

And silence fell one moment,
And heads were bowed in prayer,
And the preacher's words of blessing
Fell like incense on the air.

Then woke the grand old organ,*
Uprose the choir beneath,

And the banners waved above them
With the tempest of its breath.

Oh, that sounding burst of glory !
Like an echo from heaven it came,
Like a voice from the Mighty Presence,
Like a breath of the great "I Am,"

And I thought of white-robed thousands,
In phalanx deep and broad,
With their banners hung for ever
In the armoury of God ;

Bowing their veiled faces
'Neath the shade of the victor's palm,
While their choral hallelujahs
Rise for ever round the Lamb.

THE NAMELESS PROPHET OF JUDAH†

"Alas, my brother ! round thy tomb
In sorrow kneeling, and in fear,
We read the pastor's doom
Who speaks and will not hear.
The grey-haired saint may fail at last,
The surest guide a wanderer prove ;
Death only binds us fast
To the bright shore of love."

HE story of the man of God, who came out of Judah to prophesy against the altar of Jeroboam, is commenced in 1 Kings xiii., and completed, 350 years after, in 2 Kings xxiii. It is thus associated with the rising and the falling of Jeroboam's schismatical religion. The kingdom had just been severed into two parts, in one of which was the authorised place of worship. To prevent the ten tribes from going up to the capital of his rival to worship there in Solomon's temple, Jeroboam set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel—Dan, associated with Micah's teraphim, and Bethel—of which it was remembered that Jacob had said, "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." There a new order of priests burned incense to the invisible God under the similitude of a calf that eateth hay ; for Jeroboam had imported from Egypt this symbol, so agreeable to the feelings of a pastoral nation. And now it was probably the time of the feast, which was substituted for the ancient passover ; and the people—for their wealth consisted in cattle—had come up to Bethel to worship God under the form of a calf.

This is a species of idolatry which will always have its votaries. It is none other than the worship of what constitutes our wealth, to which we do a service more lowly and untiring than was ever offered to Jehovah. Men are made to worship something ; they must have some correlative to the innate spirit of adoration ; and that faculty of the mind out of which philosophers are able to construct the majestic truth that there exists a Divine Being, may either lift men to the heights of spiritual religion, or may cast them grovelling at the feet of an idol. They will go up to Jerusalem to worship Him who "remaineth a King for ever," if they be not intercepted on the way by this calf of gold—symbol of a people's wealth : and this they are content to make the end of their journey, haply to be made its priests.

About this pernicious idol the hosts of Israel were keeping their feast. A novelty in religion attracts far more devotees than the old routine of the temple and the law ; a false form of religion is more attractive than a true ; and if God would only consent to be worshipped under the form of a golden idol, heaven would be dense with the smoke of the incense with which this golden divinity would ever be adored. And now the gorgeous religious service is proceeding. Jeroboam stands beside the altar, well fitted by the years he has spent in Egyptian exile to perform the solemn rites as priest and king. The vague forms of priests assisting swim in the clouds of incense which, in the midday sun,

* In St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, an anthem always follows the sermon.

† One of the many traditions as to the name of "the man of God who came out of Judah," is that he was Iddo the Seer. But in Holy Writ he is nameless : the historian out of tenderness conceals his name ; and by those at Bethel he seems to have been unknown.

are as the glory that at some crisis of the national history filled the temple of the Lord. But above, the golden calf—mate of that at Dan—like to that which had the unwilling sanction of Aaron, and at the sight of which, glittering on the plains of Sinai, Moses flung down and broke in wrath the autograph of the Almighty to his people—above it stands, bathed in sunlight, like one of those mysterious beasts which dwell in the seventh heaven.

Then from the prostrate multitude steps forth a single man, like the sole survivor of a fallen host, flinging his solitary defiance in the face of opposing armies. It is the man of Judah, subject of a hostile monarch, prophet of an outraged God. He comes to denounce the altar. "O altar, altar, thus saith the Lord." His denunciations pass over the head of the startled Jeroboam. Men are too low for God to strike; he overturns the altars of an idolatrous faith, and proclaims the doom of false systems, but the individual who conceives himself the mainspring of all is contemptuously passed over. He heralds the birth of a child to the house of David—a reflection of the distant Christ—who should overthrow that idolatrous worship, and lead up the tribes of Israel to Jerusalem, to keep there once more the ancient passover. His words seem to waken echoes in the future. Hell is dismayed by the mention of an illustrious birth in that house which is destined to produce its Conqueror. Is not this "the rod of Jesse—the root and offspring of David?" The altar is rent, and the ashes poured out, as if by a premature movement in the womb of Time, of that convulsion of which he was foretelling. White with rage and fear, the king puts forth his hand from the altar, which has been rent beneath it, and bids his attendants seize on this bold herald of God. But his hand was alike powerless to save the altar on which it rested, or to injure the minister of God, against whom it was stretched. So withers the hand that is stretched out against the servants of the Almighty, in the fulfilment of their duty. It is caught by God, and remains stretched forth, involuntarily designating the prophet to the multitude; until the proud Jeroboam humbles himself to the nameless man of Judah, and begs through him for mercy from the God he had endeavoured to depose. "Intreat now the face"—(how the materialism of his religious notions comes out even in the form of his supplication)—"intreat now the face of the Lord thy God." And as, when the prophecy was directed against the altar, not the man, we learned to distinguish between evil and evil-doers, so, in the prompt restoration of that withered hand, we see that God "in judgment remembers mercy;" and as the prophet kneels to pray for the hand stretched out against his life, we see a generosity kindred to that undaunted courage which braved a mighty king, girt about by his people.

And now he turns to go, leaving no name behind him in Israel, bearing no trophy to Judah. Let God's name be glorified; let ours remain in oblivion. His bravery and magnanimity were not more striking than the sacrifice of personal honour and advantage with which he turned to depart, refusing the invitation of Jeroboam and the offer of reward. "If thou wilt give me the half of thine house, I will not go with thee, nor eat bread nor drink water in this place." But was there not an evil omen even in those very words? The king had offered him no such exaggerated reward. They have the violence of innate weakness. He who is unnecessarily vehement in his protestations of fidelity often turns out to be a dishonest steward. Was it not thus that Balaam vowed—"Though Balak should give me his house full of silver and gold, I will not go with thee?" Let us not make boast of such inexpugnable virtue. It is too soon to boast; for who can tell but we may some day bring shame on our profession? It becomes us best to work on in silence, offering the testimony of deeds. St. Paul would not boast, not because he had not whereof to boast, but because it was too soon to boast. Instead of proclaiming that we could not be tempted by the half of Jeroboam's house, or Balak's house full of silver and gold, let us pray with fear, and trembling, and self-distrust, that we be not conquered by the trifling temptation of a crust of bread and a cruse of water.

Moulded for great achievements, we have yet to see this servant of God tried by those petty temptations which, during hours of inaction, assail the nerveless spirit. In that land of idolatry he was not to eat or drink, or turn aside. He was to return by another way, that all trace of him might be lost, and that he might not be overtaken and tempted to return. God with the temptation showed him a way of escape: to return by another way. But although thus far he kept the commandment, he violated its spirit in sitting down by the wayside and waiting for temptation to come up with him. Is there no blame in the words that he was found sitting under an oak?

Haste thee on, thou man of God, for the evening is closing about thee. They have marked which way thou wentest, and temptation is in pursuit. The multitude have passed away that watched thy splendid boldness; they are left behind, and scattered in sleep over the dark country. Only God watches thee now. The wonder of the fair, and wise, and brave, and royal, who looked on thee to-day, no longer nerves thy spirit—they know not even thy name. A great deed has been done by thee; but to leave the glory of it behind thee is greater. Give up the glory to God, and he will forge it into a crown for thee to wear hereafter. Thou shalt wear it in heaven; and the praise of fair and wise angels shall be better to thee than the acclaims of the idolatrous multitude.

But how hard to withstand the small temptations of life! He thinks it little blame to sit and muse awhile on the countless eyes that beheld when he rent the altar and withered the king's hand, and loosed it again from the Divine grip; the ocean murmur of applause, the unexampled boldness of the deed—to con the noble words that he had spoken—to think of the impression produced upon the king and multitude by that splendid act of abdication, as it were, when he disappeared as abruptly as he had risen on the scene. Thus the mind feeds on the green spots of memory; surely so much may be permitted to human nature. But the while he lingered on his urgent flight, a petty temptation pursued and overtook him. It found him weary and relaxed, and satisfied with what he had already achieved. He had refused the hospitality of a king, and had rejected royal gifts; remembering, perhaps, the story of Balaam, so similar to his own slain among the children of Moab: and now the temptation is only to eat bread and drink water. Those small temptations which do not arouse and arm us to resistance, are often allowed without opposition to scale the battlements of a mind deeming itself impregnable. We think it no dishonour to yield to some little temptation, our self-respect being satisfied with the sense that we could crush it if we chose. It seems enough to possess the power. There is what might almost be termed a liberality in not using it upon trifling occasions.

The real temptation that came up with the man of Judah, was to re-visit for one hour the place where he had done so gloriously—to hear the murmur of his deed on the lips of living men—and to talk of it with a brother prophet. But the guise under which it appeared was only to eat bread and drink water; a temptation so slight as not to be worth overcoming—so slight, that equally slight must be the sin of giving way to it—so slight, that the glory of resisting it would not be worth acquiring. He who had refused the offer of royal hospitality might add to, rather than detract from, the glory of his high refusal by now in preference accepting the hospitality of a brother prophet. Such was the outward form of the temptation, the real allurements of which was to return to that idolatrous place. It found him weary, seated under an oak; his mission over, sunk in that depression which always succeeds to scenes of action and days of excitement. Hours had passed, and his strength was failing, as he sat under the oak-tree by the way. Beware of those weary hours when nature is exhausted; beware of the morrow of a victory. The conqueror of yesterday is often surprised in the sleep of to-night; and when we unclasp our armour the enemy steals upon us, through the shadows of the twilight. Take heed of hours of inaction and reaction, and lassitude—when the excitement of the battle is over, and there remains an emptiness of the heart, a vibrating of the nerves, and the powers of resistance are weakened, and we are weary of well-doing. Court not the shadow of the oak; wait for rest till you can rest in safety.

And now there comes an aged man, a prophet of Samaria. He professes that an angel has commanded him to bring back the man of Judah. The actors in this story are two men of God. One shows how easily we may work the destruction of a brother, and the danger of what is called "good nature;" the other teaches us the lesson that we must work out our salvation—work out to the very end of life, never pausing while a breath remains to be breathed or one step of the way to be trodden.

The man of Judah knows that "God is not a man that he should lie," but he feigns to his conscience a belief in the ready falsehood of his friend. Self-deception is added to, instead of taking from, the guilt of disobedience. He returns to eat bread and drink water in the place of which God had said, "Thou shalt eat no bread and drink no water;" but even as he sits at that board of sinful indulgence, the old prophet cries, trembling with the burden of the Spirit, "Thus saith the Lord, Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord . . . thy carcase shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers." "And when he was gone, a lion met him by the way, and slew him." "And the prophet took up the carcase of the man of God, and laid it upon the ass, and brought it back: and the old prophet came to the city, to mourn and to bury him. And he laid his carcase in his own grave; and they mourned over him, saying, Alas, my brother!" Where lately rang the murmurs of applause now passes this mournful cry. How often it escapes from the lips of the angel hosts as they behold some wayward saint, that has fallen a prey to the roaring lion! How often it seems to be muttered by the grave-side! It teaches us that we may rend polluted altars, and wither the arm of temporal authority, but, returning home in the evening, be disobedient to the word of the Lord, and that dismal bewailing be made for us, even by those who were themselves instrumental in our loss and ruin, "Alas, my brother!"

THE HARVEST.

'ER the emerald meadows glowed the sunlight;
Fell with golden splendour o'er the leaves;

The weary reapers' task was almost over;
The corn stood ready in its yellow sheaves.

Long and purple stretched the evening shadows,
Broken by the heaps of yellow grain;
Cheerly spoke the sturdy yeoman master,
Strolling through the sun and toil-worn train.

Full-voiced came the chorus of the song-birds,
Pouring through a lattice open wide;
Mingling with the joyous cadence, murmured
Gnat and beetles' buzz and humming-tide.

O'er a dying maiden's pallid aspect
Fell the warm reflection of the sun,
Lighting up her angel face with glory—
Earnest of a future almost won.

Weary by the bedside sat her mother—
Pale and weary, with an aching heart;
Well she knew all hope for her was over:
From her loved one she must quickly part.

"Mother, raise me up a little higher,
There's so strange a sinking in my chest—
Once more read to me my darling's letter;
Let me lean my head upon your breast.

"Seven days longer!" saith he—seven days longer,
Mother dear, I feel it may not be.
Mother, tell him we shall meet in heaven:
Him on earth I never more shall see."

Seven days longer—o'er the emerald meadows
Poured a flood of glory from the sun;
But the fields were empty of the harvest,
And the maiden's earthly course was run.

Spring flowers on her quiet grave were blooming,
When from o'er the sea her lover came.
Careless, he had broken faith and troth-plight;
With him was the wife who bore his name.

Then the widowed mother's anguish softened;
Then to God her deep thanksgiving breathed—
"Better far my flower was plucked untimely,
Than round such a mildewed sheaf be wreathed."

PEGGY DOGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MANSE OF STRATHIE.

"GOING already!" said Dr. Grant—the minister of Strathie was a doctor of divinity, and was duly honoured with the title—"going already, Mistress Peggy? won't you stay and see your old friends? the coach is due in less than half an hour."

The friends in question were Archie and Sandie, who were coming home at the close of their first term at college.

"I'll be in time to see the coach come round the foot of the hill, where I mean to stand and wave my handkerchief; but I'm wanted at home this afternoon," said Peggy, holding out her hand. "Good-bye; I'll see them at the kirk to-morrow," she added, with a parting smile.

The doctor was pacing up and down the shady side of the garden, in the sunny afternoon, engaged in meditation, as was his wont on Saturday. It is the custom among the Scottish clergy to give up that day to preparation for the work of the morrow.
The good doctor's preparations were of no very exhaustive or exhausting kind. He read his Bible, walked up and down his study or his garden, indulged in frequent recreative sallies into the outer world, and had no objection to interruptions of any kind.

If they were not very intense or profound, these meditations of his must have been sweet and wholesome at the least, for he overflowed with the milk of human kindness on all who came near him at such times.

The truth was that the reverend doctor had a very easy mind. He seldom underwent the labour of thought which wrings the brain. In a great chest in the study lay a whole body of divinity, in the shape of his own and his father's sermons, upon which he had drawn for the last twenty years. The sermons were taken, in rotation, from one side of the chest, and, having been duly read, or rather recited, on Sunday, they were laid, face downward, on the other side.
When the pile was finished, it had only to be turned, and the process began again. Occasionally, a new head was added, or a fresh application made; but these were written on the spur of the moment, generally, when some exciting or solemnising event had taken place among his parishioners.

The doctor's sermons were careful and finished compositions, in the Blair style; and though strangers from the neighbouring parishes, accustomed to more stirring stuff, shook their heads and murmured that he was a "mere moralist," "a dry stick," "a dumb dog," according to the acerbity of their tastes and tempers, his own people loved their doctor dearly, and upheld his preaching warmly, dwelling especially on his great gift of dispensing with the paper—read sermons being obnoxious to all well-constituted kirkgoers. The doctor knew his sermon by heart.

Peggy Oglivie had come to spend the Saturday afternoons at the manse, as regularly as the doctor took to his meditations. Mrs. Grant was supposed to be alone on these occasions; and she had assumed quite a motherly control over the friendless little girl. Peggy had been the pet of the parish schoolmaster, her husband's principal crony, with whom he played interminable games of chess. She had been the playmate of her boys, and she was a regular and attentive attender at the kirk. Mrs. Grant had resolved to patronise her, and indulge her curiosity about the family at the same time; but being a good woman, and motherly, in a measure, she ended by liking her as much as it was possible for her to like any one beyond her own little family circle of husband and sons.

So when the boys went up to the grammar-school, and Peggy had learnt all that the schoolmaster was thought competent to teach a girl, Mrs. Grant took her to task in the matter of feminine accomplishments, and, finding her utterly destitute, set to work to teach her fine needlework, and, at Peggy's earnest petition, the flower-painting, on which she justly prided herself.

Half a dozen times in the course of the afternoon would the doctor look in upon their labours, generally with some joke that had occurred to him, or with some almost boyish ebullition of spirits to give vent to. He would come behind Peggy, and put his great hand before her eyes while she sat at work—a trick which he would equally have played his lady-wife, but for the discouragement it had met with in their early days, and which had led to its discontinuance.

And on this particular afternoon he was more than usually restless and erratic, and the restlessness communicated itself to his wife. "The boys" were expected, and there were speculations as to how they would look, and how much they had grown, what rank they had taken, and what prizes they had won. Long before her usual hour, Peggy had risen to take her leave. She had witnessed their homecoming before; but then they were only schoolboys, now it was different: college had invested them in her eyes with the attributes of manhood.

There is scarcely such a thing in Scotland as a domestic demonstration. The schoolboy is seldom welcomed back with kisses or tears; and, as far as outward tokens of affection were concerned, the whole parish might have witnessed unmoved the simple hand-shaking that would greet the youths on their return; but there were tones of voice and shades of expression which Peggy's quick instinct taught her suffered repression in the presence of a stranger, and so she came out and said "good-bye" to the doctor, and tripped indoors again to go through the same ceremony with his wife, and then took her way homeward, a shade more subdued, and grave than was her wont.

As soon as her young companion was gone Mrs.

Grant joined her husband in his walk. At the top of the garden, which sloped up from the road, they stood still to look after Peggy.

"One of your lang loons (tall lads) will be falling in love with Mistress Peggy some of these days," said the doctor, as he watched the pretty figure disappear among the trees on the other side.

The minister's wife gave her spouse a reproachful look, which said, as plain as look could say, that he wronged his personal and professional dignity by jocularities of that kind; but the only verbal answer she vouchsafed was the emphatic word, "Nonsense!"

"She's a bonny lass, to my thinking," continued the worthy man, "and better than she's bonny."

"She's well enough, though no great beauty, as far as I can see," replied his spouse: "She's certainly very much improved;" and for this improvement Mrs. Grant took credit to herself. "It's a shame of her relations to neglect her as they do," she went on; "she might have been a comfort to them now; but I fear Jean's story is no the right one after all, and that her mother was not what she should have been."

"Jean's story's plain enough," said the minister, whom any approach to censoriousness nettled: "Gilbert Oglivie would never have harboured the child, if the mother had not been his son's lawful wife. And suppose she hadn't been, that's no fault to Peggy. She has more sense in her little finger, than I ever saw in a woman's whole bulk before."

His wife took no notice of this flattering speech, further than to observe, "She'll need it all, or I'm mistaken."

"That she will," replied the doctor. "It's a heavy house for a young thing to live in. Every one but herself more failing, and feckless (pithless) than another; even Jean's getting stiff, except at the tongue."

"She's a faithful creature, that Jean, as ever lived," said Mrs. Grant, changing the subject.

"That she is," rejoined her husband. "Jean and I have been excellent friends ever since the time when she turned me away from the door, on my first round of visitation, because her master, poor, perverse sinner! had sworn that neither for soul nor body should doctors come near him. What a time it seems since then!" he sighed, "and the lads were but bairns."

"There will be changes at Delaube before long," remarked Mrs. Grant. "The old man will be found dead in his bed some day."

"Poor little Peggy!" said the kind-hearted minister, "what's to become of her? I wonder if her grandfather has made any provision for her. If the place is only free, and that scapegrace of a father keeps out of the way, she will be safe enough."

"But the place is not free—I'm sure of that. Delaube's drowned in debt, and I know they can hardly make ends meet. If it hadn't been for Jean, they would never have been able to hold on. Indeed, I would little wonder to see them turned out of it yet, beggars, before the old man dies."

Meantime, with a graver gait and a heavier heart. than usual, Peggy was sauntering up the side of the wooded brae which the coach must shortly pass. She was thinking of her old companions, whom she would fain have welcomed, and feeling a pain at the remembrance of a pain, which had risen when the sight of a former home-coming had suggested the inevitable, "You are not one of us," which must always be felt by the mere on-looker on such occasions.

A sort of sigh of desolateness, such as sometimes swept through her beloved wood, heaved her heart. She thought of the grave in Strathie churchyard, which she had searched out among the nameless dead, where her mother lay—of the father who was a father—but in name—of the one tie which bound her to the living, an old man who often told her that he was already dead.

The young girl's natural healthfulness of spirit had to struggle hard against the morbid atmosphere of her home. Her activity met only the dull lethargy of age and disease, her vivacity its lifelessness and lack of interest. The firs on the hill-side grew among their fellows, and taught her at times to feel alone. The birds in their nests would whisper that she had been less cared for than they; but in general the happy youthful spirit triumphed, and shook off such influences, as the firs shook off the showers from their glossy branches, leaving her mind unwarped in its growth.

She stood leaning against a tree, a fresh wild rose on her cheek, an ethereal gleam in her eyes—the tears just then were not far from them—and a meditative earnestness on her broad brow, as the old coach came rattling up the road. There they were on the look out for home. She almost draws back; but they have seen her. Archie has bounded up to his full height, and he is close on six feet, and is endangering the lives of the passengers by making the old coachman twist his neck in the same direction in which he is waving his cap, with arms that project considerably beyond their covering garments. The soberer Sandie sits and waves his recognition, though it is not a whit less hearty.

As for Peggy, she changes in a moment, attitude and mood at once. She is laughing and shaking her handkerchief gleefully; and all the way round the hill she will burst into little silvery rills of laughter, as she conjures up the figure of Archie with his wild head and long red wrists, standing full length on the coach-box.

CHAPTER VIII.

A SCOTCH SABBATH.

THE Sabbath of Scotland has been very much maligned. I do not remember often to have seen it defended on reasonable grounds; yet it might be so defended readily enough. The complete cessation of labour, the perfect repose which prevailed and still prevails in an unsophisticated Scotch town, on the first day of the week, might easily be proved more recreative than any amount of animal enjoyment, which is the almost universal substitute for church-going among the bulk of the people elsewhere. In such a town the streets are clear from end to end; not a wheel turns, not a shop-window stares: everything is at rest. Compare this to the Sunday dissipation to be seen in any quarter of a city like London,—the loaded omnibuses; the crowded steamers; the wearied, flurried women; the dusty and thirsty and, at the end of the day, tipsy men; the sleepy, fretful children. Such cities as London have their special needs, and you cannot bring into them the repose of a country town; but days like these do not meet the requirements of either soul or body, in the way of rest.

The little 'toon,' or village, of Strathie, was by no means so rigidly righteous, in respect of Sabbath observance, as some of its neighbours. It took its tone from its worthy minister, and he was considered a decided latitudinarian; but, by universal and time-honoured custom and consent, every soul in the parish, from three years old and upwards, appeared in church at the two diets of public worship, with the exception of the sick, or the disabled, and those engaged in such necessary offices as nursing or tending cattle. The cooking of a Sunday's dinner, for instance, would not have been held a valid plea on the part of an absentee. The Sunday's dinner could cook itself. For those who went home for a midday meal, the broth was ready. A big iron pot, not quite full of water, was swung over the fire with a piece of meat in it and a few handfuls of barley, and amongst this, just before church time, was shred a quantity of vegetables—any sort that came to hand with the season, from winter leeks to early peas and carrots. There it simmered safely and quite untended till the return of the family, when it was dealt out into wooden basins, and dispatched with horn spoons. Or the kettle was kept boiling on the crook, or swing, for the still more expeditious and inexpensive dish of oatmeal brose.

The services were conducted on this wise:—The congregation assembled at half-past ten or eleven in the morning, and after a service of two hours' duration, consisting of two long prayers and a sermon which lasted an hour at least, enlivened by four verses of a psalm, half an hour's interval was allowed for refreshment. Then those who had not been able to attend the first diet, might join the second; and those who thought fit might retire. Such of the congregation, however, as came from a distance, remained and took their refreshment in the churchyard. There they formed picturesque little groups, sitting down on the grass, or on the tabular tombstones, eating their cakes and cheese, drinking milk, and sometimes stronger liquid, out of bottles, and making ready to hold out for other two or three hours more.

The village was close beneath the church, but it nestled unseen down in a little strath, or glen, formed by the banks of the river receding, and leaving a broad meadow scarcely above the level of the stream; and the manse, or minister's house, was close to the church, both seeming to stand alone on the high ground. Dr. Grant and his family always retired during the short interval, and were not expected to invite any one to accompany them, as such hospitality might have interfered with the duties of the day.

No graver maiden than Peggy Oglvie sat through those long services. If her thoughts wandered, as, truth to tell, they often did, it was in the direction given them by the sacred influences of the time and place. Often they ceased to wander, and dwelt in a quiet—which was a state of consciousness rather than of active thought—a consciousness that drank in the subdued light as it streamed through the ivied window, and the rustle of the breeze among the trees without, that came in at the open door, and the sound of the voice above her head, and mingled them all in a meditative dream. If a familiar text was given out, Peggy, who knew what would follow almost as well as did the doctor himself, thought it no sin to give up her mind to such a mood, and let the voice stream over her as the clouds stream over the growing grain, dropping now and then a refreshing shower as they pass.

On the Sunday after the return of his sons, the doctor had chosen a favourite sermon, on David called from keeping the sheep to be King of Israel,—a sermon that came oftener than its turn—and was an exhortation to the young to prepare with all diligence for the unknown duties of life. Peggy knew it by heart. It came out when any of the peasant proprietors of the parish sent up a son to college; it came out again, with an application to the case in hand, when the youth came back with the prize for which he had laboured—the little purse which would enable him to complete his course.

There in their father's pew sat Archie and Sandie, to whom the present application was to be made. Peggy's mind followed the train of thought, stirred into unusual activity by the presence of her old playfellows fresh from college. What eminence might they not win! what pitch of greatness might they not reach!—and by greatness, Peggy did not mean worldly grandeur, but learning and goodness: and, somehow, she would be left behind. Thus her dream ran. The doctor was speaking of such, in a voice more sad and solemn than was his wont. Then, somehow, she grasped a greater thought than the good man had uttered, that every one could not be blessed as givers, could not exercise the large beneficences, but must bless the givers themselves as humble receivers of their gifts, and the thought bent her head lower and made her eyes burn with a steadier light. She would be content to be left behind for services of love to such.

Very good she looked, half-child and half-woman, with her fresh face shaded by the huge bonnet of the day, her brown curls clustering round her neck and brow in the then fashionable crop. The bonnet had been purchased in Bleaktown by Mrs. Grant herself, who had caused it to be adorned with a top-knot of green ribbons, striped with white, in imitation of the grass popularly called “gardener's garters.” To the praise of that lady be it said, the distinguished appearance of Mistress Peggy was due to her exertions more than to that young lady's own. It was she who had caused the white frock and pelerine to be submitted to abler hands than Jean's, besides procuring the crowning glory of that bonnet. It considerably hid, indeed, the attractions of the wearer, consisting as it did of an enormous circular plate of straw tied over the head and under the chin, and of course, projecting before and behind. It was “big enough,” Jean declared, “to keep the moonlight frae a toon.” Nevertheless it was a distinction to wear a bonnet, for the congregation could boast of but few. There was Mrs. Grant herself, bolt upright at the head of her pew, with a tower of tuscan on her head, adorned with immense bows of yellow and white; and some half dozen wives of the shopkeepers, or “merchants,” as they are styled to this day, crowned with structures no less large and magnificent.

But the “wives,” as distinguished from the “ladies,” had their white mutches (caps), trimmed with a plain band of white or black ribbon, the hoods of their grey or scarlet cloaks, or the corners of their plaids, serving for defence against rain and wind; and the lassies had their simple snoods tied round their glossy hair.

The faces of the congregation were gravely attentive. It was not to be guessed from them that the discourse was not new, as well as good and true; indeed, the bulk of them would have agreed with the doctor, that they had no right to find fault with the preaching, until they could practise all that was preached—a heresy which came of living in a Laodicea like Strathie! It was said that on one occasion a refractory farmer had told the doctor that a certain sermon, directed plainly against the besetting sin of the parish, was just “like could kale het again.” “Well, well, as you're no out o' the need o't yet, I'll no let it hae time to cool,” said the minister, and preached it accordingly on the Sunday following.

Archie and Sandie sat hanging their heads rather ruefully, and finding some difficulty in disposing of their long legs in the narrow pew. They were well-looking lads enough, a little ungainly and rough with the signs of coming manhood. Honest, affectionate fellows they seemed, and indeed were; but constitutionally lazy, like their father before them. They had done simply nothing in their first term. They had taken their pleasures together, and none of their pleasures had been tainted with vice; but they had learned little and gained nothing. Their father was making the suitable application, which he had already rehearsed for their benefit, and it must be confessed they looked a little sheepish under it.

All the time of the service they had been casting stray glances at Peggy, indicative of their ancient understanding; and yet when the half-hour of release arrived, there was a certain shyness about their meeting.

After the first greeting, the three sat down upon a table-like tombstone, Peggy in the middle, and one of the lads on each side, their long legs tucked under the tomb, and their long backs curved in an attitude of eager attention they had not manifested during the sermon.

"We're in the black books this time," were the first words spoken by Archie.

"What, both of you?" said Peggy, with a look of concern.

Archie nodded, and both faces lengthened considerably, as they read the disappointment in hers.

"Oh, Archie!" was all that Peggy had time to say, the doctor and Mrs. Grant coming up.

"We'll make up for it yet," said he, bravely.

"That's always your way, Archie," said his brother; "and you may, but I never shall make up for lost time. I'm right sorry," added the honest fellow, with tears in his eyes.

Both mother and father heard the last of the brief colloquy, and were touched by it. Jean had gone back to Delaube to wait on master and man; and Peggy declined to come into the manse, saying she wanted to walk to the village and back before the second sermon.

When that too was over, and the congregation was dispersing for the day, Peggy would have parted from her friends with a distant nod and smile; but they had made up their minds beforehand, and Archie, who was general spokesman, managed to whisper to his mother, before they were out of the kirk, "We're going to walk part of the way with Peggy."

Mrs. Grant had uttered her stiff "very well" before she knew what she was about, for it had taken her by surprise, that change from the "may we" of boyhood to the "we are" of manhood. A moment after, she felt it, and did not like it; but they were gone after the girl.

The doctor came up as she stood in the porch, "There they are, dangling after that lassie, as I thought they would," said the maladroit man, driving the little splinter into the quick; "but I'm thinking her preaching will have more effect than mine."

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—II.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

MAUDE THE MAGPIE.

BENEATH the shadow of a weeping ash-tree, one soft summer's afternoon, sat an old lady, with a child on the ground at her feet, looking with earnest blue eyes, full of eagerness, and parted lips, preparing to listen with breathless interest to a tale that was about to be told her, which she had been long promised to hear; a tale that had, to the childish mind, that intense delight of being true, and about people whom the little girl knew.

Edith Everley was about to hear from grandmother what she saw through her glasses when Aunt Maude was a little girl: ready to sympathise deeply with the aggravation "dear auntie" must have felt, as her little, cherished failings were constantly magnified by those wretched spectacles into a great sin.

"Now, begin granny, I'm quite ready," said the little girl, settling herself on the stool.

"Well, then, Edie," said grandmamma, "Aunt Maude was once a little girl——"

"I suppose so, granny," interrupted Edith, laughing.

"And a very nice little girl, too," continued Mrs. Everley, "and a great favourite with every one."

"She's a darling, now," said Edith, "so funny, oh! she does make me laugh."

"Yes, I believe she is still a favourite with every one; but had I not put on my mental glasses, Edith, she would not have been, I am sure."

"What did she do, grandmamma?"

"Well, she talked too much, Edith."

"But that is not wicked, is it?"

"No, my dear, not wicked—the simple fact of talking; but troublesome when carried to an excess, and leading, like most little faults, to serious sins. Persons who are fond of talking, generally give themselves little time to think; and by speaking 'unadvisedly with their lips,' they run into the sad danger of making mischief. And poor Aunt Maude, one day, found the danger of her love of talking, and wished she had believed me, and sooner broken herself of the foolish habit. I had seen the fault growing bigger and bigger, and continually warned her. She had been called many a mocking name by her brothers and sisters, till the one of 'Magpie' became her common appellation. But she was merry and good-tempered, and only laughed and thought, as she often said—'Mamma makes such a fuss about little things; it's just as Philip says, she puts spectacles on to look at our faults, and she does, I'm sure.' And so she went on, making no effort to restrain the unruly member.

"One day the elder children were all invited to a little party, at the house of an old gentleman, who was a great favourite with all little folks. He was a bachelor of great wealth, which he spent chiefly on others, little or nothing on himself, for his tastes were simple and inexpensive, and he indulged himself in no luxuries at all. He kept a horse to ride for himself, and a carriage for his friends. This carriage was always sent to fetch the children whom he invited to his parties, which he gave regularly twice a year—one in the winter, one in the summer. He was called 'Uncle Roger,' by every one, and to be with him was considered a greater treat than anything else on earth. He knew the birthdays of all his little friends, and so soon as the morning came, came a parcel, with some funny inscription on it, purporting to come, sometimes from 'Humguffin,' sometimes from 'Ugly Mug,' and now and then from the Welsh giant, 'Blunderbore.' He really was a Welshman, and might almost be termed a giant, for he was a large, tall man, and remarkably strong. You may suppose, therefore, with what delight the children looked forward to his party. Before they started, I warned Maude of her prevailing fault, and begged her to control her tongue, and not be tempted to talk of what did not concern her. I again repeated the injunction I had so often given her, and which was a rule for all little people to follow, never to speak unless spoken to; but still, with an anxious heart, I dismissed her, for I could see I had made but little impression, and my glasses, Edith, revealed to me a mischievous, chattering person, dreaded by all, through that endless talking, which had become uncontrollable from habit.

"Well, they all went off in high spirits, and I thought much of them in their absence, hoping they would all behave as I should wish them; for it is a grievous thing, Edith, for children who are carefully brought up to conduct themselves in a way which does little credit to the mother who prays for them and loves them, and who deserves the reward of all her care, the only reward she covets, that her children should grow up in favour with God and man.

"They came home at the hour I sent for them, for on that subject I was very particular, and bright and happy they seemed, all talking at once, until I could not understand one bit of the news they so eagerly wished to impart. I asked no questions as to their individual behaviour, but hoped they had all been good; and they said, 'Yes, very, at least, Uncle Roger said so.' They all had presents. Uncle Roger had told them they were to play at being robbers; each child, in turn, was to pick his pockets, and see what he could find. Every child was to have one thing, 'and, oh! it was fun, mamma!' said Maude. 'He had hid them in such wonderful places—in his coat-sleeves, in his neckerchief, and Philip's beautiful pen was behind his ear. The last little girl couldn't find anything for a long time; and, at last, where do you think her parcel was?' Where do you think, Edith?" said grandmamma, smiling at the little eager face turned up to hers.

"I don't know, granny, I'm sure."

"Well, I could not guess either, Edith, and so they told me—in his boot! for, in those days, they wore long boots that reached up the leg, and in one he had stuffed the parcel!"

"He must have been a funny man, granny. I should have liked to have seen him—is he dead?" asked Edith.

"Oh, yes, he has been dead many years; but we shall never forget him, any of us. But I must get on with my story, or tea will be ready before we have done. After they had told me all they could think of, I asked if any grown people were there, and I fancied I noticed an odd look in Maude's face, when

Philip said, 'Miss Russell and her niece;' but I only thought of it afterwards, when the events which followed recalled to me the expression I had noticed. A day or two passed on; and, one morning, after our customary reading of the daily lessons, Maude asked if she might speak to me by myself. I smilingly consented, only supposing it was some little childish secret she was going to impart; but I was greatly surprised, the moment we were alone, by her bursting into tears, and exclaiming, 'Oh, mamma, mamma! my unhappy tongue!'

"What is the matter?" I eagerly asked.

"I've been so unhappy ever since I was at Uncle Roger's, and I've wanted so to tell you, but I did not like; but I must—I must, for I can't be happy!" and then the poor child, through her sobs and tears, told me that, during supper, Miss Russell had asked Mr. Roger if he knew anything of a Mr. Prescott, a new resident in the place, and that he had said 'No;' and then Maude said, without thinking, her papa knew him, and thought he was no good; he had heard something of him in the City he did not like at all. 'And, oh, mamma!' she continued, 'the moment I said it, I knew it was wrong, and remembered how often you had bid us never repeat what you and papa said; and I fear it's done some harm, for Miss Russell looked at her niece so oddly, and poor Margaret got so red, and I think, perhaps, she was fond of him; and I am so miserable!' and again her tears burst forth.

"I could offer her no consolation, for I was sadly annoyed. We were, generally, most cautious of speaking ill of any one, especially before the children or servants; but I well remembered your grandfather saying to me that he hoped the Mr. Prescott, our neighbour, was not the man he heard of in the City, as he had not got a good character there.

"Maude was a singularly intelligent and observant child, and always noticed and remembered any conversation that went on before her. She had heard it mentioned, too, that Margaret Russell had known Mr. Prescott before, and that they were likely to be married; but, as usual, giving herself no time to think before she spoke, she had uttered what she had no business to repeat, and what she now felt might cause great unhappiness to a girl who was a great favourite of hers.

"Margaret Russell was very pretty, and very kind to children, although given to be a little silly and romantic, and I knew that the aunt with whom she lived—for she, poor girl, was an orphan—was most anxious to prevent her engaging herself too young, or forming an attachment injudiciously. Whilst I was talking to Maude, showing her how unwise she had been not sooner to have taken my advice, the servant announced 'Miss Russell!' and you can fancy your poor Aunt Maude's state of mind whilst I was gone to her! She was a very proud old maiden lady, with a cold, precise manner, and, as soon as I was seated, she said—

"I have come, Mrs. Everley, on a most important business. The fact is, I have been over-persuaded to consent to an engagement, subject to certain conditions, between my niece Margaret and Mr. Prescott; but, on Wednesday, at Mr. Roger's juvenile party, a remark was made by your eldest daughter, which has unsettled all my arrangements; and I have forbidden further communication between the young people, until such time as I can discover the truth or falsity of the statement.'

"'Dear Miss Russell,' I began, 'on the testimony of a mere child——'

"'My dear madam,' interrupted Miss Russell, 'she quoted her papa, and as I have never quite approved of Mr. Prescott, I am inclined to believe anything to his discredit. I should feel greatly obliged to Mr. Everley if he can substantiate anything against Mr. Prescott.'

"'I am sure, Miss Russell, he cannot, nor would he interfere in the matter; he spoke inadvertently, and Maude was a very naughty girl for repeating what she heard. She is to be punished for it, but the consciousness of the mischief she has caused will be the severest she can have.' I would say no more, and Miss Russell left me, saying she should certainly act on what she had heard Maude say, and at once take her niece abroad, away from all intercourse with Mr. Prescott. Of course, that same evening, Mr. Prescott himself came, desiring to see your father; and the trouble that this foolish little long tongue of Maude's gave was excessive; and, although Mr. Prescott proved beyond a doubt he was not the person your grandfather had heard evil spoken of, the obstinate old lady refused to hear anything, but carried off the unfortunate Margaret, who wrote a wild, distracted letter to Maude, accusing her of having made her miserable for life!"

"Oh, grandmamma, and did they never marry? asked Edith.

"I never heard that they did. We left the place soon after; but Maude never forgot those few days of sincere distress she had passed. Of course, the habit of chattering was difficult to overcome, but the name of 'Margaret' acted as a talisman, whenever we wished to remind her that, 'A still tongue makes a wise head.'"

TO BE FOUND OUT.—A MONOLOGUE.

BY WILLIAM DUTHIE, AUTHOR OF "A TRAMP'S WALLET."

I HAVE felt very ill to day; sick and out of sorts. I'm afraid this cannot go on. I had horrible dreams last night in the little time I did sleep, and they don't seem to have left me yet. I thought he had discovered all. I tried to hide myself from him; but he found me out at every turn. At last he caught me in the very act, and then I awoke.

I wonder what he would do with me, if he did find me out? He could ruin me if he liked, and I am afraid he would. He is a stern, hard man in his anger, and would go any lengths to punish me.

But why should he find me out? I have taken every precaution against discovery; the books are correct to a cipher. It will take a cleverer man than he is to find out any mistake there; and where else is he to look? It is very weak of me to let myself be tormented by these childish fears. I ought to enjoy myself with the money, and not worry myself at every breath of wind, or stray suspicion. I will enjoy myself too! I did enjoy myself last night. I was all right till I came home, and then I got an idea into my head that some one had been trying to open my desk. The lock-plate was loose, that's certain; but I know one screw was out before, and I might have loosened it myself, when I pulled the key out last night. I was in a great hurry, I know; and the key caught on the edge of the plate. But even if he had opened it, what then? What was there to find? There was Louisa's letter, by-the-bye, I forgot that: I shouldn't like him to have seen that. It might have set him inquiring. He would wonder who she was, and might have suspected the worst. What a fool I was to leave it there; but I was in such a hurry to get away that I forgot it, till we were talking together, and then it was too late. If he once got an inkling of who she was, I think he would discharge me at once, and then it must come out; but I don't believe it. It is only my own stupid fancies; and I should never think of such things, only that I am so queer, and out of sorts this morning.

I wish I had not smoked that last cigar. I was all right till then, and the soda and brandy did me no good. I took too much; that is the fact of it. The room was so hot, and Louisa would make me stay, when my head was all of a swim already, so that it's no wonder I was upset; I shall know better another time. I am so easily led away, that's it. I must have more resolution; I will too. They won't catch me in that way again; I'll do what I like, in spite of everybody—even Louisa.

I wonder how much I've had altogether? I've never counted it up; it wasn't worth while: I could if I liked, but what would be the use? It's gone now; I have not kept it long, that's one thing. If anybody had ever been cunning enough, to mark the money, it wouldn't have helped them much, for I spent it almost as I got it. How much money have I left now?—three—five—seven—and-ninepence: is that all? Surely I must have lost some, or been robbed of it. I shouldn't wonder if that rascal, Byers, had stolen a sovereign out of my pocket. He was close by me at supper-time, and he did change a sovereign.

Where would he get a sovereign, I wonder? He saw me change a five-pound note, and he looked as hungry at it, as if he never saw such a thing in his life before. I don't suppose he ever did—of his own. The rascal! if I found him picking my pocket, I'd strangle him!

That's the worst of those places. You come in with such a queer lot; I don't think I'll go there again—it aint respectable. I'll tell Louisa so the next time. I must have a serious talk with her; I wasn't quite pleased with her last night. Byers took upon himself to be quite familiar, and she ought to have resented it; but she did not: I won't have it. That was one of the things which upset me last night.

I wonder how much I have had, though. It must be a hundred or two; I have not thought about it lately, but have just taken what I wanted. I am afraid I am getting too careless. I recollect when I took the first shilling that I was in a tremble all day. It was only a shilling over in the petty cash, and there was no great harm in it; but I felt myself grow hot and cold, all in a breath, every time master came near me. But I know better now! I take a pound now, where I took a shilling once, and think nothing of it. What is the use? If I am to make myself miserable over it, why do I take it? If the money won't make me happier than I was, I had better be without it. Besides, it's all nonsense; he won't find me out.

The only thing is, that perhaps he will begin to miss it at last. So much profit made, he will say; and yet only so much to the good. Then he will wonder how that is, and look at the books. Well! I'm ready for him there. The books are all right, but—ah, well! what is the use of bothering about it? If the books are all right, what more can he want? The profit hasn't been made, and is not there, and there's an end of it; and if he goes unlocking my desk in my absence, and ferreting about for what he can find, it's very dishonest of him, that's all I've got to say. He ought to be ashamed of himself, to turn spy in that way. And even if he did see that letter, it's no great harm. He must expect that a young fellow like me must have some female acquaintances. And where's the harm in it? I hope he did not see the letter though, for all that; and I don't believe he did.

I wish I did not feel so miserable. I think a little brandy would do me good. There's some in master's room, if I could only get at it. I'm not afraid to go, not I; but I have not forgotten that last affair. I think I shall never forget that—it gave me such a shock. What a stupid affair it was, after all! I did nothing wrong—then. I could have done just as well without the cheque-book; but I must needs be so nice about the signature, and thought there was a cheque drawn and signed, but not filled up. And there was not.

I might just as well have remained in the office. I had everything there I wanted, and his handwriting, in a thousand shapes, before me. Then what made me lock the door? There was the mischief. If I had not done that, and he had found me in the room, I could have made an excuse about having come in search of him, for some business matter, and I should have escaped that dreadful fright. Although it all came to nothing, it makes me shudder even now to think of it.

I was so busy looking over the papers that I did not hear him coming: in fact, I thought him away at the other end of the town; when all at once I heard the handle of the door turn, and at the sound I dropped the cheque-book, as if I had been shot. I stood listening with my hair bristling up with a cold creeping, and I could hear my heart beat as distinctly as ever I heard anything in my life. I was caught in my own trap. Then I heard master turn the handle again in his sharp, angry way, and I knew that he tried to look through the keyhole.

"The key is in the lock!" I heard him say, with an exclamation of surprise and impatience.

I got a little cooler after that, and wondered what I should do. I thought of the window: could I not creep out, and drop into the yard? No! it was too deep; and if I got down without breaking my neck, I should have to come through the kitchen, to get up-stairs to my room. No! I must stand and face it, however it might end. Then I heard him push and wrench at the door, as if he would tear it open.

"Some one must be inside," he said; "a thief I do believe. The door could never lock itself."

I knew then that Mrs. Syms, the housekeeper, was by, for I heard her half scream at his talk about a thief.

"Are you sure, sir, you did not lock the door yourself," she said, in quite a tremulous voice, "and have laid the key down somewhere?"

"Ridiculous nonsense!" cried he, quite in a passion; "I never do such things. Besides, it's locked from the other side. It must be broken open."

"Oh, don't, sir!" cried Mrs. Syms, quite frightened. "Suppose it should be a thief, and he should spring out upon you, and kill you!"

"I'll risk that," cried master, in his high, resolute way, and made a drive at the door. But it was very strong, and did not yield in the least.

What should I do when he broke in, which he was sure to do, sooner or later? I had not thought of it before, and, God forgive me, if I thought of it now! But it was Mrs. Syms put it into my head. When she said, "Spring out upon you and kill you," the resolution came to me at once, and I crept to the fireplace, and took the bright steel poker in my hand. I did not want—I did not mean to kill him; but if he burst in upon me, it seemed as if there was nothing for me to do, but to strike him to the ground with the weapon I had taken in my hand. I crept softly to the door—I don't know why I crept, unless it was that I still hoped it might pass over, and I might escape undetected; but I crept softly to the door, and stood behind it waiting for him to come in.

"I do think it's all a mistake, sir!" said Mrs. Syms, "for I can't hear a breath inside."

"We'll soon see that," said master, fuming and wrenching at the handle. "Get me the large hammer."

I heard the housekeeper's feet pattering along the passage, and then it seemed to me as if I and master stood face to face, although the closed door was still between us. A few minutes more, perhaps, and he would be in upon me—and then! I know what I meant to do; but it did not seem to me like murder. And yet it was murder I was bent upon; for so sure as he had opened the door should I have struck him down, if it had been his death-blow. Thank God, I was spared that crime! I say, thank God! but sometimes I feel as if my hand was red with blood already, for, of a verity, I meant to do it!

As I stood silently watching for the awful moment, which I felt must come, I heard master muttering to himself in angry ejaculations at Mrs. Syms's delay. At least five minutes had passed, and yet she did not come.

"I must go and fetch it myself, I suppose," burst out my master, at length. And then I heard him run down the passage.

I was delivered! I never knew how swiftly, and how softly I could move. In a thought my weapon was put back in its place, the door silently unlocked, and I speeding like the wind towards the office. I thought I should have fainted, as I sat once more at my desk, with my head in my hands. I felt half choked, and my heart beat against my side like a hammer. But I got over it after a little—before he came in—and joined in the search for the thief, who had locked himself in master's room. I shall never forget the fright, and I remember I was very grateful for my escape, and thanked God for it in my room at night.

I sometimes wish I had taken warning, and left off—but what's the use of thinking about it? I've gone on taking more than ever: and I'm not found out yet. Not yet, no, not yet! I wonder whether he did look into my desk yesterday. Perhaps he is watching me now—I mean, perhaps he has set a watch upon me, and will pounce down upon me all at once. I feel very miserable. I wish I could go back; but that can't be. What's done, can't be undone; but, oh, save me from being found out!

There's the church-bell going. I had almost forgotten this was Sunday. I won't go to church—to-day; I'll go next Sunday—perhaps. Why should I go? I know all they will say, and that won't do me any good. I don't feel in the humour to go to church: I won't be a hypocrite this Sunday, at any rate. Perhaps I shall feel better next Sunday; but I don't want to be preached at to-day, and the parson always seems to preach at me. I mustn't stay away altogether, though: I should be suspected. I wonder whether he does suspect me. Perhaps he has found out something—knows where I was last night—has taken the number of that note. Ha! I never thought of that. What should I do if it came to the last, and I was found out!

They seem very busy in this house—moving about. They are usually very quiet—Sunday morning, too. I'm surprised at them. Talking and whispering on the stairs like that, they ought to be ashamed of themselves. I wonder who it is. I shall give them notice, if they don't mind how they behave themselves. It disturbs me.

I do believe there are some people stopping on the landing right opposite my door. I hear them shuffling about. Like their impudence!

I must see who they are. They little think I have got a loophole here!. Two men. Not policemen, surely! They are so near the door that I cannot make them out. There is another man coming up the stairs. I know him! I have seen his face somewhere. I know him well, but cannot for the life of me remember who he is. Who can he be? Heavens! I remember! He is the clerk at the bank! I changed the last note with him! He has come to identify me, and these men are policemen! I shall fall! God help me! I am found out!

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.—I.

A SERMON FOR THE TIMES.

BY THE REV. J. C. RYLE, B.A., VICAR OF STRADBROKE.

"Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."—Gal. ii. 16.

THE text which heads this paper contains a very old subject,—“justification by faith, without the deeds of the law.” Old as it is, I trust you are not weary of it. Be sure it is one that you can never know too well. We shall all find out that, when we come to our deathbeds.

Old, in one sense, the subject must be, of necessity: it was born immediately after the Fall, when the way of salvation was first revealed to Adam. The first saint that ever entered paradise was, doubtless, justified by faith in the blood of a Redeemer, and not by his own works.

New, in a certain sense, the subject will always be as long as the world stands. Naturally, we have no knowledge of it. Acquaintance with it is not hereditary. Even in this nineteenth century, each man that would be saved must learn the lesson for himself. He that would be saved must begin by learning “justification by faith, without the deeds of the law.”

Whether old or new, the subject must always be of incalculable importance. The prosperity of churches, the success of the Christian ministry, the salvation of men's souls, the life of missions, are all inseparably connected with it. They have been, they are, they will be, until the archangel's trumpet shall sound, and Christ shall come again.

The passage of Scripture which immediately precedes my text is of itself sufficiently remarkable. It records a fact nowhere else mentioned in God's Word—the fact that on a certain occasion one inspired apostle found it necessary to oppose another in defence of justification by faith. It tells us how St. Paul withstood even St. Peter, at Antioch, because “he was to be blamed,” and “walked not uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel.” It contains the language which St. Paul addressed to his erring brother, and of which the text before us, I believe, forms a part. But these are things I cannot dwell upon now. I purposely confine myself to the matter lying within the words of the text. I therefore propose to bring together all I have to say under two heads. First, I will state the doctrine which the text contains; and secondly, I will point out the practical lessons which the subject ought to teach us in the present day.

I. I have first to state the doctrine which the text contains. In the whole range of Scripture there is, perhaps, no passage in which justification is so fully set forth as it is here. It is placed before us in every way and manner with a peculiar emphasis. Once it is put forward as an abstract truth: “Knowing that man (ἄνθρωπος) is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ.” Once it is put forward as a piece of Paul's experience “We have believed on Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the deeds of the law."—We have the negative side: "a man is not justified by works."—We have the positive side: "a man is justified by faith."—Three times we have the word "justified;" three times we are told that justification is "not by works;" twice we are told that justification is "by faith." Let us examine these expressions, so often and so emphatically reiterated, and make sure that we know what the apostle meant when he used them.

To begin with, what did St. Paul mean when he spoke of "being justified?" He meant being accounted righteous before God, and clear from all guilt of sin; being reckoned innocent and free from all liability to condemnation. It is not the being made righteous, but the being accounted righteous! For ever let us remember, and firmly grasp that great distinction. To be made righteous is one thing: that is sanctification, a thing always imperfect, because wrought within us. To be accounted righteous is another thing: that is justification, a thing perfect and complete, because dependent on something wrought without us. Not that justification and sanctification can ever be separate. No, indeed! the man that is justified will always be a man sanctified. But still they are two distinct things, and to confound them is a most dangerous mistake, and most unsound theology.

To be justified, we must ever remember, is a most full and rich privilege. It is far more than to be pardoned and acquitted. He that confines justification to that idea, in my humble judgment, takes a low view of a Christian's privileges. To be pardoned, is to be let off and spared, either because the judge is merciful and relaxes the law's strict demands, or because there is a lack of evidence, and the offence is not proven. To be justified, is to be pronounced perfectly righteous and free from all spot of blame, and dealt with as one completely innocent. The man merely pardoned, escapes punishment, and has good cause to be thankful; but the man who is justified, is one who leaves the court without a stain on his character; his sins are said, in Scripture language, to be searched for and not found, blotted out, wiped away, cast into the depths of the sea, cast behind God's back, remembered no more. The pardoned man is the prodigal son allowed to come back to his father's house, and kindly received; but the justified man is the same prodigal with the best robe on his back, the ring on his hand, the shoes on his feet, and all around rejoicing over him.

What did St. Paul mean when he said that a man is not justified by the works of the law? He meant that a man is not counted righteous before God on account of any work or doing of his own, in obedience to any law or rule of life. There is nothing whatever that man can do that can make him worthy to be reckoned innocent before God. Neither by goodness nor morality, neither by asceticism nor self-denial, neither by praying nor by Bible-reading, neither by church-going nor by sacrament-receiving, can any one be justified before God. Before men, these things may justify him, and pass muster well: they cannot justify him before God.

The reason of this assertion is plain and obvious: God is perfect, while man is most imperfect, sinful, and corrupt. The best things that man can do are weak, and poor, and corrupt, and defiled, when weighed in the balance of God's sanctuary. The eyes of an all-holy God see countless defects in everything that man does. The very best works of the holiest saint are either wrong in the motive, or faulty in the execution. As evidences of his heart's bias and inward desires they are, undoubtedly, of value; as grounds for claiming heaven, and as a title to eternal life, they are utterly worthless. He that rests on them will find in the day of need that he is like one who has built a house upon sand, or in a storm has taken refuge in a house without a roof.

But what did St. Paul mean when he spoke of being justified by the faith of Jesus Christ? He meant that we are accounted righteous before God only for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ and his finished work, through faith, as an instrument laying hold on him. The work that Jesus Christ did for us as our substitute, both in his life and death, and the righteousness which he brought in, as our Head and Redeemer, are the sole grounds on which God reckons us clear from the guilt of sin; and faith, simple faith alone, gives us an interest in that work of Christ, and so justifies us. In a word, when a man believes with his heart on Christ crucified as his Saviour, and takes Christ for his righteousness, he is said to be justified by faith.

I trust I need hardly remind you that this justifying faith is not a mere act of the intellect. No! it is the trust and confidence of a willing heart. To tell a man that, if he believes the historical fact that Christ died for sinners, he has saving faith, is, in my eyes, telling him to be content with the faith of devils.

I trust, again, that I need hardly remind you that there is nothing whatever meritorious or deserving about this justifying faith. A man, in fact, is not justified by the act of believing, but by Christ believed; just as a wound is not really healed by putting on a plaister, but by the plaister put on. Like every other act of man's heart, even the faith of God's elect is imperfect; but, seeing that it is the medium by which the soul lays hold on Christ, receives Christ, is joined to Christ, derives benefit from Christ, it may be said to justify, as the medium and instrument by which we receive justification.

I dare not dwell longer on this point. I know that I am only bringing before you ancient things; but, ancient as they are, it is good on certain occasions to pass them in review. If there is any doctrine in Christian theology that we can never know too well, it is this doctrine of justification by faith, without the deeds of the law.

This is the doctrine which the Church of England has pointed out for special note and comment in her Thirty-nine Articles. Not content with a clear definition of it in the eleventh article, our Reformers go out of the way to make the emphatic comment, "It is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort."

This is the doctrine that turned the world upside down in the days of the primitive Church. Had the apostles gone forth to preach nothing more than the necessity of an inward righteousness, and the value of self-denial, asceticism, and ordinances, they would have gone forth in vain. But the lever by which they shook men's minds was the new truth of justification by the meritorious work and death of another, made our own by simply believing.

This is the doctrine that won the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century. If Luther and his companions had been content with assailing outward abuses, they would have lived and laboured in vain. But the mainspring of their success was their bringing up into daylight, once more, justification by faith in Christ's finished work, without the deeds of the law.

This is the doctrine that revived English Christianity a hundred years ago. No man can pretend to say that Whitefield, and Wesley, and Romaine, and Berridge, and Venn were men of vast literary attainments and deep reading. In fact, they had no time for much study of any book but the Bible. But their power and influence arose from the fact that they proclaimed justification by faith, without the deeds of the law.

This is the doctrine that gives success to our missionaries in heathen lands, if they have any, in the present day. Millions would hear them unmoved, if they could only tell of Christ within us, and the need of an inward righteousness. But the truth which gives the victory is the good news of a full and complete salvation, wrought out for us by the Son of God as our substitute, and made our own freely in the moment that we believe.

Oh! how exactly the doctrine suits the wants of human nature! What poor creatures the best of us are at our very best! What countless things we leave undone that we ought to do, and do that we ought not to do! How immense the comfort of knowing that, not our work, but Christ's work—not our righteousness, but Christ's righteousness—not self, in any sense or shape, but Christ, is the foundation on which we are bid to rest, and that Christ with all his benefits is ours if we only believe. One reason, I strongly suspect, why so many professors of religion in this day are tossed to and fro, enjoy little peace and find little comfort, is their ignorance on this point. They do not see clearly that justification is by faith without the deeds of the law.

CONCERNING TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

IT is very deplorable that so many errors in opinion and heresies in doctrine should be afloat in God's world. Perhaps, however, it would be more deplorable still, if we did not remember one fact: people generally make friends with a lie only because they mistake it for a true saying. And, more than that, masses of people very seldom take up a falsehood, unless they have begun to feel keenly their want of a truth which it resembles enough to be mistaken for. If, therefore, we find a heresy very widely spread, we may conclude that the position it occupies was previously vacant, and that it did not really conquer truth, but only slipped into an empty place. Nearly all falsehoods bear witness to this fact.

Look, for example, at the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. That doctrine only gained acceptance because marriage had been previously degraded from its divine place,—because celibacy was looked upon as a vastly holier state, and because it seemed that the further back the pedigree of Christ could be pushed from the ordinary condition of humanity, the more he would be honoured.

Or look at the honour paid by Romanists to the Virgin. It has been often remarked that this superstition grew as the original conception of our Elder Brother waxed dim. When he was felt to be kind, and gentle, and good—not an austere tyrant, but a condescending friend and Mediator—then the Virgin was simply the first of women.

But when Christ was only thought of as the rigid and inflexible judge,—as the sender of punishment to the wicked even here, and their eternal torturer hereafter, then, having pushed him to a distance, men perceived that there was room enough for one to stand between them and Christ, as Christ stood between them and God. And because the temper of woman seemed best adapted to supply what they had dropped out from Christ's character, therefore a woman was promoted to the vacant dignity.

Perhaps the same train of thought could be pushed a great deal further. Perhaps the existence of Arianism and Socinianism became possible because the real humanity of Christ had become practically forgotten, while verbally confessed, in the stress laid upon his Divinity. Perhaps Christianity is broken up into so many little sects, not because men are unwilling to fraternise with many, but because the members of our larger bodies are often practically wanting entirely in brotherly sympathy for one another. People feel that Christians should be friends; they do not find friendliness in large communities; and so they fall into what I, for one, believe to be a sad mistake, seeking to intensify their mutual charity by narrowing its compass, as men rake together the embers of a smouldering fire.

Thus we see the truth of a saying of our Lord: The gates of hell do not prevail against Christ's Church. Hell's children can only occupy what the children of light are culpably willing to give up to them.

In our time, this is a truth of no little importance to the Church. Controversy has been forced upon her. The unbelief and the superstition of her professing children have alternately alarmed her; and it would be sad indeed if controversialists were not forthcoming who should say to misguided and misguiding men, "Behold, you are teaching falsehood, and not truth." God forbid that reasonable and good-tempered exposures of falsehood should be under-estimated at such a crisis; but we want to urge the reflection upon all whom it may concern, that merely to refute error is not enough to do away with it. Is it sufficient for a starving man to be told that the food in his hand is unwholesome? Do we not know that shipwrecked sailors, perishing of thirst, will drink salt water, although well aware that in a few hours it will cause them to die mad? Fresh water and wholesome food are better preventatives than cautions; and so, perhaps, the necessity for preaching controversy arises from the fact that we have not fully preached, studied, and accepted the positive doctrines which covered the disputed ground. Although Ritualism is so cunningly distinguished from Romanism that the mere exposure of the latter leaves the former unrefuted, yet there is scarcely a trace of Ritualism in Ireland, no doubt because the presence of Popery throws emphasis upon those positive doctrines which remove all appetite for either one or the other.

Hence we deduce some valuable conclusions.

1. The safety of truth consists largely in its completeness.

It is not enough to dwell upon the glorious fact that Christ has died for us. We must go on to say, "Yea, rather he is risen again, and ever liveth to make intercession for us." The priestly office of Christ in heaven, and his sprinkling the blood upon the holy places for a perpetual memorial before God, should preoccupy the place into which a human priest and a human memorial would fain intrude themselves.

Controversy is like an air-pump. It requires a costly instrument and a good deal of toil to force the atmosphere from a receptacle, which remains empty after all. But take the water of God and fill your vessel, and that, by its own superior density, will forbid the air to occupy the place. If one doctrine was enough to do this, God would never have encumbered his revelation with many. But if the Bible does not contain enough to do it, then we can hardly dignify it with the title of a revelation at all.

2. Next to the importance of holding "the whole counsel of God," is the importance of the manner in which we hold it. If mere truth were as omnipotent as we sometimes say, then every community that has a Bible ought to have been converted long ago. The fact is that truth taught coldly, or held carelessly, is not true at all. Men put together the statement and the emotion, and, although one be true, the compound is wretchedly false. We read to our people without effect that speech of Paul at which Felix trembled, and that other, which nearly persuaded Agrippa to be a Christian, chiefly because we who read them are wanting in Paul's fervour and Paul's convictions. Then the truth not only does no good, but actually does harm; for it will cause the old words that were felt to be so dry to fall upon the ear in future with deadening associations, however earnest and heartfelt the tones in which they may then be breathed. So true is it that he that is not with Christ is against him.

3. Again, we require to have truth stated in its due proportions. As well expect a man to enjoy health, if you hang him up by the heels, as hope that a system of truth will be efficacious in which the least important element takes the place due to the most vital. But how are simple-minded people to reduce all doctrines to their proper relations with each other? Scripture has discovered a beautiful and easy way out of this difficulty, a difficulty which is greatly felt by those who are expected to occupy the same half hour, whether they speak of the healing of Bartimæus or the crucifixion of the Lord. The Bible groups all its teaching around a living Person; and as we fix our eyes, not on dogmas, but on His beloved countenance, we see them all arrange themselves in perfect harmony around our true Teacher. "In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and this I say lest any man should beguile you with enticing words." Truth is dead truth, and cannot assert itself with power, words are merely words, and neither quick nor powerful, and dogmas are disjointed members without cohesion or symmetry, unless they be vitalised, animated, and systematised by Him who is pre-eminently "the Word of God."

See how these three principles are exemplified in the grand story of the Reformation. Every philosopher was laughing at the Papal pretensions, and very few of them laughed louder than some of the Popes themselves; yet Rome did not tremble nor unsheath her "sword of sharpness." Had Luther merely said masses are deceits, transubstantiation is a fable, indulgences are a refuge of lies, he would only have failed as signally as hundreds more; but because he went on to say, Faith will save you, the love of God operating through Christ is efficacious; therefore the false Church was shaken to its base. And, again, Luther was thoroughly in earnest, "like thunder," as some one says, willing to go, for his doctrine, among devils as numerous as tiles upon the houses. And, finally, Luther (even in his controversial writings, which, as I have said, were quite necessary) spoke far less about mere dogmas than about that adorable and ineffable One who has kindled all frigid doctrine into fire, even as he touches the mountains and they smoke.

Now, all this is not only wholesome doctrine, but also very full of comfort. We cannot all master the subtleties of logic, nor can ministers ever hope to train average congregations, or Sunday scholars, or families, in the way to overturn heretics. But we can drop here and there the seed of some fine truth, which will rise up and pre-occupy the ground, and leave no room for the falsehoods to insinuate themselves instead. A church whose members are sound in the whole faith and earnest in Christian practice, is not a church in which grievous wolves are likely to effect much havoc.

A DREAM OF SIN.

DREAMED that one stood by me as I slept,
Old, and with palsied shakings of the hand,
Wherein a knot of ancient keys he kept,
Whose fashion long had perished from the land.

About his hoary visage was a band,
Which caught his peaked chin unto his head;
And clad with mouldy vesture did he stand
By me, fresh waken'd from my weary bed,
The while my fearful heart beat not for hideous dread.

Betwixt me and a pallid light of dawn
His horrid shape did seem to beck away.
Methought I rose and followed, or was drawn,
Nor willing nor unwilling could I say;
And we went downward from the night and day.
I heard a noise of waters as afar,
And on my brow a chilling sweat of spray
Fell, and a tumult as of windy war;
But through the thickening dark burned one keen constant star.

We came as to a prison of the dead,
Whereat that aged man did stoop aside.
"These have been woven by thyself," he said;
And straightway me with many ropes he tied,
And flung me down, who had him nought replied,
But only tears and tremblings of the heart.
With that he laughed upon my fallen pride.
"Now rise and free thee, stubborn as thou art;
None can unbind thee here who tak'st not thine own part."

And then he vanished from my sight; but, lo!
As one who dreamed a dream within a dream,
I saw great chambers in the darkness grow,
Which hollowed out from space and night did seem.

And here and there a faint and fleeting beam
Of light informed mine eyes of that within;
I saw myself, upon the ghostly gleam,
Move through the past, from whence I did begin,
And live my days again, repeating mirth and sin.

I gazed in hunger for one worthy deed,
Which might avail my bondage to undo;
But all that richness of the past was need
And nothingness unto my searching true.
Nor help nor comfort was there in the view.
But those keen cords did bite unto my bone;
The shape grew pale with death's approaching hue.
"Alas!" I cried, "what can for thee atone, Whom that cold touch congeals, vile as thou art, to stone?"

Then One came by me, blood upon his brow,
Blood in the trembling hollow of his hand;
A moment o'er my fallen state did bow,
And touched with tears that cunning twined band.
But straight as ropes of idly gathered sand
Those bonds fell from me, and did hide amain.
My heart leaped up or ever I could stand,
And broke the spell fantastic of my brain.
The day was all abroad, yet dream'd I not in vain.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

DANGLING AND ANGLING.

AND the brothers did dangle after Peggy in a most unconscionable manner; and she, being no idle young lady, but one of the busiest people in the parish, and having no mind to encourage idleness in others, they really and truly did the work which they made the pretext of their daily visits to Delaube.

Peggy's hands had gradually become full from picking up what would, otherwise, have been left behind, and bearing the burdens which were daily dropped by her feeble servitors. Money was a scarce commodity at Delaube; but then it was not the one thing needful that it is in some places. True, everything was going to decay for lack of it; but there was firing in the wood and fish in the river, milk from the cow and vegetables from the garden. They ground their own corn for bread, had as many chickens as they chose to eat, and procured other commodities, by the primitive process of barter, at the village shop; but all this demanded labour, and both Tammas and Jean were growing unequal to the demand. The former worked the agricultural department, raising the corn for meal and the grass and turnips for the cow; but the duties of the latter were multifarious. Her first breakdown was at the needlework. She had mended her master's silk or woollen hose, and his fine ruffled shirts, till her old eyes ached again. Thanks to her now disused wheel, which stood in a corner of the kitchen, there was ample material for most household needs, and here were a pair of bright eyes and helpful hands to knit, or sew in her stead. So Peggy knitted winter hose, and made and mended, through the long winter evenings, by the light of the tallow candles set in ancient silver candlesticks, and with her grandfather's eyes fixed on her downcast face. Then she took the chickens into her charge; and, lastly, the making up of the butter, and all the lighter work of the dairy, fell into her hands.

The only work of hers in which her grandfather would take a lively interest, though he watched her in all, was her fishing. The details of her sport would rouse him from his lethargy as nothing else would. He made Tammas bring down a rod and line of his own, and he himself, with trembling hands, put them in order for her. He knew that Tammas was not to be trusted with a hook, for the sake of his own and his neighbours' flesh. But Peggy could really bring home a dish of trout, though she never overcame a certain repugnance to kill the shining creatures as they quivered on the grass; and she continued to fish, not for the pleasure, but the profit of it, as it supplied an additional dish much prized by Jean on her own, but especially on her master's account. Peggy would have to tell the old man the very stone where a fine one had been hooked, and the fly that had caught him, and which he himself had taught her how to dress and when to use. The stream was famous for its salmon; and once, with the assistance of Tammas, Peggy had landed her fish; and more than once, but for the breaking of the line, which she ran and twisted round a tree for the purpose, the fish would have dragged her into the depths of the Strathie Pool.

Now, if there were ruffles to be mended, there sat Archie and Sandie, in the summer-house, among the cabbages and gooseberries, chattering away, with those curved backs of theirs, and mouths and eyes of utter fascination. If there was fruit to be picked, there were three pairs of hands at it in the hot afternoon, for Jean did not hold to gathering it with the dew for her jams and jellies. She looked rather glum when they invaded the dairy, where they were a complete hindrance; but, on the other hand, Tammas profited largely by their help. They would set to work and repair a fence in workman-like fashion, and their own mother would not have known them while they cut a field of grass, or dug out a great plot of potatoes, under Peggy's superintendence.

Often, too, they brought their books into the wood, and would have made a mere pretence of reading, except for Peggy's presence; but she sat there, a silent monitress, busily engaged in drawing from Nature. It had grown into a passion with her, to trace the minute and varied loveliness of every tender wilding that grew about her, and the visible progress of her skill was the most exciting stimulus to exertion they had ever felt.

Of course they fished together, and these were the times of keenest enjoyment to all three. On a cool, cloudy afternoon they would meet at Strathie Pool, where the water, having run its most rugged course, collected in a great granite basin to flow out smoothly into a clearer channel along the Strath. Then they would pass down stream as far as they wished, and fish up to and beyond the pool.

They had been at it for hours, on such an afternoon, and had been more than usually successful. They were, indeed, about to leave off for the day, and were lazily fishing towards Delaube by way of seeing Peggy home. Archie carried her basket, while Sandie bore the fruits of his own and his brother's labours on his back. They came to a tempting spot, where the trout were leaping every minute, and Sandie lay down flat on the bank and took a last throw, while Archie and Peggy stepped out on a ledge of granite to have a better chance. Peggy had been first on the ledge and she sprang lightly to another, which took her nearly into the middle of the stream. There she stood, mirrored in the glassy pool, which was dimpled by the leaping fish, and darkened by the fantastic cloud-shadows. Suddenly she gave a little cry, her line tightened and began to run off the reel.

"It's a salmon!" cried Archie, whisking in his own line, and flinging his rod and basket on the grass, then jumping into the water to Peggy's assistance.

She gave up her rod into his hands, and followed him in his series of leaps to the bank.

"We'll have a run for it before we land this fellow," he cried, as the line ran out rapidly, and he began to rush along the rugged bank, wooded at this part to the water's edge.

Sandie drew in and prepared to follow. "I would rather sit down and wait for you here," said Peggy, who had had several hours' scrambling already. "Don't come back if he takes you far. I can go home if you are long of coming."

With the last sentence, she had had to raise her voice after her companions, and their shouts in reply came from a growing distance as she threw herself on the bank to wait.

She had scarcely seated herself, when she was startled by a voice from above, with the unusual accost—"Miss Oglivie, of Delaube, I believe?"

She looked up, and close to her, on the slope above, stood a young man, leaning hand and foot against a tree to keep himself upright. He was like no one she had ever seen before. Grace and elegance were not native to the soil of that region, though there were nobler things that were.

"That is my name," said Peggy, gravely, rising to her feet.

"I have been looking on at your sport," he said, "and you see I have guessed rightly. Miss Janet Oglivie told me I was sure to find you in the wood. If I had not, I was coming on to Delaube. I have come to claim cousinship, which counts to the fortieth degree in this part of the country." He held out his hand.

In it Peggy placed hers frankly, but still gravely.

"Why do you never go near the old ladies down yonder?" he went on; "they would be glad to see you now and then, I should think."

The tears started to Peggy's eyes, and the colour deepened on her cheeks, as she answered, "I will never go there again."

"Margery is rather terrible, I own," he said, "and I believe she frightened you. She has a dreadful notion that we are a doomed race, we Oglivies, and must suffer for the sins of our fathers to the fourth generation. We are only the third, you know. And so she thinks she is working out the decrees of Providence by helping to keep us as miserable as possible."

"But you don't believe in it," said Peggy, with a smile; "at least, not in that way?"

"Not exactly," he replied; "and yet I've had my share of the punishment in being sent into the world a poor man. I suspect we both suffer for the sins of our fathers in that respect."

"But I do not suffer; I am not punished," she answered, earnestly; "I am very happy, God is very good," she lowered her voice at the close of her little speech, half in reverence, half as unused to give expression to such thoughts. Her companion, in the meanwhile, perusing her face with curiosity and interest, mingled with amusement.

"Well, you may have escaped," he continued, "but it's more than I have. I wonder you don't go and see the old ladies though. They've an awful time of it, shut up with an idiot in that dismal hole. It would soon make an idiot of me, I know."

"I cannot go to them," said Peggy, softly; "they do not want me, and they turned my mother from their doors. I did not know that when I went before."

"I did not know it either," he replied; "indeed, I know very little of the family history, or of the family either. But we must be friends," he added, with emphasis on the we.

Just then they caught a glimpse of the returning anglers, and Archie and Sandie, shouting, dolefully, "We've lost the game! he's got off with the hook!" came up breathless. Shyness was not one of their faults—that generally belongs to quicker and more sensitive natures—but they hung back a little when they saw a fine gentleman talking to their companion.

Peggy lost no time in introducing them; only she hesitated at the word "cousin," and looked up for the name of her kinsman.

"Captain Oglivie," he said, graciously, and both the youths made an awkward bow.

Archie was proceeding to lift Peggy's basket and rod, when the captain interfered with a polite, "Allow me to carry them," which made the poor fellow stand back, somewhat abashed.

"Perhaps we had better go home," said Sandie, and as there seemed to be a general acquiescence in the proposal, Peggy shook hands with her old friends and walked up the hill with the new one. They spoke very little by the way, and at the garden gate the captain delivered up the rod and basket, and pleaded the lateness of the hour as a reason for not going up to the house. He took Peggy's little hand at parting, and carried it gallantly to his lips, and repeating, "We must be friends," left her blushing and trembling at the gate.

CHAPTER X.

A DISH OF FISH.

As Peggy turned into the garden walk, she caught sight of Jean, standing with her straight old back against the doorpost. Her blue checked apron was thrown over one red, wrinkled arm, so as to form a bag, in which revolved a ball of worsted, which she was rapidly transforming into strong winter hose. She knitted quite mechanically, needing neither eyes nor brain for her work, so that she saw her young mistress as soon as she entered the path. The old woman did not move; Peggy would have been ashamed if she had offered to come and carry the basket.

She advanced up the walk slowly, and flung it down at the old woman's feet, who, seeing it look satisfactorily heavy, picked it up and carried it within.

"You're late," she said, "but you hav'na come empty handed;" and she proceeded to take down a dish and count out the spoil.

But Peggy stood abstracted, and as if she neither saw nor heard; then she said, abruptly, "That was Captain Oglivie, Jean."

"What was Captain Oglivie?" queried the old woman, looking up with an air of astonishment.

"The gentleman who came to the gate with me," answered Peggy.

"I saw nae gentleman!" said Jean, who looked as if her young mistress had lost her senses.

"But he is a gentleman and my cousin," said Peggy, still thinking she must have seen him, which she had not, for he had retreated just as she turned her head in his direction.

"Where fell ye in wi' him?" asked Jean, with some asperity.

"At the fishing," answered the girl, not in the least resenting the tone, which was habitual to that privileged person.

"And the Grants were with you?" Jean put in.

Peggy assented, and the old woman entered on a keen cross-examination.

"What was he like?" was her next question.

Peggy tried to remember. She had a vivid enough image in her own mind, but she found it difficult to convey it in detail to another.

It flashed through Jean's mind that the girl's father might have wandered into the neighbourhood, and sought to see her in this way, so she went on with her catechism.

"Was he young?"

"Not very," Peggy meant not so young as herself or her companions. In Jean's eyes Louis Oglivie would still have been young.

"Was he fair?"

"I am not sure," was the answer.

"Has he blue eyes?"

"I don't know in the least," said Peggy, laughing; "but he is tall—as tall as gran'papa must have been—and his face is clear, so clear that you do not notice the colour of his hair or his eyes."

Jean knew at once that this could not be Mr. Louis, changed as might be the sunny curls, and fruit-like tints of the face she had adored in its bright boyhood.

"I ken nae such Captain Oglivie," she said, tartly, as she laid the trout, tenderly, side by side in the dish; "but if I were you I'd hae little to do with any Oglivie of them."

She had dismissed the subject. "They're bonnie beasties," she murmured, greatly mollified, as she contemplated the heap on the platter.

But Peggy returned to the charge. "I had better tell gran'papa about him," she said.

"You had better no," was the reply. "He's more than ordinar' ill. He's been mutterin' to himsel' the whole afternoon; if ye were to say anything to 'mind him o' the old troubles, I would na' answer for the consequences: another stroke would clean kill him, and ye might bring it on."

"Oh, Jean!" cried the girl, reproachfully.

"Weel, weel, lassie, gang and show him the bonnie creatures, and that'll please him," said the old woman, coaxingly.

Peggy threw aside her hat, pushed back her clustered curls, and taking the dish in her two hands, went up-stairs to present her offering to her grandfather.

The old man was seated in his chair in the attitude of one who seeks warmth from a sinking fire; his stately figure was bent, his white locks, escaping from his black velvet cap, lay on his shoulders. Something of awe and of desolation struck the girl with a sudden, sharp pang of pity, as she saw him thus. He sat erect at her approach, looking sternly indifferent till he saw who it was. She had often acted the little scene before; such acts of grace came quite naturally from her, due, perhaps, to the slight strain of French blood in her veins. She went down on her knees on the hearth-rug and playfully held up the dish, but with a new, womanly tenderness in her smile and attitude, which unconsciously penetrated the old man's heart.

"Very good sport, little one," he said, looking at her with a wan smile.

"Yes," she answered; "and we nearly caught a salmon besides. I had him, but Archie Grant let him off, after a short run. I was tired and the ground was rough, so I did not follow. There's Jean, waiting to take possession of them," she added, as the white cap of Mistress Jean appeared at the door.

Peggy rose and handed out the fish to the old servant, and then, shutting the door, came back and sat down on a low stool at her grandfather's feet.

If she had purposed to divert his mind from the madness of contemplating the misery of the past, she could not have done anything wiser than simply sit there in silence. She did not know it; but he looked at her and was comforted. Sitting there, helpless and alone, he devised experiments of torture for himself; no longer raving at the untimely death of his body, with the greater calmness which time had brought, he believed himself to be growing incapable of thought or feeling, condemned to die a living death, mentally as well as bodily. In order to test its progress it was that he inflicted these self-tortures. He would call up the saddest and wildest scenes of his wild and disappointed life, wherewith to harrow his soul: the parting with the wife of his youth, whom he had loved with growing passion, and whom Peggy often reminded him of; the death of his wild kinsman; the desertion he had suffered; the evidence of baseness in the son he had reared; the terrible contrast between the power and promise of his youth, and the feebleness and helplessness of his age, from which had departed all strength and blessing, and love and honour.

After he had looked at her a while, he broke the silence, saying, "You'll be leaving me some day, little one."

Peggy started and drew nearer at the unusual speech. Like all she did, the unconscious movement was quicker than speech in its expression of her thought. She laid her head against his knee with a caressing touch.

"You like me a little, I think," he said, laying a thin hand on her head, and speaking with the self-restraint of his race in matters of affection.

"Oh, not a little, if you will only let me," cried Peggy, looking up in his face earnestly.

Her more demonstrative nature craved for some utterance, and suffered from its repression. At the same time it had too much depth to exhaust itself in the process, as shallow natures do.

"No, no, little one, I don't want much from you," he answered, mournfully. "I did but waste what was mine, and I have nothing to give you in return. No, no, I do not want too much from you. You will leave me some day; if I go first, it's little enough you will have. This place is all that's left of a wasted inheritance. You'll give it, and your name some day, to a better man than ever owned either."

"Dinna speak that way," said Peggy, weeping and taking to Scotch to express her emotion; "I'll never leave you!"

Just then Jean entered with the silver candlesticks and made the usual preparations for tea. She left the door open and bustled in and out, and Peggy withdrew to a little distance. The smell of the trout came up from the kitchen; the little babble of meal-time talk began, and life seemed to divide itself in two. Would there come a time to her, thought the eager-hearted girl, throbbing with all intense though vague emotion, when life would consist for the most part in caring for itself, and a dish of fish be more to her than beauty, and love, and joy? Poor grandpapa! poor Jean! mournful and awful age.

CHAPTER XI.

REASONS FOR RETICENCE.

WHEN Archie and Sandie Grant parted reluctantly from Peggy and her new-found friend, instead of turning their faces steadily homeward, they began perversely to loiter by the way. Archie took to whistling and thrashing the stream in a meaningless fashion, and Sandie pulled his book out of his pocket and began to read. They knew it was high time to be home, for the last red streak had died out of the sky and from the river, and yet they lingered, and neither said one word to the other on the subject of their thoughts. Star after star, began to glimmer in the pools. It was dusk among the trees, and the moths and bats were flitting and fluttering.

"We're dreadful late," said Sandie, breaking silence at length, and looking full in his brother's face with a comical expression of chagrin.

Archie burst out laughing. He saw his own mood reflected there, and its ridiculous aspect struck him; the other smiled. "Come on," he said, and with his hand on Sandie's shoulder quickened his pace.

It seemed as though the brothers understood each other perfectly, without the help of words, for they reached home, walking very fast at last, without further colloquy.

The evening meal—a sort of heavy tea, to which the lads had been expected—had been long disposed of, and had not been suffered to remain on the table, in comfortable discomfort, as easy-going Mr. Grant suggested. It had been duly cleared off, and had to be duly brought in again, with an amount of delay and trouble calculated to dismay and deter a delinquent. This would have been the case had the delinquency extended to minutes instead of hours, as in the present instance. It had been the doctor's own lot to realise the solemnity of such a meal, and Mrs. Grant had just been talking to him very seriously about the necessity for maintaining discipline in his family; but as the second edition of tea was ordered, he judiciously made his escape—certainly an unfair proceeding on his part.

"What has kept you so late?" was their mother's greeting. "We waited for you as long as we possibly could. I wonder hunger did not drive you home. I'm sure you're impatient enough when you're here. It was anything but right," she added, in a tone of vexation, "for Peggy Oglivie to be out till this time, and I mean to tell her so."

This little sentence, in the tail of her speech, carried the sting, as she meant it to do; but she was not quite prepared for the result.

"Mother," said Archie, resentfully—more resentfully than ever she had heard one of her sweet-blooded lads speak in his life—"you're no right to say that; it was no blame of hers."

"No! If she bade you jump into Strathie Pool, and you were fool enough to get drowned for your pains, it would be no fault of hers."

"Mother," interposed Sandie, mildly, but in an injured tone, "Peggy went home long ago, and we've been idling down the water all the time."

At this point the doctor thought fit to re-enter, and make a diversion in order to restore the good humour of the party, never very difficult, under the most aggravated circumstances. He did not know that it was more difficult than it had ever been before.

"What have you been about, youngsters?" he said; "caught half the trout in the river, eh?"

Amid unwonted and puzzling gloom, Sandie answered, "Caught plenty, papa, but lost a salmon."

"Ha! ha!" broke out the misled man, "lost a salmon! is that it? lost what ye never found. Most men lose in that way, and think themselves ill-used mortals enough. He led you a pretty chase, I dare say," he added, willing to open the way for what seemed a valid excuse.

"That wasn't what kept us," said scrupulous Sandie. "Peggy hooked him, and he only took us on about half a mile, and then gave us the slip."

The erratic doctor again departed, rubbing his hands, and not inclined for further investigation. Mrs. Grant took up her needlework in silent displeasure, and the lads, notwithstanding the discomfort which they felt, fell to work voraciously on the oaten cake, the fresh butter, and new-laid eggs of the repast. Not a word, however, was said about the stranger.

After the meal came family worship, and nothing was ever discussed after that. The doors were locked, and the household retired to rest.

THE USEFUL HOLIDAY.

ELL, what did mother say: are we to have a half-holiday or not? Make haste, can't you, Willy, and tell us!"

Willy was very young, and very fat, and very deliberate in all his movements; he was, besides, the smallest of all the children in the schoolroom, and yet, when any favour was to be asked of the higher powers, Willy was invariably the public messenger. His father and mother had given him, in consequence, the name of the "Solicitor-general;" and a capital solicitor he made, seldom failing in any suit he took in hand. But he came up the three steps leading to the schoolroom unusually slowly this morning, and did not answer his elder brother's question till he had been dragged into the centre of the room and given a very mild shake to help out his words.

"Speak up now, Willy, that's a good boy: did she say yes, or no?"

"At first she said no," replied Willy, gravely; "that she could not give two half-holidays in one week. But when I told her that you all promised you would try and be useful, she laughed, and said she would see this once what a useful holiday was like, and so we are to have it."

"Bravo, Willy—three cheers for the Solicitor-general! You are a splendid boy for begging!" and Jack, seizing his younger brother by both his fat arms, swung him across his shoulders, and carried him in triumph round the room.

"That will do now," he cried, setting him down on the rug in front of the fire, "for we must all begin and think of some sort of game that will be at the same time both tremendously jolly and useful."

"Let us weed our flower-beds, they are full of groundsel," suggested Bessie.

"Weed flower-beds! did any one ever hear such a stupid proposition?—to stoop all day in the sun, and break our backs into the bargain!"

"Well, let us cover the jam-pots for mamma; she was saying last night how glad she would be if they were all finished and put by in the store-room."

"That's not a bad idea," replied Jack, a little dubiously; "but don't you think we might strike out something with more fun in it? Come, Willy, what do you propose? As you got us the holiday you ought to speak first."

"I know," replied Willie, thoughtfully; "let's blow bubbles."

A general shout of laughter greeted the Solicitor-general's suggestion.

Dora, at length, was the one to start the very useful plan which they all, save Bessie, agreed at once to carry into execution.

"I know a splendid way of being useful. I have read heaps of things like it in books. Let's go down to old Kate's room in the yard, and light her fire and boil her kettle, and make her tea, and have everything delightfully comfortable for her when she comes home from town in the evening. And we might bake her a cake, too, and put currants in it."

"Oh, jolly!" cried Jack; "I'll blow the bellows strong, Willie will put the kettle on, and we'll all have tea."

Old Kate, whose interests the children had taken so suddenly to heart, was an infirm old woman, who, having been a servant for forty years in their father's family, had been given a comfortable room and kitchen in the farmyard, where she lived in ease, having no heavier occupation than gathering the eggs from the hen-house, and superintending the hatching and rearing of the young broods of fowl.

But every Saturday, like the children, she had a half-holiday, and went to see her son, who was coachman to a gentleman living in the town. She had not, as you may imagine, much money to spare, yet she seldom returned from this pilgrimage without a bag of gingerbread nuts or sweetmeats hidden in the folds of her great market-cloak.

The children were not long in putting on their hats and cloaks, and dashing down the terraces towards the farmyard, which was completely hidden from the house by a grove of beech-trees.

The first sudden chill was given to their useful plan by finding the door of Kate's room locked; the second, by the discovery that all the flour which Dora had coaxed from the cook had poured out through a hole in the cloth in which she had carried it, and left a long white snow track from the house door to the yard.

"Aint you a stupid, just!" cried Jack, angrily; but the next moment, discovering the key of Kate's door shining under the threshold beneath which she had hidden it, his vexation gave way to triumph.

"Now fer it, boys and girls! where are we to begin to be useful?" and Jack looked round the neat room, adorned with pretty prints, and on whose shelves were ranged in orderly state a set of real china cups and saucers, given to the old woman by her son.

"Let us begin by the fire," cried Dora; "I know where she keeps her faggots."

"And here's the bellows," cried Willy, dragging forth an implement nearly as large as himself from beneath the table. "I'll blow the bellows and make smoke."

"Oh, is it not delightful, being useful!" cried Dora, crushing the wood by handfuls into the empty grate; "it's the best fun we ever had."

Soon the fire was blazing up the chimney, the coal crackling, and the kettle singing; while Willie blew the bellows as if his life depended on his energy.

"Now let us lay the table, and set the tea-things," suggested Dora, "we can get down those lovely red-and-white cups and plates, and make everything look as grand as possible."

"Gorgeous—perfectly gorgeous!" cried Jack, as all the arrangements were completed. "Why Queen Victoria might come and drink tea with Kate to night, she is so grand. Willie, why do you keep on blowing the bellows at that rate?"

"Because it is so very useful," replied Willie, with the most perfect simplicity; "and besides, I like the way it breathes through its nose."

"Well, leave its nose alone now, and hie off to the house instead, Solicitor-general, and get the cook to give us some more flour for a cake; she will give it to you, if you ask her: and if you carry it down in a jug it won't spill."

"And now let some one else go off to the garden, and get some flowers to stick in this mug on the table," continued Jack, authoritatively. "I say, where's Bessie?"

"Bessie did not come down," answered Dora, quickly. "I saw her going into mamma's room, and taking out the paper for covering the jam. Isn't she a goose, to lose all this fun? I'll go now and get the flowers, and you can make the tea."

"All right! I'll rummage for the tea-caddy, and mind you bring back a good bunch."

In about ten minutes Dora returned, with a handful of geraniums and other flowers, which she had plucked at random, hither and thither, in the conservatory. But she found Jack standing at the door, looking considerably less bright than when she had left him.

"I say, here's a nice business," he cried. "Willy left the bellows sticking in the fire, and it's all come unglued and dropped in two; and when I tried to pull out the nose, I burned both my fingers, and they're smarting like fun."

"Dear, dear! how stupid of him!" replied Dora.

"And while I was looking for the tea-caddy, the kettle boiled over, and the whole floor is in a swim of water."

"Never mind that; we can dry it up with rubbers. I know where Kate keeps her rubbers."

"How dirty the flags are," cried Dora, looking at the rubbers as she squeezed the water out of them.

"I say, Jack, let's wash Kate's floor for her—that would be really useful."

"You may if you like," replied Jack, "but my fingers are burning like two coals."

Dora tucked up her sleeves, poured the kettle of boiling water into a large tub, and went out to the pump for some cold water to cool it with. When she returned, Jack's face had fallen considerably lower.

"Now what do you think has happened?" he cried.

"What?" asked Dora, appalled.

"The whole thing has gone over, body and bones, and every cup and saucer and plate is smashed, and the teapot, too, into the bargain."

At this moment the doorway was darkened, and both the children looked up. There stood poor old Kate, in her long cloth cloak and poke bonnet, in an attitude of horrified surprise.

"Mercy on me! mercy on me this day! what has happened? look at all my beautiful china broken in pieces! Master Jack, Master Jack, what has happened?"

Jack stared at Dora; Dora stared at Jack. Both blushed very red; but neither answered.

Again the doorway was darkened, and the children, looking up, grew redder still. It was their mother, holding poor little Willy by the hand, his face and hair covered with flour, and his fingers cut and bleeding.

"What is the meaning of all this, Jack?" she asked, looking bewilderedly around her. "When I came in from driving, I found poor little Willy lying on the ground at the foot of the terrace, crying, with a broken jug in his hand. I asked him where you were, and what you were doing, and he said you were doing useful things down at Kate's cottage."

"And so—we—we—were—trying—to be useful," sobbed Dora, covering her face with her hands.

Mrs. Garrett looked at the broken china on the floor—the faggots scattered about—the house linen in a wet heap by the fire—the bellows on the hearth, the snout still sticking in the fire, and the splendid hothouse flowers, cast in a crushed heap upon a chair.

"I am afraid, judging by all I see around me, you have scarcely succeeded, children, in your endeavours. It will take many weeks' pocket-money, and a great many good marks, to make up for the results of this useful holiday. I can quite believe, however," she continued, kindly, "that neither of you began this exploit with the intention of being so mischievous; indeed, I feel sure you did intend to be useful."

"We did indeed, mother," pleaded both the children, humbly.

"I think I can show you why you failed," replied Mrs. Garrett; "you tried to make amusement come first, and usefulness second. Now, if you had only looked around you at home, how many really useful things you might have found to do—in how many different ways you might have helped me in the house. I was really in hopes that, on my return from driving, I should have found your flower-beds weeded; the jam covered; or some of you helping nurse to take care of the little ones. Poor Bessie alone has proved herself deserving of another holiday, by really trying to do what she knew would give others pleasure, and save them both trouble and time. She did not try to make her own pleasure and fun come first in the duty she undertook, yet now she is feeling a thousand times happier than either of you."

The children could not but agree in their hearts in every word that their mother said. They again besought Kate's pardon, which was not withheld, and went home sad enough; but, in the end, the lesson proved a useful one, as it taught both Dora and Jack that they need not go beyond the circle of their own house and home to find the means of doing good, or of spending a useful holiday.

THE "QUIVER" ORPHAN-HOME FUND.

We have much pleasure in submitting to our readers an engraving of the Orphan Home at Ham Common, on the left side of which is seen the design of the proposed "Quiver Wing." Our present list speaks favourably for our progress; but we still, however, need the kind efforts of our readers to complete the sum of £1,000 required for this most deserving cause; and, on receipt of a stamped envelope, we shall be happy to forward more collecting-papers to any who may require them.—ED. THE LIVERY

— Saturday, October 19, 1867. —

ST. MARY OVERY, LONDON BRIDGE.

THE BLACK CANONS; THE CHURCH, AND JOHN GOWER THE POET.

“SHIPS, colonies, and commerce,” were three words often uttered by Napoleon; their united powers conquered even him; and the scene daily witnessed at the foot of London Bridge, tells of other victories won by those three great forces of the modern world. The river, with its long vista of masts; the bridge, with its hurrying multitudes, and ceaseless tide of "goods, wares, and merchandise;" the great railway stations, presenting a traffic which Babylon, "the glory of kingdoms," never knew; those telegraphic wires, speaking to India on one side, and to America on the other; and yon long line of river warehouses, containing the riches of remote nations—all these are daily attesting the triumph of "ships, colonies, and commerce."

What has St. Mary Overy to do with the spirit of maritime dominion? Look at the ancient church, and mark how, on this very spot, the commercial power has hemmed in the ecclesiastical. On one side, huge warehouses press closely upon the church, on the other, the railway trains pass, as if shouting victory over the departed Black Canons. In every quarter the trophies of the new order of things rise. If we look across the river, the massive Cannon Street Railway Station stands full in view, vaster than the priory in its brightest days. St. Mary Overy evidently feels the change. Move from this tumultuous spot she cannot; but see how she tries to sink out of notice, down in yonder hollow. Yet, Mary's seat is not really lower than of yore, but the ambitious world has enthroned itself on high, and the maiden seems seated in the dust.

Is not St. Mary Overy usually called St. Saviour's? Who, then, was Mary, and what does Overy denote? Some uncivil critics call Mary a myth; but to apply this term to a lady seems rude. The old and popular story is, that Mary was the daughter of a rich Saxon ferryman, who, before the coming of the Normans, made his fortune by carrying passengers over the river at this place. All his money went to Mary, who devoted it, and also the profits of the ferry, to the founding of a nunnery, called St. Mary Overy, or St. Mary over the water. But the doubters say this tradition took its present form 500 years after the time of the supposed Mary. John Stow, however, points out, with easy faith, the very place where Mary was buried. The author of a pamphlet, published in 1744, evidently knew all about her father, the Saxon waterman, who is there called John Overs. John was a terribly covetous fellow, and on one occasion pretended to be dead, hoping all the servants and family would fast for at least one day, and thus effect a saving. The servants, however, began to feast. This was too much for the miser, who descended to the kitchen, wrapped in his winding-sheet. The panic was indescribable, of course; but one of the terrified apprentices knocked out the brains of John Overs with a broken oar. This was not all; Mary's lover, hearing the news, took horse for London, and illustrated the proverb, "More haste, less speed." Being thrown from his saddle, the eager lover was killed on the spot; and Mary, poor lass, determined to become a nun, and founded St. Mary Overy. Now, is not that a sensational story? Who would give it up for all the critics in London?

We are told that afterwards the nunnery was turned into a "college of priests" by a lady named Swithen, and that these collegiate men built the first London Bridge. That the priests should destroy all the revenues derived from the ferry by erecting a bridge, is rather improbable.

There seems reason for believing that William Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, aided in settling the Black Canons here, and in building the nave of the church.

The rules at St. Mary Overy bound every "brother" to work till midday; from dinner to three o'clock was given to study; then all might walk out, but not singly, "two-and-two" being the order, and it was absolutely ruled that no canon was "to gaze on women;"—a very proper regulation.

Let us take one look at St. Mary Overy as it appeared in the days of old. On the west side of the church ran the cloisters; a quiet walk, where many a debate was carried on, and many a free word safely spoken on Church and State. Not far from the cloisters rose the stately mansion of the Bishops of Winchester, with its park of sixty acres, and on the south side of the priory stood another episcopal residence, Rochester House. But close to the priory, almost within sound of the daily chants, was the Clink Prison, in the midst of a den of thieves, and near to the notorious colony of "single women."

The priory buildings, Winchester Hall, Rochester House, and the Clink, went when the Reformation came. When Linsted, the last of the thirty-two priors surrendered the monastic property in 1539, the gross yearly income of the priory amounted to £656 18s. 0½d. Let not the reader smile at the odd halfpenny, it shows careful book-keeping. A part of the revenue was appropriated for pensions to the prior and canons. The "parchments" of St. Mary Overy's probably fell into the hands of some ignorant fellow, who looked upon all writings as did Jack Cade, when he cried, "Burn all the records." Certainly most of the old documents were destroyed. A part of the priory register was discovered a few years ago, forming the head of a child's drum! The horrified antiquaries soon rescued this fragment, and placed it in the British Museum. The priory cloisters and canons' houses were granted by Henry VIII. to his master of the horse, Sir Anthony Brown, whose son, Viscount Montagu, built a mansion on the site, long called Montagu Close. Some rich specimens of the old architecture were visible in 1808. The two parishes of St. Margaret and St. Mary Magdalene united in purchasing the old priory church, which then became St. Saviour's, Southwark. Rochester House has wholly perished, the site now forming the Borough Market-place. Winchester Hall passed through various changes. A prison in the time of Charles I., sold by the Parliament in 1647 for £1191 3s. 4d., and afterwards let out to tenants who could only use the stately courts and rooms as warehouses, an antiquary's enthusiasm is now required to find a few stones of this once noble mansion. Barclay and Perkins's brewery stands on a part of the bishop's park. Thus the present church remains the only memorial of St. Mary Overy's canons and priory. Even this building has encountered some perils. The Lady Chapel was leased to John Peacock, a baker, who made it for a time "a filthy nuisance." Even in the present century the chapel has had a narrow escape. The engineers of new London Bridge coolly proposed the destruction of this part of the church, to make way for certain approaches; and the parish as coolly voted the same. Some men of taste raised an outcry, even wrote to the newspapers, and at last, not only induced the parish to rescind its vote, but raised £2,500 for the restoration of the building. This occurred in 1832; but the choir had, some years before, been restored and partly rebuilt, the transepts repaired, and the cruciform character of the church made clearer, in 1822, by removing the chapel of St. Mary Magdalene from the south side.

The parish was, for a long time, in no mood to attend to church architecture. In 1564, we find "Mr. Kettle, the minister," refusing to wear the surplice at the communion; he thereupon "has warning given him to quit the service of the parish." We presume the warning was taken, as we find "Mr. Hollyland" succeeding, at "twenty pounds a year for his wages." In the next year, "Mr. Harman was elected," receiving the twenty pounds, but "not the christenings;" and he was graciously permitted "to leave his benefice, giving a fortnight's warning." Sharp practice, on both sides, was this. But the politeness of the vestry is specially indicated by an entry in the year 1613:—"Ordered: that the minister be turned out at the pleasure of the vestry." Pleasant parish; happy ministers! Some modern vestries might do well to enforce the following rule, made by the St. Saviour's vestry in 1569:—"Only one vestryman speak at once, and the rest be silent, under a penalty of fourpence." Three years after, we read:—"Three vestrymen were expelled for disobedience and froward minds." Right, gentlemen, that is the effective plan. The vestry were, however, fond of good singing. In 1571 they order "the wardens to give the clerk warning, and to provide another, who shall be a good base and (sic.) tenor."

The bell-ringers seem to have been more harmonious than the vestry. All who lament over the declining art of "triple bob," will rejoice to learn that on the 14th of March, 1758, "a peal of 5,040 triple-bob twelve" was rung in four hours and thirteen minutes by "the Society of College Youths." This roused the "Old London Youths," who, in the next month, rang "a peal of 6,336 bob maximus" in five hours and thirteen minutes. The seven old bells, each named after a popular saint, doubtless rang out a merry peal when the poet-king, James I. of Scotland, married Lady Jane Beaufort at St. Mary Overy's; for the bridegroom was a lover, not only of Jane, but of "sweet harmony."

If we turn from weddings to burials, the registers and monuments remind us that Gower is not the only famous man lying in St. Mary Overy's. Among the burials in 1607 we read:—"Edmund Shakespeare, player: in the church." Did England's greatest dramatist follow in the funeral procession the body of his brother? John Fletcher, the poet of drawing-room life, the companion of Ben Jonson, and the fellow-worker with Beaumont, was hastily buried here in 1625. Fletcher was a fine gentleman, and sustained the character to the end. He was caught by the plague, through waiting in London for "a fine suit" of clothes. The last of the Elizabethan dramatists, the author of thirty-seven plays, one being "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," Philip Massinger, was buried in the churchyard in 1640. Bishop Andrewes, the favourite preacher of James I., the scholar, the eulogised of Milton, and one of the translators of the Bible, is now interred in the Lady Chapel, to which his coffin and monument were removed from the Bishops' Chapel, when the latter was taken down in 1830. The beautiful Austin monument, in the north transept, reminds us of one William Austin, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, who did not shrink from writing his own funeral sermon. If the reader should wish to know the text selected, he will find it in Isa. xxviii. 12. The epitaph on Lockyer, a quack doctor in the time of Charles II., contrives to be ever advertising his pills to the public; and one on a grocer, named Gerard, is very special in its revelations, telling us that in heaven there "are grocers many more."

John Gower the poet is the greatest name connected with St. Mary Overy's. The friend of Chaucer, the favourite poet of Richard II., and the writer of the second best English poem of the fourteenth century, is safe from oblivion. Little can be said about his life; he was an active writer, a hardworking scholar, able to live comfortably, and to take things pleasantly. Leland, Weever, Caxton, Mr. Todd, and Sir Harris Nicolas are unable to fix with certainty even his birth-place.

Some make him a student at the Temple; this Dr. Pauli questions. Leland elevates the poet to a judgeship of the Common Pleas; but Mr. Foss has no such name among his "Judges of England." Gower's marriage licence, his will, and his works give a little personal information. From the first we infer that his wife's name was Agnes Groundolf, and that the marriage was celebrated at St. Mary Overy's. From the will we find that the poet died possessed of considerable property, out of which he left bequests to the canons of the priory, to four churches in Southwark, to St. Thomas's Hospital, and to his wife. There were also legacies to all who should attend his funeral and pray for his soul. The will is dated "on the Feast of the Assumption,* 1408." Administration was granted to the widow on the 24th of October in that year; the date of the poet's death is, therefore, nearly ascertained. From the will it seems that he was then living in the priory, towards the rebuilding of which he had largely contributed. Gower became blind in the latter years of his life. "In Henry the Fourth's first year I lost my sight," are his own words; and a little after, we read, "My works are finished; here I drop my quill." What are the works to which he alludes? They are three; one in English verse and two in Latin. The first, entitled "Confessio Amantis," or, "The Confessions of a Lover," is a curiosity in English literature. Think with amazement of a man writing 30,000 verses about love! Do we not marvel at the sublime patience of readers then? The other great work is in Latin, entitled "Vox Clamantis," "The Cry of a Complainer," and deals with the insurrection of the people under Wat Tyler. Gower depicts the peasants, not only as beasts, but as beasts which had lost their own proper natures. The asses have become lions, the oxen dragons, and all are led by a chattering jay; the said jay representing Wat Tyler. Gower also makes a fierce attack on every order of society; on the Lollards, clergy, lawyers, and traders, not sparing the king himself, whom he specially "warns against women." The fiercest invectives of Gower are directed against the "servants" of his time. Housekeepers of the nineteenth century may, therefore, find a little comfort in recollecting that the "domestic grievance" existed at least four hundred years ago. Gower's third work, the "Chronica Tripartita," or "History in Three Parts," is in Latin rhymed verse, and describes the miseries brought on the land by the imbecile misgovernment of Richard II.

The rich monument of the poet is now in the south transept of St. Saviour's, to which it was removed from St. John's Chapel, in the north aisle, by Lord Francis Leveson-Gower, afterwards Duke of Sutherland. The recumbent figure of Gower lies beneath a three-arched canopy, richly ornamented with cinquefoil tracery. The head is supported on his three works; a dog watches at the feet; and on the wall are three female figures, named Charity, Mercy, and Pity, who are "saying endless prayers," in old French, for the departed. The monument is kept in repair by the Duke of Sutherland's family, which is supposed to be connected with that of the poet. In former times, a tablet was suspended by the monument, offering an indulgence of "fifteen hundred days" to all who prayed for the soul of John Gower. He little imagined, when fulminating against the Lollards in his "Vox Clamantis," that his own loved priory would be overthrown by the power which had even then spoken in John Huss, Jerome of Prague, John Wickliffe, and in his own friend, Geoffrey Chaucer. Yet this same power, revering the essence of religion more than its mere forms, has preserved his church and monument from ruin. The principles of Wickliffe have substantially triumphed; but the poet's ancient tomb retains its original beauty, and a whole parish now worships where a few canons chanted.

MARTYRS.

THRILL to think what weight of joy doth press
Those brows which here were wreathèd in the flame;

How that most cruel crown of blood and shame
Is brighter grown than mortal eyes can guess.
And how with equal thought their voices bless
Their peerless King with everlasting fame;

And how they are inscribèd with that name,
And clothèd in unuttered loveliness;
And how they yearning look upon that face,
Which here did weep for them its sweat of blood,
And looking live, and gather grace on grace;
And harp their rapture till their praises flood,
Sea-like, the shores of all that blissful place,
Wherein they dwell for ever great and good.

J. S. W.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.—II.

A SERMON FOR THE TIMES.

BY THE REV. J. C. RYLE, B.A., VICAR OF STRADBROKE.

NOW pass on to the second point which I proposed to take up. I will try to point out the practical lessons which the whole subject ought to teach us in the present day.

I approach this branch of my subject with a deep sense of its importance. Perhaps we are all apt to exaggerate the character of the times in which we live. Yet I am bold to say there never was a day in the history of English Christianity, when there was so much need for jealous watchfulness over Christ's truth, and specially over that part of it which I am now considering. The horizon is black on all sides. When we see what we see, and hear what we hear, within the pale of the Church of England, our heart may well tremble for the ark of God. What, then, do the times demand?

1. Take heed, then, first of all, in these days, that you thoroughly understand the doctrine of justification. There is no doctrine about which so many mistakes are made, because none which the devil labours so hard to overthrow. Full well does he know that it has twice turned the world upside down, and delivered many of his captives. No wonder that he is always tempting churches and ministers to obscure or deny its truth. No wonder that the Popish Council of Trent directed its chief attack against the doctrine, and backed its decrees on this subject with no less than thirty-three anathemas.

I am sure that the warning I give on this point of understanding justification, is much needed. We have fallen on days when a vast quantity of vague, foggy, indistinct teaching passes current as Christianity, though, in reality, it does not deserve the name. Earnestness, eloquence, cleverness, and liberality cover all defects with many hearers; while the real doctrines of the Gospel are never brought before them. Thousands of church-goers and chapel-goers, I am afraid, if they had lived at Antioch 1,800 years ago, would have said that Paul was a narrow-minded, scrupulous man, with a morbid fear of heresy, and that Peter was quite in the right.

In days like these, I summon all who read these pages to take heed that they are sound about justification by faith. See that you have clear, sharp-cut, well-defined ideas of the whole subject, and strengthen and refresh your minds with frequent reading about it. Study often, and with prayer, the Epistle to the Romans and the one to the Galatians, and make yourselves familiar with their contents. Read again and again the works of some of those English divines who have handled this subject with the pens of masters. The "Homily of Salvation," the Oxford sermons of Archbishop Usher, the sermons of Hooker, Beveridge on the "Eleventh Article," Traill's "Defence," the volume of Bishop M'Ilvaine on Justification, and the sermons of Bishop O'Brien on Faith, should have many readers in this day. This only I say, in leaving the point—a mistake here is a mistake that will spoil all your Christianity. Wrong about justification by faith, your religion will be like a watch with a screw loose—it will be wrong all the way through.

2. In the second place, settle it in your minds, in these days, that the doctrine of justification by faith is absolutely essential to the prosperity of a church. It is the life and heart, the backbone and marrow of Christianity. I believe that no church is really in a healthy state in which this doctrine is not prominently brought forward and honoured. A church may have good forms and a sound confession of faith, a full complement of ordained ministers and sacraments duly administered, schools in every parish and noble ecclesiastical buildings in every part of the land; but there will be no blessing from God on that church, unless justification by faith is proclaimed in its pulpits.

Why have the churches of Africa and the East fallen into their present state of decay? Had they not numbers of bishops, who could trace their orders to the apostles? They had.—Had they not forms, and liturgies, and canons, and constitutions of truly venerable antiquity? They had.—Had they not fine cathedrals, gorgeous vestments, pompous processions? They had.—Had they not synods and councils in abundance? They had.—Had they not hermits, and recluses, and holy virgins, and ascetic orders? They had.—But they let drop out of their hands the doctrine of justification by faith. They lost sight of that mighty truth, and so they fell. Darkness covers the districts where crowds used to hang on the lips of Chrysostom and Augustine. A church without the doctrine of justification is a body without life.

Why did the Church of England do so little in the last century, and why did the Methodist body make such a mighty stride, and draw away so many of our countrymen into its ranks? Was it that the Methodist system was intrinsically better than other systems? No.—Was it that the Church of England was not adapted to meet the wants of hungering souls? No.—But the Methodist preachers, as a rule, preached justification by faith, and in too many cases the clergy did not preach the doctrine at all. Bishops and deans who preached little better than moral essays, declaimed in vain to empty benches, while humble men, like Nelson, the Wesleyan stonemason, were followed by thousands. Defective doctrine, in the grandest cathedral that ever was reared, will never cope with truth in a barn.

Why have so many English people become regular attendants at dissenting chapels in the present day? Why do we sometimes see a splendid Gothic parish church empty, and cold, and bare, while a little plain brick building, called a meeting-house, is filled to suffocation? Is it that people in general have any abstract dislike to episcopacy, or to the Prayer-book, the surplice, and the Establishment? I think not. The simple reason, in many cases, is the lack of Gospel truth in the parish pulpit. Labouring and heavy-laden consciences want something more than carved roofs and painted windows, gaudy vestments and beautiful flowers. They want food; and that food is justification by faith. After all, it is a true, though quaint saying, that the “lining of the pulpit” is the most important part of church furniture. The font, and the communion-table, and the chancel, and the east window, are nothing at all, if the pulpit is not well lined. When people cannot hear justification by faith in the parish church, we must not wonder if they seek it elsewhere.

3. Thirdly, and lastly, understand distinctly, in the present day, that the root and fountain-head of half the errors of the Romish Church is rejection of justification by faith. That little, packed, clerical meeting, commonly called the Council of Trent, has deliberately set its seal to a thoroughly unsound and unscriptural statement about this mighty doctrine, and made it binding on all Romanists. He that reads the Decrees of Trent about justification, may well say, “Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?” No Romish teacher, if he is faithful to his Church, can say to an anxious sinner, in the same sense as St. Paul said, “Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.” He cannot do it without additions and explanations which completely destroy the good news.

Hear what good Bishop Hall says on this point: “The grossest of the Popish heresies, and the most venomous opinions of Rome, are conversant about justification, free will, the merit of our works, human satisfaction, indulgence, purgatory, and the difference of mortal and venial sin.

“That point of justification is of all others exceedingly important, insomuch that Calvin was wont to say that, if this one point might be yielded safe and entire, it would not quit the cost to make any quarrel about the rest. But while the Tridentine Fathers take upon them to forge the formal cause of our justification to be our inherent righteousness, and thrust faith out of office, what good man can choose but address himself to opposition? Who would not rather die, than suffer the ancient faith of the Church to be depraved with these idle dreams? In the meantime, we cannot but scorn to see the souls of men so shamefully deluded, while we hear the Spirit of God so often redoubling ‘without works,’ ‘not by works, but by faith,’ ‘being justified freely by his grace.’”

“But some, perhaps, may think this a mere strife of words, and not hard to be reconciled; for that which to the Papist is inherent righteousness, is no other to the Protestant than sanctification, both sides holding this equally necessary. True! but do both sides require it in the same manner? do both require it to the same end? I think not. Yea, what can be more contrary than these opinions to each other? The Papists make this inherent righteousness the cause of our justification; the Protestant, the effect thereof. The Protestant requires it as the companion, or page; the Papist, as the usher—yea, rather, the parent of justification.” “Imputed righteousness and inherent righteousness differ no less than God and man—Trent and heaven. Wherefore, let our Romanists confess that which both Scripture and Fathers, and all their modester doctors, have both thought and reported to be the common voice of the former Church in all times, and then we are agreed. Otherwise, what ‘fellowship hath God with Belial? or light with darkness?’”*

Reader, you are well aware that mighty efforts are being made now-a-days to bridge the gulf between ourselves and Rome, and to bring about a reconciliation of what are called the Western churches. Books like Dr. Pusey’s “Eirenicon” and institutions like the “Society for Promoting Unity of Christendom,” are plain evidence of what I mean. I trust I need hardly say a word to warn you against this movement. So long as Rome is what Rome is, and the Church of England is what she is, reconciliation between the two is utterly impossible. Our differences are not about Mariolatry merely, but about the cardinal doctrine of justification by faith. Let us stand fast here. When the Romish Church repudiates the decree of Trent, and is sound about justification, then, and not till then, it will be time to begin talking of union. When she gives Christ his rightful office, and faith its rightful place, it will be time to talk of reconciliation. Till then this movement in favour of re-union with Rome is an insult to the common sense of all English Protestants. It is an unworthy effort to sell the pass for the sake of a nominal peace. Well says Bishop Jewell, in his "Apology," on this very point,—“We do not decline concord and peace with men, but we will not continue in a state of war with God, that we may have peace with men.” “If the Pope does indeed desire we should be reconciled to him, he ought first to reconcile himself to God.” Reader, this witness is true. Without justification by faith, no peace with Rome!

And now let me conclude this paper with a few words of practical application:—

(1.) Let me first of all urge on all who read these pages the immense importance of making sure work of your own justification. The caution, I am certain, is very needful. A day of controversy and discussion has its own peculiar perils and snares. Men are apt to confound clear views of doctrine with a personal interest in Christ, and to forget that it is one thing to have clear views of justification, and quite another thing to be justified. Take heed, I charge you all—take heed, that you are not deceived. Rest not till you know and feel that you are one with Christ, and Christ in you. See that your faith be not merely a word, and a name, and a notion, but the experience of your own heart, and the comforting exercise of your daily life. What shall it profit you and me to be sound Protestants, if we have not the faith of God's elect—the faith that saves? Without it, men will find one day they had better never have been born. Having it, they may stand unmoved amid the crash of empires and downfall of churches, and say, “It is well.” Make sure work of this, my brethren, make sure work. He that is justified by faith—he, and he only, is the man that has peace with God.

(2.) In the next place, let me entreat all who read these pages, to know the times in which they live, and to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. We have fallen on days of trouble, and rebuke, and blasphemy, when the very foundations of British Protestantism are in danger. At the rate we are now going, a few more years will see Popery reigning supreme in England, and truth trampled under foot. Let us know our danger, and each in his own place do his duty, and manfully resist the evil. There is nothing in the state of things we see that need surprise us. Luther, with prophetic foresight, always predicted that the true doctrine of justification by faith would one day fall into discredit. “I tremble,” says Chemnitzius, “when I remember his words.” Our own Bishop Burnet, in his preface to the “History of the Reformation,” ventured to make a similar prediction about the revival of Romish doctrines. The time and the hour are come. In our time the grand old doctrine is assaulted. On us falls the great responsibility of making what fight we can to preserve it whole and undefiled, and hand it down to our children.

Let us, then, quit ourselves like men and be strong. Let us urge on our lay brethren to read their Bibles more, and become familiar with their contents. A Bible-reading laity is the life of a church. Let us settle it firmly in our minds that the church which loses justification by faith is a church not worth preserving. Such a church may have the fabrics, and the endowments, and the dignity, but it will not have that, without which, all the rest is worthless,—it will not have the blessing of God. Ichabod will soon be written on its doors. The ark of God will have been taken.

THE OLD WOUND.

MES, 'tis an old wound, Lizzie, love;—I got it years ago,
When French and English won renown amid Crimean snow;
'Twas at nightfall, in the trenches, and a friend was by my side,
We were both struck down together,—I recovered, but he died.
He was a better man than I, his life more pure than mine;
But who amongst us can at first God's purposes divine?
“He being dead, yet speaketh,” and his memory to this day
Is living, though his quiet grave lies many a mile away.
Your light hand hovers o'er the scar,—yes, touch it if you will;

Yet, Lizzie, there are moments when the old wound pains me still:
Sometimes when in this varying clime, the wild east wind blows keen,
I feel a pang shoot through the spot where the old hurt has been;
Only a little fleeting pang—one moment does it last,
To waken thoughts of gratitude for great deliverance past.
And then I call to mind again the wet and weary night
Spent in the deadly trenches, toiling hard till morning light:
And all the fearful sacrifice of brave lives offered there,
When Russian shot and shell poured fast through the thick murky air:

Once more comes back the sudden shock that struck us helpless down,
And sent one true soul upward to receive the victor's crown.
No tears, my Lizzy! all is past,—the hard-earned fame is won,
And who would weep for him whose home is now beyond the sun?
But talking thus has brought up scenes (long vanished) to my mind;
So, listen, I will tell you of a wound of different kind:
It was not given in the fight where foe is meeting foe,
'Twas dealt me by a hand I loved, a long, long time ago!
Not in the roar of battle, while my comrades round me fell,
But when the sunset's crimson flush spread over wood and dell,
And all the golden fields lay still, beneath the warm rich light,
Then came the blow that smote me with such hard and cruel might.
Lizzie, I loved her,—though in truth we both were very young,
I did not dream that falsehood's taint to such a nature clung.
She won me by her beauty first—a beauty strange and rare;
Who, looking in those eyes, could see the demon lurking there?
And solemnly, and steadfastly, in firm and earnest tone,
She spoke her vows, while on her face the tender moonlight shone.
We parted for a little while, and when the autumn came,
I sought her side, and found her sweet calm smile was just the same.

She led me forth amid the flow'rs, and toward the western glow,
We went together;—when she spoke, her voice was clear and low.
She bade me cast away the dream—the dream of love and truth,
She told me that such feelings were the wild romance of youth;
And thus she left me, smitten down, and wounded deep and sore,
And longing for that rest where earthly passions come no more.
'Twas years before that heart-wound closed, and still as time wore on,
I found the pain yet linger, even though the love was gone;
The pang of suffering bitter wrong, the smart of wounded pride,
Were left behind, although at last, my scorned affection died.
Lizzie, to read your anxious look it needs but little skill;
You long to ask the question: "Does the old wound pain me still?"
No; hear me, and be satisfied. The scar may yet remain,
As a reminder of the past, with all its long-felt pain,
To raise my earnest gratitude;—for God alone can know
How great the peril I escaped, when fell that crushing blow;
For if that false, cold heart had linked with mine its life and fate,
My first impulsive, boyish love would soon have changed to hate!
A thousand times is former woe repaid by present bliss.
Will not my words convince you, love? then take this answering kiss.

SARAH DOUDNEY.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XII. A DULL PARTY.

P in the big bare attic, which was their bedroom, study, and sanctum, the lads put out their candle, flaring in the light wind that came in, scent-laden, from the garden, and prepared to undress by the light of the moon.

"I'm not a bit sleepy," said Archie, sitting down on the window-sill overlooking the garden. "I would like to go out again. Wouldn't it be glorious to hook a chap like yon in the moonlight, and run down with him—down, down all the way to the sea, and him turning up his silver sides in the shallows!"

Archie's imagination was running away with him at a rapid rate. "I could jump out here into the apple-tree," he went on, "and be down in a moment," and as if to suit the action to the word he swung his legs outside the casement.

A great unrest had stirred and troubled the youth, and he was really not very far from acting on his sudden impulse and dropping into the garden below, when he must have wandered about all night or have taken the not very agreeable alternative of rousing the whole household, in order to get in again.

"Archie, man, are ye daft?" (half mad, half foolish) cried his sober-minded brother; "that comes of whistling after prayers."

"What's a fellow to do, if he daurna whistle, or even stretch himself straight?" said Archie, ruefully; at the same time bringing in his legs and rising till his head touched the ceiling.

"Sleep on't," said Sandie, laconically.

"I say, what for did ye say nothing about that gran' captain?" said Archie, who did not seem inclined to "sleep on't."

"I waited for you to speak," replied his brother.

"And I didn't because mother was so down upon Peggy. If I had been her, I wouldn't have gone off with him like you though."

"Like what?" said Sandie.

"So ready like, as if she had known him all her life."

"He never spired (asked) her leave," retorted Sandie, becoming champion in his turn.

"He looked down on us—that was plain enough."

"He thought we were only loons" (boys).

This was the head and front of his offending evidently.

"I would like to be a soldier," broke in Archie, abruptly.

"Ye would do no such thing," replied his brother.

"How would you like to stand as straight as a poker, strapped up in stays and a stock, and no daurin to put one foot by the other till ye were ordered? As for that Captain Oglivie, he's a puir pipeclay-faced creature, looking as if he would break in twa in the mids."

Thus it came to pass that nothing whatever concerning Captain Oglivie transpired at the manse. Archie and Sandie felt that Peggy's star was somehow not in the ascendant with their worthy mother, and they held their tongues about her, having once had their confidence checked.

So, to the girl's great astonishment, not a word was said on the subject, when she went over as usual to spend the Saturday afternoon with the minister's wife. She had anticipated a perfect catechism, and though she did not expect to find it pleasant to be closely questioned when she knew so little, the absence of all comment chilled and disappointed her; moreover, she was made to feel that she had somehow incurred Mrs. Grant's displeasure.

On these Saturday afternoons, the manse garden had been the resort of the entire family, and the busy idleness which reigned there had been fully appreciated by Archie and Sandie, who had inherited the indolent temperament of their father; but on this particular Saturday, their mother had determined to drive them forth.

"It's quite impossible for your father to study with such a clatter going on under his window," she had said.

The doctor could not have been very intensely absorbed at the moment, for he thrust his red face and shiny head most opportunely out of the window and beamed upon them.

"They're not disturbing me in the least, my dear," he said, addressing his wife.

"My dear," replied the lady, "it's time that a stop were put to the idle habit of lying about here for a whole day;" and she pointed to Archie and

Sandie, whose legs were certainly "lying about" in various directions, indicative of ease; while Peggy's position as she sketched, with a book on her lap, was not conducive to serious activity. "You had better go and take a brisk walk," she added, turning to the lads, who had drawn in their legs a bit, "or take your books into the wood, and rouse yourselves to read, instead of lying there."

"I'll go too," said Peggy, "and we'll really work." She knew that it would be a considerable effort to her companions to rouse themselves, and she was anxious to help them to make it, as she had often done before. The doctor began to rub his hands at the window, and to go through the process of washing his head.

"I thought you had come to spend the afternoon with me," said Mrs. Grant, austere. "What is good for them is not necessarily good for you," she added, slightly softening the asperity of her tone.

Now, though Peggy was perfectly unconscious of any cause of offence, she was keenly sensitive, and the expression of her face was utterly beyond her control. She felt the tone, indeed, more than the words. The same words from the doctor, would have had the effect of a pat on the cheek; from Mrs. Grant they fell like a rude blow, and the crimson rushed over her face in consequence, as if she had been guilty of the grossest fault.

"Let the bairns have a holiday," interposed the doctor; "I feel restless myself this hot afternoon, and would like a walk in the wood;" and he actually flung himself out of the open window, exactly as Archie would have done; but with more detriment to his dignity.

"Hot weather makes us ill-behaved: eh, Mistress Peggy! Archie run in for my hat! Now come along."

The last words were addressed to Peggy, who stood still, hesitating painfully.

"Let me stay," she said, sweetly; but her sweetness was of no avail.

"Oh no, you need not stay," was the reply, uttered with exceeding stiffness. No nature that is not generous can always be just, in spite of the time-honoured maxim which tells us to be just before we are generous. Mrs. Grant at that moment was unjust to her husband, unjust to her sons, and most unjust to the innocent cause of their present misdemeanours.

So the doctor marched off with Peggy, and the other two followed. They did not go far, because of the heat. They turned aside into the wood, and lay down in the shade, but their pleasure had sensibly decreased without any corresponding increase of work. The doctor found his little party unusually dull. The lads strolled away, and came back again and resumed their objectionable attitudes. Peggy sketched in silence at the foot of a tree.

At length they went in to tea, rather wearily. Mrs. Grant still looked stately and displeased. The doctor gently bade his sons withdraw for the purpose of study, and was gently obeyed; and earlier than usual Peggy took her leave.

Mrs. Grant gave her husband to understand that she thought the young folks wanted looking after.

"My dear wife," said he, "regulation is all very well in its way, but if you have to move the hands of your watch with your finger constantly, it will be of but little use to you. The works must be in order—the moving-springs of conduct must be right within. And I think with our two lads the works are in order, only they're a little slow. As for Peggy, I see no fault in the lassie."

"Dangerous! pooh, pooh, wife! You can't keep the lads in your pocket. As for her, she's in no danger from any such twelve feet of awkward bone and muscle."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CAPTAIN ON HIS GOOD BEHAVIOUR.

CAPTAIN HORACE OGLIVIE had been brought up on expectations; about the worst fare on which any young soul can be fed. Some of these expectations had come to pass, some had altogether failed, and some yet remained to be realised. Among these last was the expectation that a goodly inheritance would sooner or later fall to him from the decay of the elder branch of his father's family. His mother had nourished this expectation, as soon as the death of Sir Alexander and the hopeless condition of his heir was known to her. She was a widow, and her son was dependent on her, and on sundry smaller expectations from her side of the house. As a boy, he had been delicate, and, in the hands of a weak and indulgent woman, self had become the centre of the universe to him. He had got into debt more than once, and just at the right time had one of his expectations fallen due, and he had been extricated from his embarrassment by a windfall of a legacy. It would have been better for him if he had been left to extricate himself, had that been possible, for, he learnt to build his hopes on the extremity of others.

Such was Horace Oglivie—no fool, but a man of considerable intellect and taste; of cold but elegant exterior; with a good deal of soft, superficial sentiment, but, in reality, hard as a flint. Under another discipline, he might possibly have been another sort of man. It seemed conceivable that the flinty rock of selfishness might be fused by some ennobling passion, and turned into crystal in the fire. Was there in him the possibility of such a passion?—that was the question.

Having at present exhausted his resources, and nothing more falling in, he had come northward among his Scottish relations—his mother was an Englishwoman—to see how matters stood, to spy out the land in fact. The Oglivie inheritance was well worth looking after, having been in the hands of excellent trustees during the long minority which, of course, would continue during the lifetime of the present possessor.

He had gone straight to head-quarters, and had met with a favourable reception from his elderly cousins. Years were beginning somewhat to relax the rigidity of Margery Oglivie. She was nearer to what she had been in her youth, in some respects, than she had been during those intervening years. In the autumn of life, Nature seems to make a last effort to ripen and sweeten some characters of real worth, which have been hardened and soured by sunless gloom. She was not going to make the mistake of driving away a friendly face, with the stamp of kindred upon it, as she thought she had driven away one whose brightness haunted her. So Horace Oglivie's welcome at "the Forest House" was a good deal warmer than he deserved.

It was an altogether new phase of life to which that gentleman was introduced, and many a mental shrug and grimace he made in accepting a share of it, even for the shortest possible time. It was utterly unpalatable to him in its narrowness, and rigidity, and gloom; and not without an element of horror and repulsiveness, from which he shrank physically as well as mentally.

His stay would have been very short indeed, but that he fully comprehended the situation, and resolved to be upon his good behaviour. A barren title would be his on the death of his wretched cousin, but for the goodwill of these old women, who appeared to him to be nearly as foolish as their brother. They were bound to provide for him, no doubt; but people did not always do as much for Captain Oglivie as he considered they were bound to do: moreover, he could hardly take a hasty leave of them, as he had given as the reason for his visit the present unoccupied condition of his existence.

He felt that Miss Margery was watching him keenly; but he did not guess how shrewdly. He could feel her cold blue eyes on his face, as he sat opposite to her in that dreary dining-room, which she affected so much. They glanced harmlessly enough from the handsome mask before her, where neither colour nor motion played; but he did not know what power they had to pierce the surface, nor how vigilant was their scrutiny.

To Miss Margery, Captain Oglivie was deferential, without a shade of obsequiousness; to her sister, he was confidential. It was from the latter that he learnt the existence of Louis Oglivie's daughter—a fact of which he had been in ignorance. Here, indeed, might be a formidable rival; nearness in point of situation might make up for his own greater nearness in point of relationship.

He could make out very little from Miss Janet's narrative, save the regret of both the sisters that a pretty, timid child had fled from them in fear, which did not, all things considered, appear to him remarkable. There was, he could see, a soreness about it in the woman's mind, which was quite as closely allied to kindness as to displeasure. She had evidently been at pains to gather little bits of gossip about the girl—about her beauty, which was certainly exaggerated; and her sweetness and brightness, which were winning all who came near her. He was partly reassured by the resentful tone in which Miss Margery spoke of Gilbert Oglivie, and all belonging to him; though, on the subject of the girl, on which he ventured to sound her, she maintained the grimmest silence.

Toward the close of the week the captain's patience was quite exhausted, and he would have taken his departure; but it was not Miss Margery's intention to let him off so easily: she had not seen through him yet. She felt very much inclined to like him. She had a woman's quick appreciation of his good taste and good manners, and a proper degree of deference is always pleasing.

When she first saw him, she could have found it in her heart to say, "So you're come to look after us, and see how long we're likely to keep you out of your own!" such was her shrewdness in guessing. If she had spoken her mind, as she usually did, it was thus she would have spoken; but something, probably the softening influence that has been mentioned, restrained her, and she had not uttered the thought.

Now she urged his stay with a peremptoriness from which there was no escape, and he was obliged to postpone his departure indefinitely for the present.

One change in their mode of life the sisters made: at each meal one or other of them joined their guest alone, each taking it in turn to act as their brother's keeper. At other times their superintendence was less vigilant, though they seldom allowed him to be out of their sight. He was to be seen wandering all about the place, muttering inarticulate sounds, and gathering up all the bits of paper and other rubbish which came in his way. He set an especial value on any pieces of written paper, and had a magpie-like habit of concealing them about his person, and his room.

One morning that gentleman found himself first in the dining-room, when, turning to the window which stood open, he saw the very apparition that had frightened Peggy. This time it did not retreat, but stood gibbering at him across the barrier. An ugly frown of mingled disgust and impatience, came upon the captain's face, and with an angry gesture he warned the idiot off. The result was a hideous yell which rang through the house, and brought both the sisters to the spot. Under their protection, the poor creature continued to make frantic demonstrations of dislike to the captain; while the latter found it impossible to conceal his repugnance and horror.

At length the idiot's burst of passion ended in miserable weeping, and he was led away by Miss Janet, who exercised over him a more soothing influence than did his sister.

A man of tender heart, as well as nervous susceptibility, would have been deeply moved to see the tall though stooping figure led away, weeping like a child, soothed by the foolish words women lavish upon infants.

CHAPTER XIV.

A PASTIME.

MISS MARGERY'S eye was on the captain; but, amid his evident pain, she could discern no trace of feeling for the unhappy cause of the unpleasant scene which had ushered in the peaceful, sunny Sunday morning. She had not seen the expression and gesture, which had created the disturbance; but she divined something very near the truth concerning it.

"He will not do that if you show him kindness," she said, rather coldly. "He is in the habit of doing it to any one he takes a dislike to—to servants who, we afterwards found, had made faces at him, or otherwise offended him."

"I fear I was startled by his sudden appearance," said the captain, with a great self-possession, adding, impolitically, "I wonder how you are able to manage him; would it not be better if you sent him away?"

"Yes," said Margery Oglivie, in her hardest tone, and looking sternly at the young man: "hide him away! let the whole punishment fall on him—the innocent. Horace Oglivie! if we try to escape the judgment of God in one way, it will reach us in another. It will come in hard hearts and sinful lives, and that's worse than sorrowful ones. My sister and I have lived under this sore burden the best part of our lives, and we are likely enough to die under it. We've accepted the heavy punishment of the Almighty, for the evil lives of them that went before us, and he has been pleased to keep us back from their sins."

Her words carried no sort of conviction of reasonableness to Horace Oglivie; but he bent his head with grave reverence while she was speaking; and it was with perfect truth that he intimated his respect for the feeling she had expressed.

Still the captain felt that he had lost ground with his relative, and that to regain it he must be more upon his good behaviour than ever.

"It's a mysterious dispensation," she continued, "that the wrath of the Almighty should fall upon the guiltless; but I'll take care that he does not suffer from the cruelty of men."

Margery Oglivie knew that the sacrifice of her life had not been made for nothing, for even in those days the treatment given to such as her afflicted brother, made their lives lives of suffering as well as of deprivation. There were no such alleviations of their misfortune as the noble intellect and gentle heart of Dr. Conolly were about to devise.

In due time the captain was under orders to attend Miss Margery to church—the sisters enjoying that privilege in turn. It was not the church of Strathie which they frequented, though that was their parish kirk. They had been brought up Episcopalians; but though there was a small chapel in the neighbourhood of Oglivie Castle, there was none near enough "the Forest House," and they had, or rather Miss Margery had, exercised the privilege of choice in the matter, and had selected the Presbyterian preacher most to their mind. The church was distant a mile or two, on the other side of Delaube, and thither the captain was marched accordingly.

When there, the captain could not help looking round upon the audience, and wondering what manner of men and women these might be. There was one whom he noted particularly: a young man about his own age, whose face even he, fastidious as he was, pronounced strikingly handsome, only that, instead of being "sicklied o'er," it wore the livery of perfect health. He found himself turning to this face, to read the effect of the sermon. A grave, intellectual fervour sat there from beginning to end of it.

By the time it was over, Horace Oglivie was very uncomfortable. "These people would drive me mad in no time," was his mental ejaculation. He satisfied Miss Margery, unintentionally this time with the gravity, not to say solemnity, of his demeanour. Had she known of his discomfort, she would have been still better content, and have considered him in a very promising state of mind. On the way back he quietly declined discussion, but showed that he fully appreciated the points of the preacher.

But he also declined to accompany Miss Janet to the evening sederunt, which was the fashion at Mr. Keith's church, and broke through his bondage by wandering out at his will.

For reasons of his own he had kept his recent interview with Peggy Oglivie to himself. It would have been difficult to account to Miss Margery for that interview—impossible to disclose the motive which had led him to seek it: namely, to satisfy himself as to what chance there existed of her cutting him out through near neighbourhood.

He had not been greatly struck, or particularly charmed, by Peggy. He thought her a nice little thing enough, but no great beauty; not likely at all to be dangerous by reason of spirit or worldly wisdom: on the whole, rather childish. Still, he could not help wishing he might meet her. He was wretchedly dull, and he wanted to speak to some one who was sane at least. He could not help taking the way toward Delaube, "though doubtless," he thought, "the poor little thing is cooped up in one of these dreadful kirks."

He wandered on in the direction he had before taken, crossed the stream and got into the wood of Delaube. He was rewarded sooner than he had expected by catching a glimpse of a white dress among the trees. He felt inspired by the promised pastime, and sprang eagerly up the slope that still lay between them. On a little platform, half way up the hill, on which rose a separate grove of firs, Peggy sat at the foot of a tree. She did look wonderfully like a mere pretty child in her frilled frock and clustering curls, as she came forward to meet him, for she had heard some one coming, and had looked out in the direction of his approach.

He was really glad of this second chance meeting, and said so, frankly. "I have followed the right track, after all," he said, "only I do not remember this particular spot."

"No, we did not pass here the other night," she answered, and proceeded to point out the position of the place to him.

They were at ease at once. His assumption of a right to a friendly footing accomplished this.

"Coming here is pleasanter than going to the kirk, at any rate," and he was proceeding to caricature the sermon of the morning, to avenge himself for the discomfort it had given him; but seeing the girl look grave, he desisted, and recounted the experience of the morning instead.

Peggy had a very lively recollection of her own, and gave him ready sympathy. She was certainly very winning and it was a very pleasant pastime to sit there and see the admiration deepen in those clear eyes as he talked of himself, a theme of which he did not soon weary. He hated the life of inaction to which the profession of a soldier in time of peace condemned him. He wished he had been called to the bar, where he would have had an opportunity of distinguishing himself. He enlarged his aspirations as his listener enlarged her belief in them, and what is more, he believed in them himself. That was certainly pleasant. It was curious that, with a chit of a girl, evidently reared like a rustic, he should feel a greater amount of satisfaction with himself, than he had ever done even in securing the flattery of a really fine woman.

WALTER'S PROMISE.

SHALL go with you, Tom, to see you off," said Walter Clariss to his brother.

Tom was just starting away from home to join a ship lying at anchor in Plymouth Bay. They walked some distance along the road which led to the harbour without speaking, their hearts being full of sadness at the thought of the long separation that was to take place between them.

At length Tom broke silence, saying, as he laid his hand affectionately on Walter's shoulder, "There is one thing I want you to promise me before we part, and I am sure you will try to do it for my sake."

"That I will, Tom! Do tell me what it is; I shall be glad to do anything you ask me."

"Well," answered Tom, "you know when father came back from his last voyage to India, where I am now going, he made me a present of a new spade, a rake, and a hoe, and told me he should expect me to keep our little garden free from weeds and well cultivated. That is now half a year ago, and you know in what state I have kept the garden ever since, and what sort of a garden I have now left it. Father went to sea again about a fortnight after I had begun gardening, and is expected back, in a few weeks from the Cape. I want him to see that his garden has been well taken care of. But as weeds will be sure to spring up if it is neglected only a few days, I want you to promise me that you will try to keep them out, and take care of the plants that are now growing up in it, so that when he returns he may find a nice garden, full of vegetables and fruit-trees, and no weeds. Will you do this for me?"

"Oh, yes, that I will!" Walter answered, earnestly. "I have learned from you how to manage a garden, and I shall be glad to do it for father's sake, as well as for yours; and I hope when you come home," he said, in a faltering tone, "that you will find the garden quite as nice as you have left it; and, indeed, it is beautiful now."

Tom smiled, and patted his brother heartily on the back, saying, "Thank you; you have now done me more good than carrying my bundle, which I think it is now my turn to take on my own shoulder. I shall now feel my mind at ease when far away on the billows, and thinking of you and the garden, which I shall soon leave far behind me."

Tears came into Walter's eyes as the last words were uttered, for looking before him at the same time in the distance, he saw the harbour and the ships, one of which he knew was soon to weigh anchor and set sail with his brother on board, while he should be returning home without him.

"Cheer up, my lad," cried Tom, "and wipe away your tears. We must part now, but I hope we shall soon meet again."

Walter saw his brother get into the ship's boat, which rowed him away from the land to join the brig in which he was to sail—saw him climb up the vessel's side and go aboard, when, waving their hats as a last farewell, Tom was soon out of sight, and Walter stood, as if riveted to the spot, till the good ship left her moorings, spread her sails to the wind, and gradually disappeared from his view.

Walter had now seen his brother off. He must now go back alone. He felt sad and lonely as he began to retrace his steps homeward, but, with the elasticity of youth he soon recovered his spirits, and when he arrived at home, and had taken his supper, he went into the garden. Going into the little shed, he looked at the garden tools, all bright with use, and remembered the pledge he had given to Tom, to ply them well, and to keep them, and the garden too, in good order. So he resolved to get up early next morning to begin his work before going to school, as Tom used to do. He had not been in the habit of rising very early, and feared he should not be up in time, so he asked his mother to wake him about five o'clock. She promised to do so. Walter was fast asleep when his mother began calling him. She called him again and again several times before he awoke, and heard her telling him it was time to get up. He rubbed his eyes, turned himself round, and answered his mother with a sleepy "y-e-s;" but thoughts of his brother and the garden soon roused him, and he rose hastily and dressed himself, and fetched his hoe, and went round the garden to see what was needed to be done. He soon found something to do. There were a few lettuces to be transplanted; some peas to be gathered, but no weeds to be rooted up; the ground was still quite clear. He worked hard until breakfast-time, when he ate some bread and milk and went off to school. As it was above two miles from home, he took his dinner with him, and remained until the evening. He was then coming straight home, when some of his schoolfellows stopped him, and asked him to have a game with them first on the road. He told them he should like it much, but he had no time to spare.

"What can you have now to do, I wonder? school is over, and our work is done until to-morrow," said one of them.

"But I have gardening to do when I get home."

"Oh, is that all; then let the garden wait another day, and come and play with us now;" and two or three boys took hold of him by each arm, to force him to go with them on the common for a game at ball.

Walter resisted, and begged them to let him go for his brother's sake, whom, he told them, he had promised not to neglect the garden. As they all respected Tom, they said, "Well, we will let you off this time, but to-morrow we shall listen to no more excuses about the garden or Tom either."

Walter felt rather discouraged by this treatment, and thought it rather hard to suffer opposition from his schoolfellows, and to give up some of his play-time for the sake of working in the garden. But then he remembered his pledge, which he would not forfeit for all the world. He thought of Tom. "What would he say to me if he knew that I was already getting tired of the work which he has left me to do? No, no," he said to himself, "Walter will be true to Tom, come what will of it."

After supper, Walter finished transplanting the lettuces, fixed some rods in rows for the scarlet runners, and began digging a deep trench for setting out celery plants; and next day, with some difficulty, he aroused himself from his sweet slumber about five o'clock, and went to his garden to work afresh to finish his trench.

School-time came and passed away, and then the dreaded threat rose up in his mind as he started off to go home. All the boys set upon him, and, much against his will, he felt obliged to submit and go with them to play. It was too late, and he felt himself too tired when he got home to work in the garden before he went to bed. He told his mother how he had been hindered from coming home sooner, and she said she would tell the clergyman when he called next time about it, and perhaps he would speak to Mr. Hibbert, the schoolmaster, to do something to keep the boys from meddling with him. After a few days that gentleman, in his usual rounds, called upon her, and he did as she desired him.

As a punishment for what they had done, the schoolmaster kept the boys in school a quarter of an hour later than the usual time for dismissal, and let Walter go at the right time. By this means he got home early that evening, and was able to work as before in the garden for an hour or two extra.

Walter found his work had been thrown back at a very busy time, through losing several evenings; yet he hoped things would go on more smoothly for the future.

But poor Walter was not aware of what was smouldering in the breast of one big boy in the school against him. That boy was Arthur Cooper, a big strong fellow, who was too idle to do anything but mischief. He was vexed at being kept in school through Walter, whom he always disliked for his diligence as a scholar, and more still now for the praise which the master gave him, before the whole school, for his industry in keeping his father's garden so nice and trim. He thought he would like to spite him in some way without exposing himself to punishment. He lived within ten minutes' walk of Walter's cottage, and the thought came into his mind that he would get up very early and look at "Walter's famous garden," as he called it, and see if he could do anything there to vex him. He went, but before he reached it he saw Walter's straw hat just above the hedge. He stopped short, and turned back again. "I'm too late this morning; I'll go to-night, after Walter is in bed," he muttered to himself.

Poor Walter's vexation next morning, when, on going into the garden, he saw the havoc which had been done in the night, can be more easily imagined than described. There were pea-sticks knocked down, and the peas trailing on the ground; his beds of plants, that he had been working at so hard, entirely laid waste; his celery trench, which had cost him so much labour, made useless. He knew not what to do. At first, indeed, he could do nothing but cry. He went back to the house, and sat down sullenly on a chair, till his mother came down-stairs. Then he took her to the garden, and showed her what had happened. She was very sorry, and tried to soothe the grief of her dear Walter, of whom she was, and had good reason to be, very fond; but all her efforts to do so seemed in vain. Walter could not be comforted. All that day he remained at home in a very gloomy mood indeed. His mother, not mindful of her lameness, went to the school, and told the master why her son was absent, and also desired him to try to find out whether any of the boys had acted so spitefully against her son as to come in the night and spoil his garden.

The master was shocked to hear what had been done, as he truly suspected, by one of his boys. He said he was grieved to hear what had happened, and promised to do his best to find out, and also to punish as he deserved, any boy in his school who had dared to do so wicked and shameful a deed; but first he wished to come and see the garden, and desired it to be left as it was found in the morning. In the evening he came, and saw, by the foot-prints in the soft mould, that if any of the boys had done it, it must have been one of the biggest. There were only three very big lads in the school: Thomas Watson, who lived quite in another direction, and who did not seem at all to be a vicious boy; Robert Hands, who was known to be a very gentle, respectable youth, and apparently quite incapable of such outrageous conduct; and Arthur Cooper, who lived at the "White Bear," and who bore anything but a good character, whether at home or at school.

Mr. Hibbert was strongly inclined to believe that Cooper was the real culprit; but he could not be sure; he was without positive proof of the fact. He said, however, that he would try to find him out. In the meantime, he advised Walter, in a kind, sympathising tone, to take courage, and set to work at once to repair as far as possible, the mischief that had been done; and to give him time to do so, he said he would let him have a holiday the next day.

Walter thanked his kind master, and as soon as he was gone, went to look for his spade; but it was missing from its place in the shed, and nowhere to be seen. This was a fresh trouble to the poor boy, and made him wish again that Tom had never asked him to look after the garden. He thought somebody must have taken it away. What should he do without it? It was his brother's spade, too, that was lost—one that he prized so much, because his father had given it to him. He ran in-doors, to tell his mother of his new trouble. She was quite perplexed what to say to him, for she was poor, and could not well afford to buy another spade; but she told him to search everywhere about the garden for it, and she would help him. For a long time they searched in vain. At last, when they were thinking of giving it up for lost, Walter saw a large brass button on the ground, close to the hedge, and as he stooped to pick it up, he found the spade lying flat at the bottom. He was so delighted to find the spade, that he forgot all about the button, and left it where it was. But afterwards he remembered the button, and went to fetch it. He could not think how it had come there, or whom it belonged to; he showed it to his mother, and she sagaciously said he had better take care of it, and give it to Mr. Hibbert when he went to school again, as very likely it belonged to the boy who had been in the garden, and had got rubbed off his jacket in climbing over the hedge; and if so, it would help the master to find out what boy had done the mischief. Walter then carefully put it away in his waistcoat pocket, till he should go to school again.

It was now too late to work that evening; so Walter could not begin to do so before the morning. Then he found it sad work to do over again what he had done so well before; but, urged by the promise he had made to Tom, he went on steadily with his heavy task, till in the evening it was all finished, and looked again almost as nice and neat as ever.

As soon as Walter came to school—and he was almost the first boy there—he went to Mr. Hibbert, who was sitting at his desk, and told him how he had made the garden all right again; and then he took out the button from his pocket, and gave it to him, telling him where and how it was found, as his mother desired him. His master thanked him for it; and when all the boys were present, he asked if any boy had lost a brass button from his jacket, as one had been found, and he would give it to the owner, on his coming to him for it.

All the boys who had metal buttons on their clothes examined them, to see if they had any missing. Cooper was the only boy who missed one, and, thinking it had perhaps been picked up from the schoolroom floor on the previous day when the room was swept, came forward to claim it.

Mr. Hibbert asked him if the one he held in his hand was really his; and, looking at and comparing it closely with the other buttons on his jacket, he said he was quite sure it belonged to no one but himself.

"Where did you lose it?" asked the master.

"I don't know; s'pose it dropped off in this here room yesterday; but I never missed it till jest now as you spoke about it; all as I knows is, it's mine, and I'll thank ye to give it me, please, sir."

"Very well," said the master, "you shall have it presently; but tell me, first, whether you didn't lose it the day before yesterday."

"May be I did, sir, I really don't know zactly when; any how, I'm glad you've found it, because I haven't another at home to match it, and the jacket looks bad like with a button short."

"That's enough. Now listen to me. You say positively this button is yours?"

"Yes, I do; and I have proved it, too."

"Very well. Then I can prove another thing, and that is, that the owner of this button, whoever he is, is a most mischievous, wicked fellow, who deserves to be, and shall be, most severely flogged."

"How's that, sir?" the boy said, in a faltering tone.

"Just listen, boys, and let it be a warning to you all that your sin will be sure to find you out. This very button, which Arthur Cooper firmly declares to be his, was found last night in Walter Clariss's garden, where, the night before, somebody had got in and did all the harm he could, trampling down the plants, and spoiling the garden-beds. It was lying close to the hedge, where Walter's spade had been thrown down, and must, of course, have been torn off the wearer's jacket by the bushes as he got back over the hedge. Those of you who think this is Cooper's button, and that it was he who broke into Walter's garden, and injured it as I have told you, will hold up your hands."

All hands were up in an instant.

"Do you see," said the master, addressing Cooper, "there is not a boy in the school who does not believe you are guilty, and therefore the one who must now be flogged as you deserve."

Cooper hung down his head, and said nothing.

The master then got out his cane from his desk, and ordered the boy to take off his jacket.

Meanwhile Walter rose from his seat and came up to Mr. Hibbert, and begged him not to punish Cooper this time, if he would only own his fault, and promise never to do so again.

The boy still stood mute, as before.

"You will not confess, then," said the master, once more raising the cane ready to strike him; "then off with your jacket."

Cooper made a slow attempt to remove it.

"Let me help you," said Mr. Hibbert, taking it by the collar behind, and pulling it off in an instant. He then gave some smart strokes with his cane on the boy's back, which brought the tears into his eyes, and made him roar out, sobbingly—

"Yes, I did it; but I won't do it again, if you'll only leave off now. Oh! oh! I can't stand this beating. Oh! pray do let me alone."

The master paused. "I see," said he, "it is only because you find the punishment less easy to bear than you thought it would be that you are now ready to yield. I don't think your confession, or your promise either, for such a reason, ought to induce me to leave off beating you, until you have had the full punishment that you deserve, and you have not had half enough yet; but as I see Walter rising again to plead for you, I will, for his sake, let you off now, hoping you will not break the promise you have made, never to do any more harm either to Walter or his garden."

When school was dismissed, Cooper ran home without speaking a word to anybody. The boys said, "Let him go, we don't want his company. Who would have thought he was such a bad fellow as he is? We know him now, and won't have anything more to do with him." Walter Clariss was surrounded with a lot of them, all asking the particulars of what had occurred in the garden, and expressing their gladness that Cooper was found out, and, as they said, "jolly well punished for it." "But," said some of them, "why didn't you let the master thrash him more, as he ought to have been?"

Walter replied, "We are taught to forgive our enemies, and so I thought I ought to forgive him."

"You are right," said they, "and we hope he will be your enemy no longer—at least, he ought not to be."

For many days after this Walter and his garden got on very well. He worked at it regularly every morning and evening. Everything flourished. Walter enjoyed the fruit of his toil, and all he wished for was, that his father would come home soon, and see the garden as it then was.

No sooner was it quite completed, than Walter's father came home, and looked at the garden with an expression of delight, and heartily praised both Walter and his brother for the great pains they had taken with it. Walter now felt more than repaid for all his trouble; and looked forward with pleasure to the time when Tom should return and receive his share of the praise which the father had bestowed upon them both. At last he came, and finding that Walter had honoured his word, and had fulfilled his promise, in spite of all hindrances, he rewarded him with a "jolly" present, which he had brought for him from India.

THE BIVVER

“There was the adorable Fan”—p. 83.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “MARY POWELL.”

“JUST like Fan!” I heard one sister say to another, as I entered the room; and, the next moment, they both left it. I stood idly watching the bright rain-drops chasing each other down the window, and wondering what those few words might imply or portend. “Just like Fan!” was that a bitter satire or a compliment? What would one like such a judgment to affirm of one’s own character? It might be highly laudatory. One reads of some warm-hearted expression of sympathy, for instance, from the Queen, for Mrs. Lincoln, or the poor widows of the Hartley colliery, and the natural feeling is that it is "just like her." Or one hears of some new act of munificence of Mr. Peabody's, irrespective of national or sectarian lines of demarcation, and we say, "It is just like him!" Garibaldi, again, draws sword for king and country, perhaps walks unharmed into the enemy's capital, opens the path to light and liberty, lays his trophies at his sovereign's feet, and goes back to his vines and cabbages at Caprera—we say, "It is just like him!" and there cannot be stronger praise. Happy and glorious those of whom it can be justly and lovingly said, that acts of self-denial, philanthropy, and self-devotion are "just like them!"

On the other hand, there are some, I regret to think, of whom, when a mean thing, or an ungenerous thing, or rude thing is laid to their charge, we can but too truly say, or if we don't say, we can but too strongly feel, that it is "just like them."

All this while the rain is running down the window-panes; faster and faster it runs, till it becomes evident that the morning, which promised so fairly, is subsiding into a thoroughly wet day. Marianne and Sophia return, divested of their walking-dresses, and looking as gloomy as the weather.

"It really is too bad of Fanny; she has only been idling and talking amusing nonsense ever since breakfast; and if we had started at the time we proposed, we should have reached the priory before the rain came on, and have had a delightful day; but she would not get ready in time, though there was nothing on earth to prevent her."

This, then, was what was "just like Fan." Thoughtless waste of time, and want of consideration for others.

She was an uncommonly pretty creature; pliant as a sweet-pea, and bright-hued, too, as a pink and white sweet-pea: airy, graceful, charming. She was full of drollery, and I sometimes thought her drollery must be of the kind that had characterised the celebrated Mrs. Montagu in her girlish days, when the Duchess of Portland called her "Fidget," and when she said everything that came into her head, sometimes charming, sometimes offending; and when, whether grave or wildly gay,

"They only called it pretty Fanny's way."

This, I say, was my impression of her at first, when I was amused at her unexpected mots, and clever retorts, and apt excuses for doing what she liked, and shirking whatever she didn't like to do. I found her original; I found her considered original; I found her accustomed to be considered original, and liking to be thought so. As this dawned upon me, it lessened her value in my eyes. At first, I thought her a charming addition to a large family party in a country house. There were sides taken about her by those who liked her, and those who liked her not. The dissentient side was at first only represented by Miss Harbledown, the governess, who formed a minority of one, and, abstaining from much ventilation of her opinions, contented herself with looks and short sentences. The girls decided her to be a most unsympathetic creature, on whom Fanny's pretty ways were quite wasted. Miss Harbledown drily replied, "I dare say," and went on with her crochet.

Marianne soon confided to Sophia with great earnestness that their brother Charles was evidently falling in love with Fan. The two girls became quite excited on the subject, and would resent the idea of joking about it, or treating it lightly.

Charles liked Fan very much, there was no disguise in it; and Fan, whether she cared for him or not, liked pleasing, and took pains to be delightful. As his was a graver nature than hers, she put herself out of the way sometimes to talk on subjects rather beyond and above her; and if she made laughable blunders he would overlook them with great indulgence.

Almost the first family confidence reposed in me was: "We think Charles is getting attached to Fanny Rivers, and are so glad!" so this made me look about me.

Unluckily, I had not long the opportunity of observing them together, for Charles had a summons to Manchester, which took him from us rather suddenly. Fanny looked blank when she heard of it, which was just after she had arranged to prolong her stay at Orchis Bank. He noticed her distress, and was moved and flattered by it.

He came round presently to the window-seat, where she and I were sitting, and said, "I do hope I shall find you here on my return."

"Oh, that is so long to look forward to," said Fan, plaintively.

"It will be long to me, I can tell you!—so, do say you will stay."

"Have I not just arranged to remain a little longer?"

"Yes, but I hope you will stay till I come back."

"That must depend."

"On what, except your own inclination?"

"Oh, all sorts of things. My uncle and aunt may not want me here all that age."

"Mother," cried Charles, in a loud, distinct voice, "would you not like Fanny to remain here till I return?"

"Oh, of course," said Mrs. Ainslie.

Miss Harbledown afterwards said to me that Charles had no right to draw such an answer from his mother. However, it was uttered cordially enough, and I really think Mrs. Ainslie liked Fan very well, and was glad to have her.

Then, while general conversation was going on, he resumed to Fanny, "I'm so glad that is settled; I hope you will stay now."

"Oh, we shall see. I don't like being tied down to anything; it is so long to look forward to."

"Only a month."

"A whole month? what an age it appears! How shall I get through it?"

Sophia, who was passing, turned round and repeated—

"What shall I do with all the days and hours
That must be counted ere I see thy face?
How shall I charm the interval that lowers Between this time and——"

"Etcetera, etcetera," said Fan, lightly interrupting her.

"A month will soon pass, whatever we may think of it beforehand," said Charles; "and employment will make it pass still more quickly."

"Employment? oh, dreadful! What sort of employment?"

"You know how I shall be employed—not quite as pleasantly as you will probably be—and you, with your many resources, will be at no loss; or if you should be, you can read some of those books I was recommending."

"Do write me a list—I've forgotten their names already."

Writing and discussing this list brought their heads so near together, that there was no occasion for them to speak except in very low tones; and as I had already felt myself one too many, I crossed the room to Miss Harbledown, who was going to wind a skein of "Lady Betty," and offered to hold it for her.

The young people were very tender to one another till Charles was off, and his sisters regarded Fanny as a young heroine, who was undergoing a trial of the affections.

I was talking with Miss Harbledown in the study, when Fan came in unconcernedly; but, seeing us, said, "Oh, I did not know any one was here—I am come for some books, and shall carry them off to my own room, where I can read them for an hour every day, without any one being the wiser."

It struck me that, after this announcement, every one would be the wiser; and that when she disappeared at a set time, all of us would know where she was gone, and what she was about. I could hardly help smiling when Marianne came in, looking much impressed, and said, "I met Fan just now on the stairs, with an armful of books Charles recommended her to read. I dare say she will have a good cry when she gets into her own room."

"A good cry, indeed!" repeated Miss Harbledown, contemptuously. "Fanny is pretty much of a child, but not quite equal to that."

"My darling Downy," said Sophia, winding her arms round her, "you are so prejudiced against Fan!—you never will give her credit for being deep."

"Ah,—deep! deep as the sea," said Miss Harbledown, in a tone that was anything but satisfactory.

A little before this time, the Brookes had returned to the priory—calls had been exchanged, and an engagement had been made for a luncheon party. It was while the Brookes were paying their return call, that Fanny, whom they wished to make acquaintance with, was missing—I offered to fetch her. "At her books," whispered Sophy to me as I left the room. "This is her hour, you know."

Nevertheless and notwithstanding, I went up to her, and tapped at her door, but received no answer. A second tap meeting with no better success, I gently opened the door and looked in, just at the moment that Miss Harbledown was quietly passing along the corridor; so she looked in too.

There was the adorable Fan, in the depths of a most comfortable easy chair, the very realisation of Newton's "Girl at her Studies,"—that is to say, her book was wide open, her eyes fast shut: her pose was perfect; and so was her repose. Miss Harbledown, shaking with silent laughter, drew me back, and noiselessly closed the door. Pointing to the clock on the stairs, she merrily whispered, "Her hour is almost come. Don't let us rudely invade her slumbers."

Yes, the clock struck loudly, the sound of a book falling to the floor was heard within—there was a little opening and shutting of drawers, a little splashing of water, and out came Fanny, as serene and self-satisfied after "the well-spent hour" as you may suppose. "They want you down-stairs," said I with as innocent a smile as I could command. From that moment it dawned upon me that Miss Fan was a little humbug.

But what! may not one doze over a book? most certainly they may; but not pass themselves off afterwards for individuals that have had an hour's hard reading.

"What do you think of those books, Fanny?" said Miss Harbledown, mischievously; "those books that Charles recommended you: how do you like them?"

"To tell you the truth, I find them very dry," said Fan. "There are no new ideas in them: nothing but musty, rusty old thoughts cleaned up and varnished. Of course I am wading through them, because of Charles's recommendation; but when he comes home I intend to take him to task for overpraising such writers."

"I thought Macaulay, at least, was an original writer," said Miss Harbledown.

"Superficial and flashy, it seems to me," said Fanny. "He puts too much red in his brush."

"Have you looked into Carlyle?"

"Oh, yes; and think his affectation beyond everything. What successful pains he has taken to spoil his originally good plain English style!"

"How do you like Sir James Stephen?"

"Well, I like the story part of his essays very well—about St. Francis of Assissi, and Loyola, and Xavier. I got aground in the 'Clapham Sect.'"

"This girl," said Miss Harbledown afterwards to me, "must sleep with one eye and keep wide awake with the other."

I astutely suggested, "Do you think she was shamming?" But no, we could not think that.

After Charles's departure it was wonderful how flat and listless she became. Sophy and Marianne had romantic ways of accounting for it; and, of course, the presence or absence of the only young man in the family does make a difference. She took less pains to dress, less pains to amuse, less pains to observe the family rules—was generally late at prayers—and this was the way her prestige diminished. I have told how she lost, and was the occasion of her cousins' losing, the priory luncheon; and how one of them said to the other, "Just like Fan!" This was the first expression I heard from either of them of discontent with any of her proceedings, and therefore I did not know, at the moment, what feeling the words indicated. Thereafter, I knew that "just like Fan," though seldom uttered, meant anything but praise.

One day, when Sophy and I were together, she said, after a long pause, "I suppose Fan is what, if Charles and she were married, she would be after the honeymoon."

I said, "People cannot keep up company manners every day and all day long."

"Company manners? no!—but good manners they may—and she need not show us quite so plainly that she does not think us worth the pains of pleasing."

"She misses Charles, perhaps."

"Yes, doubtless that is it."

The priory invitation was renewed; and Fan, though she seemed hardly to think it worth acceptance, accompanied her cousins. A great change took place in her from that day. John Brooke, the barrister, was there, and he and Fanny were delighted with each other. She came home all animation; her high spirits and drollery returned: again she evinced the desire to please everybody; but not with the same success. How was it possible? her cousins saw, or thought they saw, that her light affections were flitting from their absent brother to an almost stranger. Therefore they cooled towards Fan, and so in some degree did their mother, though the experience of years made her more conversant with the versatility of shallow characters. The good humour of the family was ruffled, without Fan's appearing conscious of it.

Miss Harbledown said to me, "Did not I tell you so? they are learning what she is; and a good thing for them that the disenchantment has not been postponed."

Marianne, after a long reverie, broke silence one day with, "I don't seem to care much, now, for Fan's staying till Charles returns; I believe she cares little for any of us." But Fanny had no intention of going while the Brookes remained, for whose companionship she showed a marked preference, even after John had returned to the Temple. In a little while, they all took flight for St. Leonard's; Fanny had then only her cousins to fall back upon, and became very dull. After a day or two, she announced that she was going home.

"What! without waiting for Charles's return?" exclaimed Marianne, with dilated eyes.

"Dear me, yes," said Fanny; "what difference does that make?—I can't be here always, you know. I'm sure I have paid you quite a visitation, as it is."

Sophy gave Marianne a warning look not to say any more, and there was a dead silence. When Mrs. Ainslie was told, she said, calmly, "This is rather sudden, my dear—is it not?"

"Oh, no, aunt! mamma has been planning for some little time to go—somewhere; and now, I believe, she is thinking of St. Leonard's. I would not say anything of it till it was settled."

"I hope you will enjoy yourself, my dear," said Mrs. Ainslie, after a short pause. "St Leonard's is a very nice place."

The sisters looked at one another; and when their cousin left the room, one of them said, under her breath, "Just like Fan!"

I think it was just like her. She might have made warm friends among them, and have found a high-minded young husband. She failed in both, and her intimacy with the Brookes dwindled away.

THE TWO ADVOCATES.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK.

"We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."—1 John ii. 1.

"I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter."—John xiv. 16.

O an English reader it is hard to see what connection exists between these verses; and yet they are bound together by no slighter tie than this, that in them the Son and the Spirit are called by the same title, the word Advocate, in John's Epistle, being precisely the same as that which in John's Gospel is so often translated Comforter.

In order to understand either one or the other, we must know clearly the meaning of the word. It is almost English now—Para-cletos (Paraclete),* and, like advocate, means, literally, some person "called in;" whence, because we call in an eloquent pleader to speak for us, or a dear friend to mourn with us, it sometimes leans to the meaning of advocacy, and at others to that of comfort. The only question is, whether the same writer, St. John, would employ it in such different senses, especially when we find that Christ had in his mind the idea of the Spirit filling the same office with himself—he was to be another Comforter. And there are other reasons (over which we need not delay now) for believing, not by any means that the idea of comfort should be thrown out from the word as applied to the Spirit's work, but that a great deal more should be added on to that idea. If we look first at the word as applied to Christ, we shall then be more fully prepared to understand its application to the Holy Ghost.

It is as sinners, with a sense of condemnation pressing on our hearts, that we need an Advocate with the Father. Adam in the garden conversed with God (no matter which person in the God-head) without fear or shrinking, until he had broken the commandment. But when we are condemned by our own hearts of having thanklessly turned his gifts against the giver; loved the creature more than the Creator, who is over all; forsaken the fountain of living waters for broken cisterns that can hold no water, then it is no wonder if we fear to face our God. No wonder, too, if he were to reject our polluted offerings of praise, and shut his ears against our prayers; and if his love, regulated by his justice, cannot do more than suspend the stroke of vengeance. No wonder, when we have forgotten him, if he threatens to fill us with our own devices. No wonder, when we have refused to trust his mercy and his love, if his anger burn like fire. Yes, and when he has given us some knowledge of his ways, and taught us his good pleasure, and made us taste the powers of the world to come—then, if we turn again unto felly, who can wonder should a great and yawning gulf be fixed between him and us for ever? It is at least necessary that some voice should be raised in opposition to the voice of our iniquities that testify against us, and some worthiness be set up to intercede against the influence of our sins.

This is the office of our Advocate in heaven. When mere justice would demand our destruction, and when mercy has no plea to urge beyond its own relentings, then the blood of Christ supplies a reason why mercy should prevail. Sprinkled upon the mercy-seat by our interceding Priest, it proclaims that a victim has offered himself without spot for our offences. The righteous Lord, who did no violence, neither was guile found in his mouth, presents himself as our representative and pleader, and his goodness gives prevalency to his prayers.

People laugh in our days at the doctrine of imputed righteousness, but the principle which lies at the root of it is far too deep for laughter. They confess that principle themselves, when a request has to be made, for which they are anxious, and at the same time doubtful of its success. Then they look out for a man of eminent merit, or a special favourite in the place where they would prevail, and count his services an excellent reason why they should succeed. Yet this is nothing else than a confession that what he has done may fairly be thrown, like a rich mantle, around those in whom he feels an interest. And so the just claims of Christ qualify him well to be the advocate of sinful man before his Father, since his merit weighs down the ponderous wickedness of a race that is only evil, and that continually. Observe that Christ's mediation is not only the consequence of his death, but, also, it explains the sad, strange truth, that his death does not avail for all. There is merit in that sacrifice sufficient for a sin-stricken world; but then we have no claim upon that merit. That Christ died, is no more reason why we should be saved than why the devils should, apart from the further fact, that he willingly transfers his merit to his fellow-men when he pleads their cause before the Father. And while that intercession lasts, the sinner is respited; but it does not last for ever. He says, "Let it alone this year also; and if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down;" so that Christ ceases at last to plead; the sinner forces upon his Advocate, however reluctant, the consciousness that forbearance is thrown away, and the Redeemer gives him up to die. Most truly, therefore, do we read that Christ, more directly than his Father, is the judge of quick and dead. But in the meantime we are represented by him before the throne; he covers our shortcomings, compassionates our weakness, atones for our guilt; and so it is possible for God to stoop from heaven and meet his fallen creatures as a friend once more.

* Thus it occurs in Dryden's rendering of the "Veni Creator Spiritus"—

"O source of uncreated heat!
The Father's promised Paraclete,"

Now, can we find no parallel for this in anything that passes here below? If God be induced, by Christ's intercession, first to come to man, and afterward to bear with him, does man need no persuasion (fallen and guilty as he is) to come to God, and to continue in his service? "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you," said the Apostle James, but how can that be done, how shall guilty creatures venture to the judgment-seat, or fallen creatures learn to wish for grace? As God designed that of himself should be the whole atoning work, and as Christ died long before the first ray of light shot visibly across our darkness, so in the inner work, the experience of every saved man, the operation is again Divine, and begins with the pleading of his Spirit, who is the Advocate of heaven on earth and of eternity in time. One cannot help thinking that this was in our Lord's mind when he said that the Holy Ghost was like himself—"another Paraclete."

1. For example: when a sinner begins to feel that he is wretched, and that nothing on earth can satisfy his real wants; when the fruit of earthly pleasure turns to ashes upon his lips; when that for which he has toiled so long is found to be not Rachel but Leah, there is nothing, so far, to turn his soul to God. Thousands have come to this, and only plunged deeper still into the quagmire of sensual and sinful indulgence. If, then, his sorrow leadeth to repentance; if he begins to think of purer pleasures, of delights that never grow dull upon the cloyed palate, of a celestial friendship that knows neither estrangement, nor jealousy, nor suspicion; and if his ear be given to the soft whisper that has thrilled through centuries of toil—"Come unto me, all ye that are weary, and I will give you rest," plainly that desire, that upward look and attentive listening, are supernatural; they are wrought by the God who strives with man, they are tokens of the Spirit of life, breathing, as in Ezekiel's vision, across the field of death.

2. And when one who has daily read the story of Christ's life a hundred times perceives at last its Divine loveliness, and is melted to contrition and won to love, oh! be sure that he was not alone; the Third Person in the Holy Trinity claims the honour of that awakening to knowledge and to trust. He has pressed upon the torpid heart the merits and the rights of God; he has been the Advocate of the Lord with man. But this is only the beginning of a work which never ceases on this side of the grave.

3. If there are men—and there are thousands—in whom holiness has become the predominant desire; who would rather be like Christ than wear the laurels of heroes and the crowns of kings; if poor and corrupt humanity has been, at least in affection and in desire, purified from all iniquity, we cannot be persuaded that all this is the work of a strong emotion or conviction upon unaided nature. Gratitude, emulation, adoration might do it, as far as we can guess, if our hearts were what they ought to be, but now that evil instincts and evil habits have laid a tyrannous grasp on them, we require help, an ever-present guardian, an ever-vigilant reminder. Some one must be "called in" to protect us here, as well as One to intercede for us above. The Persian monarch had a man beside him in his hours of pomp, only to whisper, "O king, remember thou shalt die." Are there no lessons that we are as likely to forget, or that circumstances are as willing to beguile us of?

4. We read of joys possessed by the Christian, or which he should possess, of which the world is utterly unconscious. Eye has not seen them; ear has not heard them; heart has not conceived them: how then shall they become known to the regenerate man, except in the way that St. Paul actually fixes on, "God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit?" He, from his lowly shrine in the heart that has become a temple, darts a celestial energy through it all; he paints the pictures which eye of flesh has never gazed upon, breathes the melodies that mortal ear has never caught, and imparts a rapture that goes down too far for the poor heart to throb responsive, searching the deep things of God, telling us what he has prepared for them that love him, and becoming in his own august person the pledge and first-fruit of that glorious inheritance which is to come. Then the strokes of adverse fortune buffet the steadfast heart in vain. Then the void places of bereavement are filled once more as we anticipate blissful meetings in the Jerusalem above, and feel that by the presence of the Holy Ghost, Father and Son have also come and made their abode within us. Then the hiss of the serpent ceases to beguile, and the fruit of the forbidden tree to tempt, because we have a holier banquet and a deeper knowledge, and an ever-vigilant guardian in the soul.

"O source of uncreated heat!
The Father's promised Paraclete,

Thrice holy fount, thrice holy fire,
Our souls with heavenly love inspire:
Come, and thy sacred influence bring,
To sanctify us while we sing."

Sacred Spirit, "Breath" of the Living God, proceeding from the Father and the Son, as when of old Christ breathed on his disciples and the unction came, well art thou called the Comforter, and not Comforter alone, but Strengtheners of men, and Advocate for us on earth, as Christ is Advocate before the throne.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—II.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

AND thus Captain Archibald Scott found himself appointed an Almoner to the Society for the Relief of Distress and for the first time, perhaps, in his life, put in the way of making himself useful to his fellow-creatures.

His friend, Sydney Welworth, who was not a man to lose an opportunity, insisted upon taking him that very evening, though already near six o'clock, for a short round through what he chose to call his home diocese, so that he might begin at once to learn his business, and be put in the way of his new duties.

"But," began Archie, as they trudged along together through the snow, "you have taken me so suddenly, there is one thing I have quite forgotten till now; how much is the subscription—what has one to pay to become a member of this club—well, society, or whatever you call it? I meant to have taken my name off two or three of those I already belonged to, because, on my present reduced means, I can't afford them as I used to do."

"Oh, subscription! just what you like; a fiver will be plenty, if you have it to spare, and if you think it will give you more interest in your work; or a guinea, if that is too much; but anything, or nothing if you like. Nobody will ask you for any subscription; the fact is, we don't want money, but we want men—idle fellows, that is, who have their time on their own hands, like you—to work for us; there are plenty who will give us all the money, or even more than we want; but the difficulty is, to get the men whom we can trust for discretion and other qualities, who will give up their time and take the trouble to distribute our funds, and do the working part of the relief for us."

"It seems rather an original idea, and a queer fancy too," said Archie, after another long pause of consideration. "I wonder what first put it into your heads, and who set the thing going."

"Why, for the matter of that," replied his Mentor, "one might almost say it was by accident, or spontaneously; that, as so often happens, the same idea seemed to strike several people at one and the same time.

"It is well known what immense difficulties are thrown in the way of many philanthropical societies by the want of funds, and that these difficulties are materially increased by the, as hitherto supposed, necessity of each society supporting a staff of high-paid officials, who, in many cases, do only half their duty, and in some rather less. In order to avoid this expense, a proposition was made by a well-known writer, to start a society upon a simple, though a new and hitherto untried system, in which, though all classes were included, the wealthy and fashionable denizens of the West End were more especially urged to come forward, not only with mere contributions in the shape of money, as heretofore, but with some of that time and work, in personal visitation, which they, of all others, might be well supposed to be able to spare gratuitously.

"This idea was well taken up, and soon began to spread itself. A general meeting was held, to which not a few of the smart men about town went, each individual of whom had gone in, perhaps, half-shyly, expecting to find himself out of his element, and thrown amongst a lot of strangers of a totally different set, and whose ordinary views would have nothing in common with his own, but was surprised and pleased to meet many of his most familiar friends and fellow-loungers of the club and park railings, induced, like himself, by their own inward better feelings, to come and offer their services. In trying to do some good, if they could only be shown how, and where to set about it.

"A new organisation of this sort could not, of course, be allowed to start without the usual amount of cold water being thrown over it, in the shape of all kinds of doubts, difficulties, sneers, and sinister forebodings, with sundry disinterested suggestions as to the present many excellent channels for charity being already more than sufficient; but a leading article in the Times did much towards kindly backing up the undertaking, and a good-humoured rejoinder from the leader of the movement also appeared in the same paper, deprecating all rivalry with any existing societies, and in reply to the many objections and assertions as to the folly of expecting, and the impossibility of procuring, efficient volunteer almoners, merely announcing the number of letters already received by himself, as chairman, from educated gentlemen of quality and high position, offering their time and services gratuitously, so that, as he happily suggested, he had reason to hope that 'to do good might some day possibly become the fashion, and that the angels would, perhaps, smile through their tears at this new phase of our eccentricity.'

"Why, that's a quotation from what's-his-name—'Tristram Shandy'—isn't it?" interrupted Archie Scott. "I remember those very words—or something very much like them, in a book which used to be lying about our barrack mess-room."

"Well, not exactly, though it may be something like one," said Sydney, smiling; "and I am not at all sure that the writer himself was not also labouring under the same mistake. But, to go on with the new society: amongst its other special characteristics, a strict rule was from the first established that there should be no paid touters, I mean, canvassers, or collectors of subscriptions, no opening dinner, fancy bazaar, or any other of those usual means of making money, which have always been considered, or at least declared to be, absolute necessities for the existence of any charitable undertaking."

"In the next place, a guarantee committee of eighteen or twenty members undertook to defray the entire working expenses of the society separately and distinctly, from their own pockets, so that not one farthing of the money contributed by the general public for the charity should be put to any other purpose than that for which it was subscribed; and what do you suppose was the whole cost of working the organisation through which, in the course of each year, or more properly speaking, each winter, a sum of upwards of £4,000, £5,000, or this last year, I believe, it will be very little short of £7,000, has been distributed in every part of London, by upwards of a hundred volunteer almoners?"

"I have no idea," said Archie, "perhaps five-and-twenty or thirty per cent., as I know, by your tone, it has been done reasonably."

"Not half that. Last year, I know, when everything was paid for—printing, stationery, postage, advertisements (that is, acknowledging subscriptions in the papers)—the exact sum total amounted to £325 10s. 10d., which sum included £100 a-year salary of the one paid permanent secretary, and the rent of that quaint little committee-room, to which I took you this afternoon, and which we get at an extraordinarily low price, from the fact of its being, as you may have perceived, an entresol close under the very boards of the great public assembly-rooms of the West End, where, during the season, there are continual balls, concerts, meetings, and crowded gatherings of all sorts going on, almost without interruption, night and day, so as to render it perfectly impossible for any one who was not stone-deaf to ever have even a chance of a wink of sleep there. Twice a week all through the winter the working committee of eighteen members, besides the three indefatigable honorary secretaries, one of whom is always there daily, meet to receive and consider cases of distress, and to vote what grants of money shall be sent to the several almoners as they may have applied for funds for distribution in their respective districts. Strictly avoiding all sectarian views, the only question asked, or condition required is, as to the truth and degree of the distress."

"The system, you see, works well, and does good at both the extreme ends of society at the same time, as the writer to whom I have already referred pointed out in a letter in which he was pleased to bestow a commendatory 'pat on the back' to the new scheme, in about the second year of its existence, and by the time that it might be said to have fairly got under weigh, although one knows that he is not at all apt to be too complimentary with his pen unless he thinks praise really well deserved. It was thus he wrote of them:—

" 'The working committee are, essentially, men of the world, in its usual sense—club loungers. This society may be looked upon as the impersonation of the charitable element of the fashionable clubs. West-end men, hitherto looked upon by the general world, as likely to care but little for these things, are found going on their good errand into the most wretched districts of London, personally communicating with philanthropists, male and female, of every creed, rank, and profession, not only giving no offence to any, but leaving a most favourable impression in quarters where such might perhaps have been least expected. Is a heathen costermonger one bit more to be considered a pitiable object than a West-end wealthy idler, who fritters away his miserable life in club, turf, park, opera, and St. John's Wood? Here is Dives introduced to Lazarus, both extremes of the social scale are brought together, both may have much to learn and gain in mutual respect for one another, by thus meeting under circumstances so desirable and advantageous to each of them.' "

UNDER THE IVIED BRIDGE.

WE were alone, my friend and I,
Sitting under the ivied bridge,
Watching the golden stream go by,
Dashed from rocky ridge to ridge.

Through the ivied arch you see
The rivulet winding swiftly down,
With mirrored hues of sky and tree,
Green and blue, and dusky brown ;

And far as eye can follow it
Upward in its winding way,
Leafy boughs above it knit
Tremulous leaf and dancing spray.

There full long we sat and mused,
And rose at last to move away,
When he, to dreamy thought unused,
Turned with a smiling face and gay,

And said, in accents low and deep,
With eyes full solemn and true, "Ah well !
This were a place for elves to sleep,
And here, I wis, the fairies dwell !"

Over my brain a music swept
As into his thought my fancy strayed ;

Blissful memories backward crept ;
And straight my heart its answer made :—

"Yea, when I was a little child,
Here a gleesome life they led,
Up in the leafy coppice wild,
And mid the rocks by the river-bed :

"Oft when stealing away alone
Among the meadow flowers of May,
Heard I fairy music blown
Low in the grass-plumes purple and grey ;

"Fairies swung in light bluebell,
And fairies sung in gladsome wood,—
Here no longer do they dwell
To bring delight to solitude.

"Now, in bliss or in agony,
When with a heart as noble and good,
An eye as pure and soul as free,
I walk by river and leafy wood,

"Not fairy troops make glad the sight,
But spirit-footprints over the sod,
And in my ear the breezes light
Whisper words of a gracious God."

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XV.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

BEING such a pleasant pastime to meet Peggy, Captain Oglivie found means to indulge it pretty freely, and Fortune, in the shape of Mrs. Grant, favoured him in this. She contrived that by an exchange of churches, the family should enjoy the benefit of mountain air for a season ; and she left Peggy somewhat chilled, through the process which is called "turning the cold shoulder," on the eve of their rather sudden departure.

Peggy had frankly informed her new friend that she had not yet mentioned his name to her grandfather ; upon which he had taken occasion to say that it was better not to do so, for the present ; indeed, it would be better that his stay in the neighbourhood should not be mentioned at all.

The girl had been brought up in the bracing atmosphere of freedom, not in the sickly air of constant surveillance exercised in some classes of society, which seems to take it for granted that if a girl goes out unattended, she must get into mischief. Anything like concealment was foreign to her ; but she had been accustomed to consider her goings and comings of no moment to any one, and her childish confidences had been ruthlessly repressed.

Still at first she longed for some one to confide in.

She could not have sat beside slightly ungenial Mrs. Grant, had she been with her as usual, without speaking ; and when she went away without giving her an opportunity for doing so, the girl found herself longing for her dead mother more intensely than she had ever done before.

But she had to lead her life apart, always dangerous, and especially dangerous to the dreamer, who loses the power of testing the realities of things. Any one with experience of life, could have guessed how these meetings would end ; and even rough but honest Jean, by simply awakening her to the truth, would have held her back ; but there had already crept over her the fatal shy tenderness, which shrunk from exposing itself to such an ordeal.

So she met her cousin, as she now called him, almost daily, and her active life turned into a beautiful and bewitching dream.

As for him, he took no thought for her. Her evident liking for him was more and more gratifying. She made his life down there quite endurable, flavouring it with a spice of adventure besides. She was growing prettier every day, blooming like a wild rose, with a child-like, flower-like grace. She was very good and very happy ; he was really getting very fond of her. What could a kiss or two matter ; or a longer look into the eyes that drooped under his ever more and more tenderly ; or a more thrilling pressure of the little hand, that lingered in his own ever more and more lovingly? If he had searched his heart, he might have found there a latent suspicion that he was a great rascal; but then he would have consoled himself by thinking that she was a little fool, if she broke her heart.

The late summer of the north, was still at its height, though the August moon was at the full, and the evenings were shortening rapidly. Captain Oglivie's stay had come to an end at last. His mother required—so he said—his presence in England. He was to say good-bye to Peggy in the little wood by moonlight.

It was not at all an unusual thing for her to steal out into the moonlight, beyond the precincts of the garden. Jean did not deign to notice a proceeding so foolish. What good any mortal could get wandering among black ghostly trees, sighing (the sigh of the wind in a tree) and creakin', she could not comprehend. The night air was unwholesome, and though she had parted with a hereditary belief in witches and warlocks, she still felt that it was "no quite cannie"—not altogether safe in fact.

And when her young mistress came back through the kitchen, with her face a little paler, as if it had drunk the moonlight, Jean would forbear remark till she was gone, when she would say to Tammass, "She's a strange lassie; she aye looks as if she had been sayin' her prayers when she comes in that gate, and I dinna like to speak, but it's no like a Christian to gang out there, instead o' sayin' them at her ain bedside."

"Ay, ay!" Tammass would answer, "let her alane; we're a set o' godless auld folk, and she'll, maybe, bring a blessing on us."

The moon was up, and Peggy went out by the garden gate and made her way to the Horse-shoe Clump. Once or twice she stood still; a sigh rose among the trees and died away again. It seemed as if a wind that came from nowhere, or rather like the breathing of the trees themselves. There was a sense of mystery among them; a feeling not of daylight loneliness, but of mysterious companionship,—a feeling which most people sedulously shut their doors against, closing their shutters and lighting their lamps to keep out its strange illusions.

But instead of shutting it out, Peggy Oglivie threw open her whole soul to its influence. The feeling has nothing of romance in it. She was not romantic; she had a keen dislike to the sentimental. She was not superstitious; superstition is only a degradation of it. It had come to her even in the daylight, a kind of second sight, a seeing of things in their essential beauty and glory.

It was upon her to-night. There stood the clump, every tree and pillar of ebony overarched by fretwork of silver. Through the fretted roof the moonlight fell upon the ground in fantastic patterns. She crossed them with her shadow, and another shadow fell there without startling her. She felt a little shiver, such as she imagined the trees feeling when a shower of moonlight streamed upon them, as the figure came into the light.

Some dry twigs cracked under her feet, and Horace Oglivie started from his leaning posture and advanced to meet her. She was coming along a track of moonlight. A soft black hood surrounded her face, which was altogether pale, and did not show as by day the soft wild rose and the browning of the summer sun. It was really pale with the exaltation of her mood, and not only with the effect of the light.

She loosened her hand from her dark cloak as she came near, and it fell away, and let the rays stream down her dress and clothe her in white. He took her hand in silence. He had never seen her look like this. He had intended to part warmly and gallantly, and he felt at once that it would be a graver matter than he wished. The cold little hand that rested in his, awed him. He dared not carry it to his lips.

"I am ready to believe in fairies here," he said, in a low tone, "and to think that you are one of them: you have a kind of glimmer over you." (Jean would have called it glamour, which means witchery besides.)

"It is the way in the wood," said the girl, smiling and also speaking low. She looked mistress of the ceremonies as she spoke.

Horace Oglivie felt rather uncomfortable. He tried another jest about the ghostliness of the place, but she did not laugh; she could not have done anything so out of sympathy with the solemn beauty of the scene.

For him, he had come to enjoy a parting interview with a pretty girl whom he almost loved, and over whom he felt he had considerable power. But this was a creature over whom he had no power at all, a creature of another sphere. This was not the laughing, blushing girl of yesterday; and, strangely lovely as she looked, he was disappointed, and hardly knew what to say.

He had no power over her, but her own dream had power. It held her spell-bound. She did not heed his silence; his presence was enough. She could not discern that they two, walking there side by side, were walking in different worlds, so far apart that neither by voice nor touch was the one within reach of the other.

They walked round the platform for some time in a silence which Horace Oglivie felt to be oppressive, all the more oppressive that he vainly tried to break through it into a vein of either sentiment or gaiety. They turned, and came again into the centre of the clump: the moon fully illuminated it. Peggy pointed to what she had called the window of her chapel; it was a perfect Gothic work of ebony and silver.

"It is very like a chapel," he said; "what a delightful place to get married in, according to the Scotch system." In utter recklessness he stood by her side, and took her unresisting hand, saying, with mock solemnity, "I Horace Oglivie take thee, Margaret Oglivie, to be my wedded wife."

"That is enough, you know, in Scotland to bind us together for life," he added, in a tone of tenderness. The next minute, the girl was weeping on his breast.

What could he do but soothe her, as he led her homeward, with promises of affection, false enough to her hope as they were;—but tell her, vainly enough, he might have known, to think as little as she could of him in the meantime, and to look forward to his return sooner or later? As he parted from her at the garden gate, which was the exit from her short-lived paradise, that latent suspicion which has been indicated, did rise in his heart, and he did try to console himself with the thought, that she was, after all, a little fool.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE MUSIC OF THE PINES.

THEY were not bitter tears that Peggy Oglivie had wept at that last interview with her cousin; they had little of the anguish of parting in them. They had, in truth, more of tenderness than trouble in their flow. Neither doubt nor misgiving entered into her mind with regard to the captain's sincerity. The natural language of love had never been falsified to her, as it is to some, in wanton folly, or worse, and she did not question the truth it conveyed in look and touch and tone. No warning voice had ever whispered in her ears concerning the faithlessness of man.

She sat in the wood, in her chosen haunt, day after day, when he was gone, feeding her heart on the remembered sweetness of his presence, till her life lapsed into a dream; and the music of the wood wore itself into her dream, and floated her away, on its sighing waves of sound, further and further from the actual world.

A look came into the girl's face which made Jean more than once ask her what she was listening for; and when, standing looking down among the trees, she answered, with a smile, "The music of the pines," the old woman gave a grunt of disapprobation, and added, "Ye look just as if ye expected somebody."

Jean was a shrewd observer. Peggy might have answered truly that she expected nobody, but there was expectation at the bottom of her heart, the awakened expectation of eventful life, the expectation of something—not anything in particular, but something to happen; and when she listened to the music of the pines it was with a vague yearning for some message from the future. Sometimes through their soft sighing murmurs of content there went something like a wail of lamentation. By habit and by nature the solitary girl was a dreamer. But it is a mistake to suppose that the dreamer is always weak, and, lapped in unreality, loses the power of sober action. There is a power in dreams, not only to lift the dreamer out of the actual present—which may be a doubtful gain—but to get themselves realised in the future. The dream in which a man or woman lives is usually richer, nobler, and sweeter than the life in which he or she moves; for who, with the unlimited power of choice which dreamland offers, would choose the poor, the mean, and the bitter? Of itself, it will tend to enrich and ennoble and sweeten the actual life, and if the active powers are equal to the task, they will consciously and unconsciously strive to assimilate the lower to the higher. If not, the individual is all the better for his unsubstantial happiness; the world none the worse.

But for a time the dream suffices for itself. And so it was with Peggy Oglivie. She did not even long for the presence of her lover—was he not with her always? she had but to close her eyes, with the murmur of the wood about her, to be visited by his look, his smile grown more radiant and more tender in that "light that never was on sea or land," though to her it seemed only that of a summer moon. Would the time come when it would "fade into the light of common day?"—would there be an awakening, which might turn the dream into a torment of self-pity and self-scorn?

So the days went past, some of them wet and windy, though harvest-time was drawing near. And the summer had been brief, for the spring was late and cold, only it had been very bright while it lasted. Jean heard from the kirk-door gossip that the Grants were coming back at last. They had already long exceeded their purposed stay.

The truth was, the more inclination the two youngsters showed to get home again, the more determined was their mother that they should remain where they were. They read and roamed with their father, or roamed and did not read; and enjoyed themselves, truth to tell, more or less. Archie was troubled, now and then, with a longing to leap out of his bedroom window and take a moonlight march across the country—it was only some thirty miles to Delaube, but prudence and Sandie, and a love of sound sleep, prevailed to the contrary.

Both Sandie and Archie, however, openly rebelled against the proposal that they should go up to town without returning home, in order to begin their studies before the ensuing session, and make a little way by means of thorough preparation under the direction of a friend of their father's. Accordingly, a compromise was effected, at which they could not murmur, when they were duly reminded of the idleness which made extra exertion necessary. They were to spend three days at home, when Mrs. Grant, who had business to transact there, would herself accompany them to town.

It was the afternoon of Saturday before they reached the manse, and as they were to leave on the afternoon of Monday, it appeared that the three days would be very short indeed. Nothing is so favourable to mental explosions as hurry; it exercises the requisite amount of compression, without which the fumes of love or folly would quietly escape. The encroachment on these three days caused our heroes to explode—happily, only in mutual confidences.

On the evening before their return they had climbed the summit of a hill, to watch the sun go down. Not a creature was in sight, except two horses that stood on the edge of a cliff, the one a head in advance of the other, listening with all their might. The brothers lay on their backs, looking at the world upside down, as it were—a process that has its advantages, in imparting new views of things. What they saw was a heaving multitude of hill-tops, swimming in a blood-red sky. Down behind some black bars went a round sun, and gradually sunk from sight into a second chaos. It was a startling, not a soothing, sunset.

Archie was the first to jump to his feet. "Come along, old boy," he said; "we'll be late again, only little Peg can't get the blame to-night, so it doesn't matter so much."

"We won't see much more of her this time," said Sandie.

"Mother might have asked her up here for a week," murmured Archie.

"She thinks we waste our time," returned Sandie.

"If it hadn't been for her," said Archie, vaulting over a huge stone in the descent, "I would have cut the college, and run away to sea. I'll, maybe, do it yet."

"Do you mean that you care that much for her," said Sandie, with a look into his brother's face which made the latter exclaim, instead of answering, "And you, too!" which meant a flinging back of the question already answered. "She would never look at me," said Sandie, despondingly, "so it doesn't matter."

"Try," said his brother.

Sandie shook his head. "Try you."

"I would like well enough to leave the country and make my fortune abroad," said Archie, "if they," indicating the abode of his father and mother, "would give consent. I would come back as rich as a Jew, and as yellow as a guinea, and leave my money to you and Peg."

"They said nothing more then. As usual, they seemed to understand each other.

So it had come to this; and here were Mrs. Grant's worst fears realised, her utmost precautions justified, and vain.

It was somewhat late on Saturday before any opportunity for action occurred to Archie, who had set his mind on something active—he hardly knew what. He knew by that time that unless he made it for himself, he would not have an opportunity of even saying good-bye, except in his mother's presence.

What he would ask of Peggy he did not well know, except that she should remain at his disposal till he was ready for her. He had vigorous twinges of self-reproach at taking—though Sandie had resolutely refused—the first chance; and, finally, he almost made up his mind to speak for his brother, instead of for himself.

Thus it came to pass that in the evening the brothers set out together, and that when they reached the river where it could be crossed into the wood at the foot of Delaube, Archie took the way over, while Sandie marched, a rather rueful sentinel, on the other side.

Archie had not long been gone when Dr. Grant made his appearance, and came up to Sandie as he paced along. It was such an unusual thing to find the one apart from the other, that, very naturally, the doctor asked, "Where is Archie?"

"He's gone to speak to Peggy," said that ingenuous youth, with some hesitation, and blushing all over.

"What's he got to say to her?" asked his father, with a penetrating glance, and an elevation of the eyebrows, in which there was some wonder, and no little perplexity.

Even to equivocate was beyond Sandie's power, so he answered, simply, "To say good-bye."

"And why don't you go and say good-bye too?" was the very obvious rejoinder.

Sandie preserved total silence, and the man was too delicate—with a delicacy rare in the relationship of father and son—to press the youth further.

But that it would have involved his brother, whose confession he had no right to make, the doctor would have been rewarded on the spot by a complete revelation of his son's sentiments. As it was, Sandie resolved to urge his brother to make a clean breast of it at the earliest opportunity.

"I don't think I'll ever do any good at college," he said, dolefully.

His father was sorely perplexed at this new phase of things. He drew his son's arm within his own and walked with him, speaking encouragement in the vague way in which that stimulant is usually applied. "Of course," he added, "if you find that it is impossible for you to succeed in the career we would choose for you, a change must be made; but it will be a great disappointment to your mother and me."

With this Dr. Grant shook his son's hand and left him, saying as he departed, "Whatever lot they choose, I hope and believe that my sons will be always honourable, upright, and sincere."

And Sandie, as he looks after him, thinks it will go hard with him indeed if he disappoints his father in that.

No long time elapsed before his brother again appeared, striding down to the river-side. A dozen dextrous leaps, and he was at his side.

Almost before he reached the shore Sandie had communicated the intelligence of his meeting with his father. "Let's tell him as soon as we get home," he added.

"Tell him what?" said Archie, provokingly; "there's nothing to tell."

"Ye haven't seen her?"

"I'll tell you what it is, Sandie: it's big nonsense. I stood still in the middle o' the wood, to think what I would say, and I saw her sittin' there; but she looked ever so far away, and the very trees in the wood seemed laughin' at me. I was glad she never noticed me, and I stole away again without once lookin' back. It's your turn, next time."

"Fair play's a jewel," said Sandie, laughing; "but I'll wait a bit and work a bit, first."

"Let's go in for a regular burst of hard work," rejoined Archie, beginning at once by starting homeward at a rapid pace.

OLD SAWS IN NEW SETTINGS, FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

BY SIDNEY DARYL.

"Where there's a will there's a way."

PART I.

THROUGH the unceasing exertions and indomitable energy of the head-master, Dr. Lawson, Rosleigh Grammar School had, at the time of my story, risen to occupy a very prominent and important position among the educational establishments of the country. When he assumed the reins of management, its fortunes had fallen sadly into decay, owing to the careless indifference and miserable incompetency of his predecessor in office; no longer, as of yore, did it send up the best scholars to the university, and the sagacious professors at Alma Mater began to whisper among themselves that the old Blankshire school was going to the dogs, and that the sooner it was shut up the better.

At last, and not a bit too soon, the dictator, who had so disastrously presided over the destinies of Rosleigh, slept with his fathers, and the trustees of the foundation set about looking for some one to fill his place; but though they held out all sorts of tempting baits, in the shape of increased salary, and other lures of a like appetising character, somehow candidates were not forthcoming. In fact, it began to look very much as if they would have to close the premises, and retire from business.

With much the same sensations, as those which are experienced by the captain of a waterlogged ship, when he finds himself passing in through the harbour entrance, Dr. (then Mr.) Lawson's application for the vacant post was received by the trustees of the Rosleigh foundation. His testimonials from Harton, where he had been one of the under-masters, were unexceptionable, while his manner and speech betokened the scholar and the gentleman. Like Cæsar, he might have exclaimed, Veni, vidi, vici! for, after little more than five minutes' conversation, he was informed that the offer of his services was accepted; and in less than a fortnight he was installed in his new position. And right well did he become it, and show himself equal to its duties and responsibilities.

Slowly, but surely, the number of boys increased—the best possible evidence that the reputation of Rosleigh was improving—till the list reached its full complement, and already many names were down in order, so that those who purposed filling up the vacancies as they might occur, should have the opportunity of securing their place in good time. Dr. Lawson had not undergone his experience at Harton for nothing, he was a staunch and enthusiastic believer in the monitorial and fagging systems, and was of opinion that the more a boy is made to depend upon himself, the better man will he become in after years. Above all, he sought to foster a feeling of sympathy and good-will between the masters and the pupils, he himself setting the example to encourage confidence from the boys to him, always impressing upon them the trust and faith he had in their honour. How right he was in doing thus, the name that Rosleigh gained under his rule, and the loving memory in which his old pupils held him, are proofs that cannot be contradicted. There must be something great as well as good in a man, who can weather the foolish prejudices of schoolboys, and gain not only their respect and obedience, but their affection.

It was a lovely summer's afternoon, and full advantage was being taken of the glorious July day by the Rosleigh School Eleven. The annual match of Past and Present was going on, and had as usual attracted a large number of visitors. The "old boys" had just finished their innings to the tune of 175 runs, and the short interval that was to elapse before "the Present" went to the wickets, was being occupied in the consumption of certain cooling drinks most considerately supplied by Dr. Lawson, who, with his wife and daughter, always put in an appearance on these festive occasions, and evinced much interest and pleasure in the proceedings.

The score was a long one to go in against for young players; and Barnard, the captain of the school eleven, knowing the capabilities of his team, felt it his duty to impress upon the two he was sending in first the necessity for playing carefully and steadily.

"Mind, Pretor," he said, with a twinkle in his eye, to one of them, a fine strapping lad, apparently about seventeen, "you are to keep your wicket up for the first hour, and then go in for hitting as much as you like."

"Most noble captain, I will endeavour so to do; but the glorious game abounds in accidents, and, as you are doubtless aware, they will occur in the best-regulated establishments," was the rejoinder of the young gentlemen so addressed, who was commonly known as "Cheeky Pretor," a title for which, as a faithful biographer, I am bound to say he was duly qualified. It must not be supposed that thereby I intend to convey the notion that he was a disagreeable and unpopular boy with his schoolfellows; on the contrary, every one liked him. He was the terror of bullies and the adoration of all the small boys, who always found in him a sure champion and avenger.

Charlie Pretor was a very idle fellow. There is no use disguising the fact; and as I hope to make peace for him by-and-by, it is just as well to make a clean breast of it at once. That he was kind-hearted, generous, and honourable, masters and boys admitted alike; that he neglected his work and wasted his time was a fact equally indisputable. He had no application—could never set himself down methodically to learning his lessons or doing his work, but would put it off till the last minute, with results, in the earlier part of his career at Rosleigh, of a singularly painful character. On more than one occasion Dr. Lawson had almost made up his mind to send him away from the school, but Mrs. Lawson, with whom Charlie was a great favourite, was a staunch advocate in his behalf, and she never pleaded with her husband in vain. So he remained at Rosleigh, gradually ascending in the school, till, at the time we make his acquaintance, he had just been promoted into the fifth form, where there was every prospect of his remaining until he left Rosleigh for good and all.

I must here wander away from the beaten track for a moment, to enter into certain details that cannot be omitted. Attached to the Rosleigh foundation were two exhibitions of £10 a year each, which were, after all, but poor things, and little calculated to incite any very vigorous competition. Since Dr. Lawson's accession to power, however, two or three more valuable prizes had been founded, and in the early part of the year in which my story is laid an old pupil of his of the name of Beauchamp had died, and bequeathed a sum of money to the trustees of the school, for the creation of a scholarship of £50 a year, to be held for three years, to be called the Lawson Scholarship. It was open to the boys generally, but it may readily be understood that only the seniors were likely to compete for it. No date had yet been fixed on for the examination of the candidates, but it was generally understood that it would take place towards the end of the present midsummer quarter, and those who intended offering themselves had already commenced reading hard, in anticipation. Undoubtedly, there was every prospect that the first competition for the Lawson Scholarship, though select as far as the numbers were concerned, would be none the less severe.

And now to return for the present to the cricket-ground and Dr. Lawson, who is not in the least ashamed to show that he is getting very much excited as to the ultimate result of the match, and becomes quite nervous and restless, as the fall of each wicket makes the chances of success for the boys more remote. Charlie still remains to the fore, and has long since exceeded the hour allowed him by the captain to play steady. Barnard has come in and gone back to the tent again, without doing anything remarkable; and though "the Present" are still thirty runs behind their opponents, there are only two more to go in to aid Charlie in supplying the deficiency.

"How splendidly Charlie is playing!" exclaimed Mrs. Lawson, as that young gentleman made a smart hit for four. She was delighted to see her favourite showing forth to such advantage, and inwardly flattered herself for having rescued him from the expulsion that, unknown to him, had so often threatened him.

"Bravo, Pretor! Capital! splendid hit!" shouted the Doctor, standing up to see how far the ball had gone, and clapping his hands enthusiastically. All Master Scapegrace's shortcomings and grievous misdemeanours in the matter of Latin prose and such like nuisances, as he termed them, were forgotten, ay, and forgiven too at that moment; it was enough for his master that he was putting together a splendid score in faultless style, and might likely enough secure victory for his side. What if the metre of his last hexameter exercise limped and halted—the lameness of his versification had not extended to his legs, which carried him between the wickets with marvellous activity.

To make a long matter short, Charlie did win the match, carrying out his bat with no less than ninety-four runs attached to his name,—a performance which was rewarded with loud and general applause. Foremost amongst those who congratulated him was the Doctor himself, who at the same time conveyed to him a message to the effect that Mrs. Lawson wished him to come in and have tea with her. Charlie was only too pleased to receive the invitation, and hurried away as quickly as he could to his room to make himself tidy, preparatory to appearing in the Doctor's drawing-room.

How often it happens, when we are in the happiest frame of mind imaginable, and feel inclined to regard things in their most roseate aspect, that something happens which suddenly dispels all the sunshine and brightness. Young and old both learn this, and feel it according to their condition. As Charlie hastened up from the cricket-ground he was as contented and joyous as boy could be; he had made a splendid score, had gained the victory for his side, and was once again restored to the Doctor's favour. When he got to his room he found a letter from his father, which drove the smile from his cheek, the laughter from his eye, and startled him to serious reflection. It ran thus:—

Cleveland Square, J-yly 4th, 18—.

MY DEAR SON,—I am very sorry to have to write and tell you that we are all in very great trouble at home; but as you are getting a big fellow now, and will soon have to leave Rosleigh, sooner even than I ever expected, I think you ought to know what has happened. You have often heard me speak of a Financial Company, in which I had invested a great deal of money, and which I have always regarded as perfectly safe and trustworthy. Yesterday morning I was well-nigh crushed by receiving a circular informing me that, owing to the secretary having absconded, leaving behind him forgeries and defalcations to an enormous amount, the directors had felt compelled to appeal to the Court of Chancery to wind up the concern. Thus my whole income, with the exception of a slender competency, has been swallowed up; in fact, I very much doubt, at the moment, whether I shall be able to keep you at Rosleigh till the end of the year, as I could have wished. I fear, my dear boy, you have scarcely been as industrious as you might; but then, perhaps, you are not so much to blame as I am myself for having encouraged you in the notion that I should be able to provide for you. It grieves me much to think that I must abandon my long-cherished notion of sending you to Oxford; but that is now, of course, quite out of the question. You need not mention the contents of this letter to any one; but, at the same time, do not allow it to make you unhappy. The holidays will soon be here, and then we can settle what is best to be done. Your mother desires me to send you a kiss; she is too much out of spirits to write to you herself. God bless you, my boy; and with my best love, Believe me, your affectionate father,

GEORGE PRETOR.

It may readily be understood that the news thus conveyed to him was most unexpected. He had become so accustomed to having everything from home that he wanted, that he had never paused to ask himself how it was provided. There are some people in this world who would sleep life away in calm indifference, but for some great misfortune happening to them, that awakens them to their uselessness. Charlie was one of these. Till now he had idled and frittered away all the golden opportunities of education provided him; but the season of indolence was passed; and henceforth nothing remained for him but to put his shoulder to the wheel, and endeavour, as far as possible, to make up for lost time. His father's letter seemed to inaugurate a new period in his existence; the past was as an old jacket, that he had taken off and thrown into the dusthole,—so full of patches and tatters that he was glad to hide it from his eyes.

Both the Doctor and Mrs. Lawson were much surprised at the change in Charlie's manner that evening. He was so quiet and yet earnest in all he said—quite different to his ordinary rattling, noisy style of conversation—that he astonished them, and, I may add, puzzled them considerably. It was as if the careless, thoughtless lad had been transformed into the serious, thinking man.

As he shook hands with the Doctor, and said good night, he remained for a moment, as if he wished to add something.

"Have you anything you want to say to me, Pretor? because, if you have, come along with me into my study," inquired the head-master.

"No, sir; nothing particular. I only wanted to know when the examination for the Lawson Scholarship will take place," was the answer.

"It is not yet arranged," replied the Doctor; "but I hope to be able to announce the date in the course of to-morrow."

And with that Charlie went away to his room. When he reached it—for he had one all to himself, the agreeable consequence of being a favourite with Mrs. Lawson—he sat down by the open window. No need to disclose the communing he held with himself—the retrospect of the past, the resolution for the future. There was a bright star that, shining in the heavenly firmament, seemed to unfold to him his destiny,—a beacon of hope and encouragement. And he remembered that far up above, in realms beyond, dwelleth the Unseen, with whose help all things are possible for mortal man to accomplish. The school clock struck twelve, and roused Charlie from his reverie. And then he went to bed and slept on it.

FAITHFUL AND BRAVE.

NARRATED TO WILLIAM H. G. KINGSTON.

I WAS, many years ago, first-lieutenant of the Rainbow frigate. We were fitting out alongside the old Topaz hulk, in Portsmouth Harbour, for the North American and West India stations, at that time united under one command. We were nearly ready for sea, but still were a good many hands short of our complement. For want of better, we had entered several men, who would, I was afraid, prove but hard bargains—one especially, who gave the name of John Jones, was a great big hulking fellow, with an unpleasant expression of countenance, out of whom I guessed but little work was to be got. The same day he joined, another man came aboard and volunteered. He was a fine, active, intelligent fellow. He said that his name was William Ellis, and that he had been eight years at sea, in the merchant service. If there was little work in Jones, there was plenty in him I saw, though he was a remarkably quiet-looking man. He answered the questions put to him, but did not volunteer a word about himself.

We had gone out to Spithead, and the Blue Peter was flying aloft, when a shore boat came alongside. In the boat was a young woman, nicely, though very plainly dressed, and a lad, who looked like her brother. She asked leave to come on board, and inquired for William Ellis. Ellis was aloft. His name had been loudly called along the lower deck, before, casting his eyes below, having finished his work, they fell on her. She gave a half-shriek of terror as she saw him, quick as lightning, gliding down the rigging. He, in another moment, was by her side. A blush was on his manly cheek, as he took her hand and warmly pressed it. They talked earnestly for some time. He did not ask her to move from the spot where they stood. At length, with a sigh, having shaken hands with the lad, he prepared to help her into the boat. Her last words, pronounced in a firm, though sweet voice, were, "Oh! remember."

I was particularly struck by her quiet, modest manner, and her pleasing, intelligent expression of countenance. We had despatches for Jamaica and other West India Islands, which we visited in turn. Ellis continued, as at first, one of the most quiet, well-behaved men in the ship. Every moment of his watch below—that is to say, when off duty—he was engaged in reading, chiefly, as I afterwards found, the Bible. In those days, a Bible on the lower deck was a rarity, and religious books were still less often seen. The Rainbow formed no exception to the rule, and Ellis got to be looked at with suspicion and dislike by the greater numbers of the men. He was equally disliked by some of the officers. The reason was clear—his life and example was a reproach to them.

We had not been long in that treacherous clime before "Yellow Jack," as sailors call the yellow fever, came on board. Numbers of our crew were speedily down with it. Several died, and the pestilence increased. The ship's company, as sometimes occurs, took a panic, and men who would boldly have faced a visible enemy, trembled with dread at the thoughts of being struck down by the fever. It was difficult to get men to attend properly on the sick. Ellis was an exception; he immediately volunteered for that duty, and was indefatigable in its performance. He did more, I found; he spoke words of counsel and encouragement to the sick and dying; he pointed out to them the Saviour, on whom looking with repentance and faith in his all-sufficient work, they might be assured of forgiveness.

Harry Lethbridge, a young midshipman, was among the first attacked. Ellis carefully watched over the boy. Whenever he had performed his other duties, he returned to the side of the hammock in which Harry lay, bathed his face, sponged out his mouth, and gave him cooling drinks, like the most of gentle of nurses. More than once the doctor told me, however, that he was afraid the young midshipman would slip through his fingers, and he afterwards said that he considered it was mostly owing to the very great attention paid to him by Ellis that he had escaped. Ellis did more; he spoke to Harry, when his strength was returning, in a way to touch his heart,—he told him how he had been saved from the jaws of death by a God who loved his soul, and he showed how alone that soul could be saved, and how freely and fully it would be saved, if he would but accept the redemption offered him.

Notwithstanding the way Ellis had behaved during the fever, John Jones, and men of his stamp, of whom there were many, continued to sneer at him on account of his religion. "Any old woman, or young girl, could have done as well as he did,—nursing a few sick men and boys: what was that?" they said. "It didn't make him a bit more of a man."

From the West Indies we were sent to North America, to do away with the effects of the fever. Knowing what a quiet man Ellis was, I was somewhat surprised when one day, on the passage to Halifax, John Jones came up to me on deck, fuming with rage, and preferred a formal charge against him, for having assaulted and thrashed him. I, of course, as in duty bound, sent for Ellis, and witnesses on both sides, to examine into the case. Ellis appeared, hat in hand, and at once acknowledged that he had thrashed Jones, but offered as an excuse that Jones and other men had systematically annoyed him whenever he sat down to read the Bible, and that at last Jones, encouraged by his previous forbearance, had snatched up the book and made off with it, threatening to throw it overboard. "I could bear it no longer, sir," said Ellis; "so I knocked him over, that I might get back my Bible, and read it afterwards in peace. Besides, sir, he said that people who read the Bible are never worth anything, only just fit to nurse sick people, and that come a gale of wind, or any danger, they would always be found skulking below."

"In that respect you, Jones, are wrong, and you had no business to snatch away Ellis's Bible; but you, Ellis, broke through the rules of discipline by knocking Jones over. You must reserve your blows for the enemies of your country. I must therefore punish you. It is your first offence, but it is too serious a one to be overlooked. Go below."

I inflicted as light a punishment as I well could on Ellis. After he had undergone it, he came to me and expressed his regret at having lost his temper, without in any way attempting to exculpate himself.

We reached Halifax, remained there a fortnight refitting, and again sailed to cruise off the coast. Nova Scotia possesses a rocky, forbidding shore, near which a seaman would dislike to be caught with a gale blowing on it. One night, on a passage round to Prince Edward's Island, we had kept closer in shore, in consequence of the fineness of the weather, than would, under other circumstances, have been prudent. The captain was ill below. Suddenly the wind shifted, and blew directly on shore. I was called up, and hurrying on deck, saw at once that we were to have a rough night of it.

The first thing to be done was to get a good offing. Accordingly I hauled to the wind, and as it was not yet blowing very hard, I kept the canvas on her which had previously been set. Suddenly a squall, its approach unseen, struck the ship, and before a sheet could be started the main-top-gallant yard was carried away, and the spar, wildly beating about in the now furiously blowing gale, threatened to carry away, not only the top-gallant mast, but the topmast itself. The loss of more of our spars at such a moment might have been disastrous in the extreme. To clear away the spar was, therefore, of the greatest importance, but it was an operation which would expose those who attempted it to the most imminent dangers.

I sung out for volunteers. At that moment, seeing Jones standing near me, I could not help saying, "Come, my man, there's work for you; you were boasting of your manhood the other day!" The first to spring forward to my call was William Ellis.

"No," I answered; "I have made the offer to Jones. He ought to succeed if any man can."

Jones looked aloft, then shook his head.

"I dare not; the man who attempts it will be sure to lose his life."

Ellis, as if anticipating the reply Jones would make, had been securing an axe to his belt; having felt the edge to assure himself that it was sharp. Scarcely had Jones finished speaking, than, exclaiming, "I'll go!" he was ascending the main rigging.

I watched him with intense anxiety as long as I could see him, but he was soon lost to sight in the gloom of night up aloft there amid the tightening ropes, the straining mast, and the loosened sail and shattered spar, which kept driving backwards and forwards and round and round with terrific violence. I kept my eyes fixed on the spot where I knew he must be. Now I thought I saw him clinging on to the rigging with one hand, while with the other, his axe gleaming above his head, he made stroke after stroke at the ropes by which the top-gallant yard still hung to the mast. Had he been hurled from the rigging, the ocean would have been his tomb, for, heeling over as the ship was, he would have fallen far to leeward. I fully expected such would be his fate; it might be mine too, for I was determined to make the attempt if others failed. I thought of the young woman who had visited him on board, and of her sorrowing heart. My eye caught sight of something falling. Was it Ellis? No! A shout rose from the crew. Down came the shattered spar and the torn sail clear of everything, and fell into the foaming, hissing waters, through which the frigate was forcing her way. The top-gallant mast stood uninjured. Ellis the next minute was beside me on the deck.

"Thank you, Ellis; you did that work nobly," I said to him. "I think that no one in future will venture to taunt you for your Bible-reading propensities."

I was now able to send the hands aloft to shorten sail, and I fully believe that our masts, and the ship herself, and our lives, were saved by that act of courage. I afterwards asked Ellis how he felt when aloft.

"That I was in the hands of God, sir," he answered. "I prayed for his protection, and I never felt my heart more light, or my courage more firm."*

As may be supposed, no one after this ventured to call Ellis a milksop, or to speak disparagingly of him in any other way. Jones sunk in public estimation as Ellis rose, and gained great influence among the ship's company, which he did not fail to use to their benefit. He still further increased it by another act, which, however, was not so much a proof of courage as of presence of mind, only the sailors declared, with a tinge of superstition, that no other man on board could have done it. I will mention it presently.

I frequently spoke to Ellis in a way an officer cannot venture to do, except to a well-tried man. One day I asked him if he did not wish to write to his wife, as I had the opportunity of sending letters.

"I am not married, sir," he answered, calmly.

* This account was given to the author by the late Admiral Saumarez, and the words are to the best of his recollection those used by the man who performed the act recorded.

"That young woman you saw, sir, Mary Summers, has promised to marry me when I get back, if I can prove to her that I have acted all the time I have been away like a Christian man. It's a long story too, and I won't trouble you with it now; only Mary has very strong notions, and very right notions too. I wasn't once what I now try to be. I was altogether careless about religion. I fell in love with Mary, and tried my best to appear good, and so far succeeded that I won her love. When, however, she found out what I really was she said that nothing would induce her to marry me unless I was a Christian. She gave me books and I read them, and I read the Bible as I had never read it before, and she talked to me till I thought that I was what she wanted me to be; but she said that people couldn't tell what they really were till they were out in the busy world and tried, and that I must be tried before she could venture to marry me. At first I thought her terms very hard; but I do assure you, sir, when I came to know more of the Gospel I felt that they were wise and just. It's a very different thing to appear all right and correct, and to feel very good too, in a quiet village, with a religious, sensible young woman to watch over one, than to keep straight aboard a man-of-war among a number of godless associates. In one case a man may almost forget the necessity of earnest prayer. I do assure you, sir, I have felt aboard here that I could not get on an hour without it."

Reader, remember these words of Ellis. Consider how you will act when you are tried and tempted. Satan often lets people alone when he finds them in an easy position, that they may grow conceited of their own strength. Never cease praying that you may see his wiles, and that, through the Holy Spirit, you may be enabled to resist them, but never, never trust to your own strength, or you will be sure to fall.

Some two years after this, when Harry Lethbridge had grown into a fine young man, promising to be as smart an officer as any in the navy, we were on our passage between the northern and southern portions of our station, when we were caught in as heavy a gale as I ever experienced—a complete hurricane. It came down on us so suddenly that it required all hands to shorten sail as smartly as they could do. Among those who sprang aloft when the hands were turned up was Harry Lethbridge, whose station was the foretop. The post of honour among seamen in reefing sails is the weather earing.* Thus when the fore-top-sail was to be reefed, Harry eagerly sought, and was the first man out on, the yard-arm. While reefing the sail, on hauling out the earing, from the strength of the wind, and from his anxiety to get it done quickly, he did not haul the first turn sufficiently taut. After taking the second, and getting a good pull on it, the first earing rendered suddenly, and, losing his balance, he fell over the yard. Those who saw him as I did thought he was gone, but no; as he fell he had kept hold of the earing, and there he hung, suspended by it about nine feet below the yard-arm and full sixty from the deck, though, of course, far outside it, that is to say, over the boiling ocean.

Those on deck looked up, almost paralysed with the terrible spectacle. His destruction seemed inevitable. His hands were giving way. He caught the rope in his teeth, and thus he hung suspended, alive and strong, with the joyous spirits and anticipations of youthful manhood, and yet with death as it were gaping for him. The man nearest to him on the yard threw towards him the end of a rope, but it was blown away to leeward out of his reach. The captain instantly directed that a running bow-line knot should be made round the earing, and thus lowered over his head; but his voice was drowned by the gale. Cries of horror escaped from the lips of all who saw him. "A man overboard! a man overboard!" was shouted out, for every one expected to see him fall into the sea. William Ellis had never taken his eye off him. I saw him hurry forward. Poor Harry could hold on no longer. His hands relaxed their gripe of the rope, his teeth gave way, he fell. As he did so, the ship lurched heavily to leeward and he came towards the fore-castle. Ellis sprang forward, and as Harry's feet touched the deck, caught him in his arms. The midshipman's life was preserved, and the only injury he received was the fracture of one of his ankle-bones.* "He's the only man who could have done it, though," I afterwards heard some of the seamen remark. "He prayed that he might do it, and he did it, do ye see." Even the irreligious often acknowledge the efficacy of the prayers of Christian men.

William Ellis persevered in his Christian course till the ship was paid off, when I saw his Mary, who had come to Portsmouth to welcome him. They married; he obtained a warrant as a gunner, and some years afterwards, through the influence of Harry Lethbridge, got a good appointment on shore. The young midshipman, feeling that his life had, through God's mercy, been preserved that he might do him service, became a thorough Christian, in practice as well as in name, and a first-rate officer; while Ellis continued as he had begun, aided and encouraged, I have no doubt, by his excellent wife, to the end of his life.

* An earing is a rope to haul up the outer part of a sail.

* The whole of this account is fact, without the slightest alteration.

WELLINGTON'S DUTY AND NAPOLEON'S GLORY: A CONTRAST.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

SOME years ago I spent a night at the house of a distinguished Staffordshire baronet, and in the bedroom which I occupied I observed a picture representing the interior of a boudoir, furnished in the costly style of patrician splendour. On a marble side-table stood the bust of a young military officer, and near it, contemplating his features with obvious pride and affection, sat a venerable lady, with a letter lying open on her lap. The resemblance between the white-haired lady and the bust indicated family relationship, perhaps mother and son. That lady was the Countess of Mornington, and the letter, containing a filial announcement of the young writer's recent victories in the East, was signed in a clear, distinct hand, unlike some gross illegible autographs, "Your most affectionate and dutiful son, Arthur Wellesley."

Duty, in all its relative obligations of life, was Wellington's earliest characteristic and his last. It began, where it should begin, with the loving obedience of the boy to his mother; it continued and endured in a dutiful loyalty to his sovereign, his country, and his God. His lot was cast in troublous times; but they were the furnace which smelted the gold from its native quartz, fusing it into the precious metal, which came out the glorious statue of a Wellington. His difficulties and dangers, obstacles abroad and antagonisms at home, campaigns and treaties, bloody fights and desperate manœuvres, like the captured cannon of the enemy, out of which his country moulded the iron Achilles in Hyde Park, only furnished materials for his fame, and occasions for the test of the inexhaustible resources of his genius.

With none of the lusts of hero-craft, he won far higher honours by the simplicity of his virtues, than his great rival Napoleon achieved by the criminal intensity of his ambition.

Wellington had his intervals of less cogent solicitude, and less active occupation, but he was a man never off duty. Duty was the phrase of most frequent occurrence in his despatches, as glory was the boast that ever glittered like a meteor, and expired, in Napoleon's.

"Not once or twice in our rough island story
The path of duty was the way to glory."

When death, for the first time and the last, drew the great commander from his post, the foremost men in both Houses of Parliament vied with each other in demonstrations of public reverence and appreciation of the country's loss. In the House of Peers, so long dignified by his patriarchal presence, and so long enlightened by the wisdom of his counsels that his absence revealed a vacuum realised like a sense of bereavement, the then Premier of England, with broken words and moistened eye, pronounced a brilliant eulogium, alike worthy of the orator and of his subject. Its reception by that illustrious assembly implied the descent of no ordinary portion of Wellington's spirit on the body, which he had so long animated. In the other House of elected representatives, where the popular voice finds its more natural echo, its leader spoke of him as "not only a great man, but the greatest man of a great nation—a general who had fought fifteen pitched battles, captured 3,000 cannon from the enemy, and never lost a single gun." What was the secret magnetism in his character which drew men of all parties on his side? It was the incorruptible integrity, which the offer of a crown could not bribe,—the stern sense of duty, which bristling battalions could not swerve, and a patriotism which grew tenderer as old age cooled its energy, but could not chill its loyalty.

"Who never sold the truth to serve the hour,
Nor paltered with eternal God for power.
His eighty winters froze with one rebuke
All great self-seekers trampling on the right.
Truth-teller was our England's Alfred named,
Truth-lover was our English Duke."

"The path of duty is the way to glory," was the maxim of the life of Wellington. "The paths of glory lead but to the grave," is the moral of the fate of Napoleon.

It is not unprofitable for more decided Christians to mark, in such a life, the overruling hand of Divine grace, even in the character of an individual, by whom God himself was not so directly recognised. Not that we would disparage the high moral tone of Wellington. He was a fine specimen of what nature, education, prestige of rank, and sense of functional responsibility can effect, apart from the more immediate interventions of Divine grace. The case resembles that man's in the gospels of whom the heart-searching Saviour said, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God;" or another man's, whose natural amenities and virtues the Redeemer "looked upon and loved," though, after having heard him tell the heads of his honest discharge of every duty he knew, or understood, he tenderly taught him, "One thing lackest thou yet." Nevertheless, the moral comeliness of such a character is lovable and exemplary, as far as it goes. And when its integrity of purpose, and extent of usefulness and beneficence in its day and generation, as in the case of Wellington, appeals to the grateful recognition of society, society is bound to honour them, if on no other higher motive, to multiply the repetitions of its benefactors. His loss would have been irreparable, were there no public spirits left like his.

"Our greatest yet hath least pretence,
Great in council, great in war;
Foremost captain of his time,
Rich in saving common sense;
And as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime!
O good grey head, which all men knew,
O iron nerve, to true occasion true,
O fallen at length, that tower of strength,
Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew."

England did her best to honour her hero's remains with a pomp of funeral obsequies and solemn pageantry worthy of his great self and of the great nation which he had served so well. He will be remembered as one who, unlike some famous conquerors, whose heroism was tarnished by their personal vices, or sunken under the greater notoriety of their crimes, or shrivelled into insignificance by the decay of faculty and the imbecilities of age. Wellington carried, with no unsteady hand, his brimming cup of honour to the end of his march, nor spilled a precious drop, till his country poured it as a libation on his grave.

There was something significant in the selection of the place where all of Wellington that could die lay in state. It was in the hall of Chelsea College—close to, and under the same roof, as the old soldier's house of prayer. That interesting sanctuary, visited by tens of thousands, and hung with the flags taken from the enemy, the tattered trophies of old and recent battles, spoke of an historical and religious people, who, as they looked back upon the splendid records of the past, looked up to the God of battles for the future, and in earnest of their repose in him, cast their spoils of victory at his feet. The silent and stately forms of the Grenadiers, who, motionless as statues, lined the draperied walls, seemed to indicate that neither the warlike nor religious spirit of the army lay dead upon the bier of their great commander.

His august achievements were exhibited with eight field-marshal's bâtons of Great Britain, Hanover, Austria, the Netherlands, Portugal, Russia, Prussia, and Spain; and his twenty-seven orders of knighthood and decorations of honour. When we turned from the insignia to their late proprietor, and beneath the gorgeous trappings of gilded coffin and catafalque, could we have seen the little shrivelled frame of dust, sleeping its last sleep there, wholly unconscious of them all, no scene could present a more affecting comment on Jeremiah's warning: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me."

Amid all the common infirmities of human nature, all the defective convictions incident to rank, wealth, personal influence, and unparalleled success, Wellington was an example to soldiers of habitual reverence for the authority, and of dutiful reliance on the providence of God. Hence it is no marvel that Chelsea Chapel suspends, among the great duke's trophies, the flags of that (at that time) irreligious, God-dishonouring nation, whose hosts he conquered. The flaunting banner, emblazoned with the inscription, which time has effaced from its tawdry colours, as it has eradicated the fact from the French political constitution—"République Française:—la Liberté ou la Mort"—still waves its few surviving rags in memorial of the discomfiture of a people who legislated at home and made war abroad, impiously ignoring alike the laws of God and the rights of man.

This is the great moral lesson of the contrast between the final issue of the career of Wellington and of Napoleon. Both had their defects of character, but the former had a faith and a religion; the latter had neither, except one of which he was himself the shrine and centre, and his exile and death on the solitary rock of St. Helena, find their solution in the epitaph of the profane king who was smitten of worms at Cæsarea, "because he gave not God the glory." When the eye of an old Chelsea pensioner lights on these torn and decaying relics of the bloody campaigns between France and England, let them remind him that the greatest general, or the bravest soldier, can only triumph in the end by "the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left." There is no bolt nor bullet which can penetrate the shield of faith, no subtle improvement in the fatal weapons of warfare which can ever dispense with "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." As David said of Goliath's, "There is no sword like that."

Have you piety? "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

Have you backslidden, and lost it? "Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works."

Have you never found, perhaps never sought, your "peace with God through Jesus Christ?" Seek it now. Delay is danger, and may be damnation. "Seek the Lord while he may be found, call upon him while he is near." Do not wait for another morrow, for "morrow's light fools the way to dusty death."

The leading thought suggested by the memoir of Wellington is the grandeur of duty. Duty to the station in life which you are called upon to fill, and which, however humble, is ennobled by a diligent, upright discharge of all its claims. Duty to your generation, which should not suffer damage, but, on the contrary, be benefited by your example. Duty to your own soul, which is the first and last call on every man, who is bound to live and act upon the solemn conviction—

"A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky."

Above all, duty to the Lord, whose love enlists you in his service, whose bounty you have taken, and in whose holy baptism you engaged "manfully to fight under his banner against sin, the world, and the devil; and to continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants to your life's end."

Have you been true to your colours; loyal to the rose and lily?—the blood and righteousness of the only Saviour, "the Captain of our salvation, who was made perfect through sufferings?"

Confidence in the commander is the secret rallying-point of military ardour and endurance. Can you, and do you, trust in his leadership who appeared to Joshua with a drawn sword in his hand, proclaiming, "As Captain of the Lord's host am I come?" Is it your boast, not what you could do without him, but that "with the help of my God I can leap over a wall?" You want a leader. Sheep without a shepherd are not more helpless than men without a guide. You must follow Jesus, or go astray; and a stray sheep is a lost sheep until it be found and brought back to the fold. Are you folded, or are you still astray? You know which it is, and God knows, and Satan knows. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." And why? because there is no conceivable point of duty which is not involved in fearing God and keeping his commandments.

A CLERGYMAN'S HOLIDAY.

DID you ever wonder, reader, how a chimney-sweep feels when he plunges into a cold bath, and parts gradually from "those innocent blacknesses" which poor Charles Lamb respected so unaccountably? I believe I have found it out. Let loose the town clergyman, upon whose very soul the city smoke has been gradually incrusting itself; who has begun to be sceptical about mountains, somewhat incredulous of trees and skylarks and wild-flowers, and quite to despair of any more fresh breezes or song of rivulets; who has honestly forgotten what waves are like, and what they talk of, and has not seen the stars (except as people look at eclipses, through a sheet of smoke) for twelve months or more—let him loose among the hills and the unsophisticated country folk, and you have plunged him into his moral cold bath, and the soot will gradually begin to vanish from him too.

I wonder whether all professional men feel as he does when vacation first begins. Does the lawyer go about thinking of briefs and cases, and forging imaginary appeals to an unreal judge and jury? Does the soldier unconsciously shape his utterances to such words as "Right about wheel," or "Left shoulder forward!" Does the doctor—bah! one shudders at the thought—does the doctor go on prescribing imaginary drugs to diseases that only prey upon his own mind? This I am sure of, that it takes some clergymen at least a week's repose to get rid of the sad habit of making up sermons here, there, and everywhere—to look at things frankly as they are, and not subjectively, with an eye to metaphors and illustrations—to lie down in the grass and listen passively to that enchanting sound which gathers all sounds into itself, without some lurking suspicion that they are truants and idlers, that a sick woman or a class has the prior claim upon the half-hour—or is it an hour?—that glides so deliciously away. "Sweet is pleasure after toil," and what toil is like theirs? The lawyer and doctor climb into hard practice only by degrees, and the soldier spends peaceful years before firing one shot in wrath, but the clergyman goes fresh from college into the main pressure and excitement of his life's work. The man of business locks up his office or his shop, and is "his own man," as Walter Scott used to say, until ten o'clock in the morning. But the minister has not one minute in the day to call his own, apart from study, from thought, from visitation. So it comes to pass, dearly though he likes the work, that a jaded feeling creeps upon him by degrees; he begins to lie awake at night; to get up with a queer smart in the eyes; to be intelligent and cheerful by a deliberate effort, if indeed he be so at all. Then he knows that it is time to stop. Then woe to the congregation that keeps him in harness much longer, for he takes a heavy, but reluctant revenge in dull visits and duller sermons. They go about wondering what has come over Mr. So-and-so, and remarking how sadly Mr. Such-and-such has fallen away! But the fact is, the poor men want rest, and must have rest before they can improve again. The more they struggle without this, the worse for their people and the worse for themselves.

So hurrah for this lodge in a wilderness! Hurrah for real milk, and fresh eggs, and grass waving in the fields instead of dried and trussed and on sale for the refreshment of other donkeys than him who now lies full length on the green sward, and determines out of pure mirth and jollity to send his meditations to Mr. Editor.

Were you ever told how lovely the county Dublin is? Its one great disadvantage is the proximity of the county Wicklow, with Avoca and Glendalough, and other places famous in poetry, and exquisitely deserving of their fame. Wicklow beats Derbyshire hollow, so no wonder that it beats Dublin. And since the best things in that lovely country (whose charms every Englishman I ever knew confessed with generous frankness), lie within a day's ride of the capital, who can complain if tourists and sketchers rush off thitherward, and forget to ask what kind of scenery lies under the hills they skirt, and at the fountain-heads of the streams they cross? Besides, Wicklow scenery can be thoroughly investigated without any real climbing, most of it from a jaunting-car, but the county Dublin hides its gems in places where an ordinary lady (a commonplace lady) won't go with you. And Mr. Moore himself admits that Avoca* won his heart because "friends, the beloved of his bosom, were there, who made every dear scene of enchantment more dear."

Still—ah! still—my pedestrian habits and love of the hills make the county Dublin very dear to me. And I want to know, where could you match the prospect that spreads out before me now?

One vast plain stretches westward from the Bay of Dublin to that of Galway, unbroken by a decent hill, traversed by only a few respectable rivers, and diversified by all sorts of culture, from the richest park, pasture, and plantation, to the most hopeless and desolate bogs in which ever snipe or wild-duck grew so miserable as to bless the gun that shot them. The eastern end of it is beautifully treated. Noble trees, deep pastures, residences that remind Irishmen of the olden state of Dublin, are to be seen on all hands. And just into the south-eastern corner of this plain, so "fat and well watered," just as the hills begin to ruffle its smooth bosom, the Bay of Dublin softly insinuates itself, the Liffey widening to meet it; and the only hills to be seen northward are on the sea-line. Lambay Island is one of them, and lies away there, a gem of gold in the hazy evening sea, as content and happy as if it had never felt the crash of the Tayleur's iron ribs, when that noble vessel and her gallant crew were cast away. Inside Lambay, and much nearer, is Ireland's Eye (or Island), a hill which swells gradually from the land side, but has been so eaten down by a million of tempests as to plunge from its highest altitude sheer into the deep seas. Sail around it, good reader, if you ever have the chance, although the guide books say nothing about the grandeur of its outer side. But steer into its noble cave, shudder as its huge cliffs threaten to crush you into powder, laugh as its hosts of sea-birds creak, and grate, and scream about your very prow, tremble and pray while you watch the inlet into which a Dublin physician descended some years ago to murder his wife as she bathed, and while you tremble, admire the justice of God: for the ebbing tide strove, as the wretch had calculated, to sweep away the corpse, but a small spine of rock caught her bathing-dress, and held it fast to show her wounds, while so calm and placid was the day, that her screams, of which he professed to be ignorant, were heard upon Howth Hill, a mile and a half away. And even now you cannot make the voyage without one or other of your boatmen professing to be the man who rowed the unhappy pair across!

And now look at Howth Hill. Long, low-lying, precipitous; if there be mists anywhere, they encompass it; if waves can be had anywhere, they are lashing it; if any lighthouse do good service, it is this noble Bailey Light, which watches the very spot where (when a snowstorm had muffled its lantern) the Victoria and Albert went down with crowded decks, within sight of home, within speech of land. This glorious promontory is the northern boundary of Dublin Bay, and your eye is caught by the sapphire sheet of its waveless brine, beguiled along under a line of waving woods, dark and solemn when evening falls, but rich and beautiful ever, until it catches a hideous blot upon the landscape. No mistaking the smoke which hangs over a quarter of million dwellers in crowded streets. It hides all but a few score of chimneys, pillars, spires, and cathedral churches; it visibly darkens about five o'clock, when dinners are being cooked, but there it hangs always.

A friend of mine, seeing this for the first time, murmured, in the rich low tones that are now heard only in God's Holy Land, "The smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever." But how near it is! We are upon a real mountain—Kilmashogue is the name of it—and you actually fancy that you could see a crow upon St. Patrick's Cathedral, and even shoot him. This is where we beat every British city I know of, except Edinburgh, which beats us. Nothing tells of our distance but the blessed silence and the still more blessed sounds: for I hear the swaying grass, the sighing breeze, the rivulet slipping through green places, the whistle of the blackbird, the carol of the lark; but I hear no curses, and no rush of vehicles, and forget the very existence of heated air and big town congregations—critical, apathetic, apter to praise or censure than to worship God.

Look now along the southern coast, and away to Killiney Hill. The shore is lined with villas and towns; but you see them not, for a swell in the ground interposes its rich planting and its deep meadow land, and makes all natural. And around us are the hills, swelling one after another—Tibradden, Killakee, Montpelier—one soft and verdurous, one wild and bleak, one tossing larch-plumes aloft into the fresh air, and all known and loved by me. But look! but look! down goes the sun into a bed of purple cloud; a change is over everything; the great grazing-plains of Kildare have caught your eye, and the straight lines of trees that tell where two rivers weave silver threads into the emerald sheen. How fast the scene changes; the sky from blue to purple, to orange, to indigo, to the pallor which may well succeed such rapid paroxysms and swift conflict of emotion; the moon from dim tissue paper to pearl, to silver, to pale gold, to a rich and luminous haze; the plains—I give it up! ladies may tell you, who know the meaning of magenta, mauve, and solferino, and whom we hope to have studied and baptised Nature almost as elaborately as they consider their own bonnet-strings; but I know not the titles of those palpitating, pulsating vicissitudes of hue which tell that already mother Earth misses her lord and master, and, although he whispered, "Good night" only, asks herself—with the wise doubt man has not learned to feel—"Is it 'Good night,' or is it 'Farewell for ever?'"

The shrill breeze whistles, the grass rustles colder, a vapour-like steam rises from the meadows, and I turn to my temporary home.

Many still voices are whispering in the half-silence through my very soul of souls. One says, "The heavens declare the glory of God;" another says, "Let all the trees of the wood clap their hands;" a third adds, as the blackbird whistles his farewell, "These all wait upon the Lord, and he giveth them their meat in due season;" another murmurs, "God saw all his works that he had made, and, behold, they were very good;" another says, "Bless the Lord, all his works, in all places of his dominion." And then first I make answer, and find no words but these: "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" G. A. C.

THE SWORD AND THE WORD.

THE emblems true of peace and war
Before them lay, without a sound,
They stood in silence, hearing far
Faint tokens from the battle-ground.

Their faces blanched with sudden fear,
As that deep thunder rose and fell,
For those contending hosts were dear
To each for twain in knightly sell,

Who led their ranks, whose fatal thought
Was death to each, whate'er might chance,
Whose restless eyes pursued and caught
The flying point of lance with lance.

"Oh, when," one sister cried, "shall men Stay their red hands from yonder sword?"
The other made her answer, "When They know the peace of yonder Word."

CHAPTER XVII.

A SCOTCH COMMUNION.

ELL, have you said good-bye?" asked Dr. Grant, addressing Archie, as his sons entered the sitting-room, Mrs. Grant looking on severely.

"No," answered he, making a desperate effort; "it's time enough on Sunday."

The doctor was rather more perplexed than before; the doctor's wife rather more severe. "I thought they were going over to Burnside with you to-morrow," she said, addressing her husband.

"Oh, ay, I forgot. I should like you to go," he said, turning to the pair, "but not if you prefer staying at home with your mother. I am going to assist Mr. Keith."

Mrs. Grant thought they ought to go, but was surprised at the readiness with which they accepted the proposal, and, inconsistently enough, rather vexed thereby, though she wished them out of the way on that particular Sunday, when she had made up her mind to take Peggy to task, after a motherly fashion, for suffering idle young men like her sons to dangle after her.

But in this she was doomed to disappointment, for on Sunday, when she occupied her pew in solitary state, Peggy did not put in her appearance at Strathie kirk.

The pulpit there had been filled for several Sundays past by "probationers"—young men licensed to preach, but not yet ordained to any charge; and the flock, not expecting much from such inexperienced guides, took the liberty of wandering, in the absence of their proper pastor.

Mr. Keith's praises were in the mouths of the more serious portion of the congregation, and Jean expressed a desire to hear him. As for Peggy, ever since Captain Oglivie had spoken of him in terms of admiration, she had longed to listen to his gloomy eloquence; but she had felt that it would be impossible to gratify her wish so long as there was a chance of meeting her cousin there in the company of her long-estranged and unrelenting relatives. Now, she was eager in seconding Jean's desire.

It was the half-yearly communion at Burnside. In the country kirks of Scotland this is held at different seasons, in order to allow the necessary assistance of neighbouring ministers to be obtained. It also affords an opportunity for those who desire to "communicate" more frequently, to do so.

The kirk of Burnside had originally stood solitary, in the midst of its kirkyard, by the side of a bright little "burn," or stream, that ran into the Strathie. The old village had been but a row of thatched cottages; but, with the rise of a new industry, a new Burnside had grown up, and stretched out till it lay half in the adjoining parish of Strathie, forming a kind of debatable land between the two ministers.

The print-works stood a little beyond the village, at the bottom of the strath, and drew its workers from both places, and from the scattered houses of the poor for miles on every side. Burnside was, however, their head-quarters, where, at the sound of the early bell, men, women, and children hurried out into the chill, wet darkness, or the rosy, pearly dawn, for a couple of hours' work before breakfast, to which they would return with rare appetite and relish for the smoking porridge, which awaited them on every thrifty board. Many a poor pair, to whom it was a heartbreak to send their lassie out from the door of their moorland cot in the storm and the darkness for a three miles' walk to the works, with her little can of milk and her little bag of meal for the whole day's fare, coveted one of the snug "tiled hooses" of Burnside.

The pastoral care of the souls of the dwellers in that favoured place was divided, as has been said, between the two ministers, but the bulk of the workpeople preferred the ministrations of Mr. Keith. Perhaps his gloomy doctrine appealed more strongly to the stern experiences of the lives of the poor.

The smallness of Mr. Keith's kirk saved it from extreme ugliness. It was a mere barn in shape, and utterly destitute of ornament, except what Nature had achieved by means of moss and ivy without; and within, its unpretending poverty made, perhaps, a loftier appeal to the imagination than earthly grandeur could have done.

On the present occasion, and on all such occasions, the central area of the little church underwent a change. Several rows of benches in front of the pulpit were turned into tables, with seats on each side, and covered with clean linen, white and pure as snow. Close under the pulpit was similarly arrayed a smaller table, for the elders of the congregation and the officiating ministers. The rest of the area was set apart for "members," while the "sitters," including all the younger portion of the congregation, were banished for the day to the little wooden gallery. Early communion, as a rule, is not encouraged in the kirk of Scotland.

Jean was an old woman, but she had never "come to the table," so it was to this little gallery that she and her young mistress repaired, and it was there that Archie and Sandie Grant likewise seated themselves.

Mr. Keith chose for his text a passage from the Song of Solomon. Addressing himself to believers only, he led them, in a sort of ecstatic rhapsody, to meditate on the entrancing mysteries of divine communion.

At length the sermon (and also the forenoon) was over, yet no one stirred. There had been some little restlessness among the youngsters in the gallery, and some of the very little ones had been removed; but now all was still.

The day was grey, with broken gleams of sunshine, and the face of the minister darkened and lightened upon the breathless people. He had come down from the pulpit, and was what is called "fencing the table"—that is, defending it from the approach of those who are living in unbelief and sin.

One woman rose and hurried trembling away; and such was the power of the preacher that those in his immediate presence could not have told who was the owner of that stricken conscience.

Meanwhile the elders—grave, white-haired men for the most part—had been noiselessly collecting the "tokens"—small metal tickets distributed to the intending communicants during the previous week, as tokens of their title to be partakers of the sacraments, and which may be withheld at the discretion of the minister or elder of whom they are sought.

At the close of the address takes place what, in England, would be called the consecration, but which is only a rehearsal of the institution of the sacrament, which the officiating minister does not receive himself, but hands to the elders and assisting clergymen, one of whom will serve him in his turn. The bread and cup are then carried by the elders to the people seated at the tables, and the bread is broken and the cup is passed from hand to hand. While this proceeded the silence was intense. The youngest child in the little kirk seemed to hold its breath.

When all were served who sat at the tables, they were dismissed with a fervent exhortation to a life worthy of their profession, and with a solemn warning of the tenfold condemnation incurred by the unworthy. Mr. Keith then gave out the 103rd Psalm.

It was between four and five in the afternoon before the congregation was duly dismissed, though some had gone away at the close of each table service. Those who had remained throughout the day were faint when thus released, not so much with fasting as with the sustained emotion.

Among these, though but a spectator of the solemnity, was Peggy Oglivie. The colour had fled from her face, and she looked, as Jean said, "dazed"—that is, like one who has looked on the sun, or some intolerable brightness, till dazzled almost to blindness.

Various little groups were gathered in the churchyard to exchange greetings in a subdued manner, and Jean, who had also remained all day, was engaged in this way, when the two Grants came up to Peggy. They had, it is true, availed themselves of an interval to stretch their long limbs in the kirk-yard, but they, too, had been attentive and reverent on-lookers, and their mood was grave and earnest.

"We're off to-morrow, Peggy," said Archie; "won't you say good-bye?"

She had not quite comprehended, as she knew nothing of the arrangement which had been made for them, and had failed to hold out her hand a second time for the youth's farewell grasp.

"We winna see you again till next simmer," said Sandie, speaking Scotch, as every Scottish person is apt to do when feeling is uppermost, and he explained the plan chalked out for them.

Peggy gave a hand to each in turn. "And you're going to work hard and make up for loss of time?" she said, appealingly.

"I promise you that," said Archie, eagerly; whereupon they shook hands again.

"No rash promises, Archie," said his father, coming up behind the group, and laying his hand on his son's shoulder, and then holding it out affectionately to Peggy.

"I was only promising to stick to work," replied Archie; "and I mean to do it."

Mr. Keith, a younger man, stood beside and smiled, and the former invited the little group to come into the manse and partake of some refreshment.

Upon this the doctor gave Peggy a formal introduction to both.

"You must be exhausted," said Mr. Keith, holding her hand, "for you have not stirred since morning, and rest and refreshment are needful for the body."

The grave tenderness of the voice touched her, drew her to the man, and she would gladly have accepted the offer, but there stood Jean waiting, and at home her grandfather would be waiting too, so she declined, with a grateful look, and said truly that she was not weary; she was in that condition in which bodily want and weariness is, for the time, unfelt.

So there was another round of handshaking, in which Archie and Sandie came in for a share. They were in grave company, and did not speak again, but the three companions looked wistfully at one another, parting with one another and with their happy youth—for somehow, standing there, the knowledge came to them that they were so parting.

"Good-bye again," Peggy murmured, her eyes filling with tears. "You won't forget your promise?" and she left the group looking after her, Mr. Keith presently asking who she was.

"A great favourite of mine," answered the doctor; "a pet and plaything, who has, all of a sudden, grown into a woman."

"And a woman of the inspiring order," said Mr. Keith. "I mean," he explained, "one who inspires a man to the love of things beyond and above herself."

"That's just her," said Archie, impulsively. "You never think about her till you're away from her."

Mr. Keith and their father smiled as they moved away. Mr. Haldane stood beside the lads, and raised his hat and bowed when Peggy looked back towards them from the churchyard gate.

"That's young Haldane," said Jean; "I can tell by the set o' his head. Just like his uncle, and I knew him well in my young days."

CHAPTER XVIII.

A BAD LOOK OUT.

MRS. GRANT had been, as it were, cheated out of the opportunity of lecturing Peggy by the absence of the latter, and the cause of the absence had greatly aggravated her offence. Her meeting with "the boys" at Burnside was set down by the worthy matron to design, and in her heart she suspected her sons of complicity in the plot. Anything like the wilful blindness of the doctor she had never seen, and could not account for. At the merest hint on the subject he had shown an amount of irritation quite unusual in him, and also a determination to have no more of it.

"You will do them a great injury if you allow them to see that you suspect them in that way," said he. "There's nothing taints the mind like an unjust suspicion. It's rank moral poison."

It was rather hard on Mrs. Grant that her motherly anxiety, as she considered it, which had been extended even to Peggy, should be stigmatised as moral poison. The expression was new and irritating, and she felt very much injured, consequently, by it.

"If that girl," she thought, "is to become the source of such folly and injustice, the less I see of her the better."

The more Mrs. Grant thought over the matter, the more satisfied she was that it would be well to put a stop to the intimacy. So the invitations for Saturday afternoons were not renewed, and the Sunday following the minister's wife contented herself with a hurried bow to Peggy as she hastened out of the rain which opportunely covered her retreat.

The weather and the course of events were about to second Mrs. Grant's resolution, and to screen the estrangement from observation. Every one was occupied with the serious aspect of things. Down upon the grain, not yet fully ripe, came—not a storm of big blustering drops with sunshine at the heart of them, but, day after day, a chill, continuous rain.

Peggy stood within the doorway, and looked out wistfully into the rainy wood, and there came up a moan from it that made her shiver. Tammas sat in the chimney-corner groaning with rheumatism, and lamenting over the solitary field of oats, which was to have furnished the household bread, and which, if this went on, would be "clean spoilt."

"Ay, it's a bad look out," murmured Jean, from the other corner, knitting furiously; "we've had nothing like this sin' the dear years."

And Peggy, who had heard Jean's stories over and over again, stole away and left the old couple to their colloquies, to sit silent by the hour beside her silent grandfather.

The "dear years," as the opening years of the century were called, formed an era which was frequently dated from in the district.

"I mind," Jean went on, "the first year o' the century there was reapin' in the snow, and the stuff was neil fit for the beasts. Before the next year's spring the four-pound loaf was half-a-croon, and the meal just five times what it is this day."

"There was nae enough o't at ony price," echoed her companion. "What fechts there used to be in the meal market for what there was! the men fechtin' their way to the stands wi' the meal pock (bag) on their shoulters, and women, that had nae men to fend for them, wringin' their hands on the ootside o' the mob."

"If it had na been for auld Haldane and his print-work, many's the one here about wad ha' deed wi' hunger."

"I mind when he was but a pack merchant," murmured Tammas, "trampin' the country wi' bits o' ribbons and laces and such like, and gatherin' the yarn to get it spun for the auld wives, and the lasses makin' up their providin'."

"Mony are the ups and the doons o' life," moralised Jean. "He's a rich man the day; and here's Delaube has na a penny"

"I hear Haldane's sair failed noo," said Tammas.

"It behooves him to be," replied Jean; "he's auld than either you or me. That nephew o' his 'ill come into the works. I warrant he's richt like him," she added.

"An he was the han'somest man in these parts, exceptin' Delaube himself," the old man went on. "The last time I saw them close to each ither was on the ootskirts o' one o' the meal mobs. I was carryin' Delaube's luggage up frae the shore, and we were turnin' back for the mob, but stood still awhile to look on, and there was Haldane lookin' on too. The crowd was awful—tearin' and trampin' like deevils; and a white-faced bit thing, wi' a widow's mutch (cap) on her head, flung herself in among them, and was doon among their feet in a minute. Haldane, he after her, and catches her up, like a kitten, round the middle, sets her up on the pavement, and takes her meal pock oot o' her hands. He had a fecht to get to the stand, though he was bigger than the biggest there; and his black coat—he was wearin' his blacks by that time—was as white's a miller's; but they made way for him as he cam' back wi' the widow's meal. My master would hae shaken hands wi' him, but he turned on his heel, and ye wad hae thought sparks flew oot o' his een."

"Delaube had mair sins than his ain laid to his charge," said Jean, "and a' because he would stick to that wild, wicked Sir Alexander. It's changed days since then," she went on, after a pause. "It mattered little at Delaube what the price o' meal was, with a fu' girmel (meal chest or barrel) and a fu' purse; but now there's neither meal nor siller."

"Will Delaube," asked the old man, who always called his master by this name, "no be able to raise siller yet?"

"It's lang since I saw the sight o' siller in his hands, poor man!" sighed the faithful servant.

Here Tammas was heard by his spouse to mutter something of wages due.

Jean took up the word wages, and began her parable by saying, in tones of indignation, "Wages indeed! Them that gies ye your meat, my man, dinna hauld your wages frae ye." And she proceeded to point out that everything was left in their hands, and that it was entirely owing to his, Thomas's, bad management that there was not enough and to spare.

Tammas, upon this, held his peace. He knew that hard work was not in his line. He had often been reproached by his wife, and with undeniable justice, with eating the bread of idleness at their master's table; and he knew he was not good for much now. His wife had all along supplemented his shortcomings, and must do so to the end. Poor old man! he did his best now, at any rate.

"Is the corn clean spoilt?" was her next question.

"No so sair spoilt but that a good wind and a week or twa's sun would save enough for us to live on."

"But, if there's no enough to sell, how am I to hold the house in everything?" she asked, impatiently.

"There's the wood," grumbled the old man.

"It maun come to that, I suppose, if the worst comes to the worst," she answered. "But the auld trees on the hill are no sound enough for timmer; and if they were thinned, I've seen a storm that would sweep Delaube as bare as the back o' my hand. I would ill like to see the wood cut down myself, but it would gang between that lassie and her wits, I think."

No wind came to raise the badly "laid" corn. There were days when the sunshine returned and the rain ceased, and the heavy ears tried to lift up their heads and shake off the wet in the rising breeze, but the brightness never lasted long enough. Down came the rain again, lashing the streaming fields, and beating down the corn more fiercely and persistently than ever.

At kirk and market there was gathering gloom. In the kirk prayers were "put up for propitious weather," and during the prayers the wild rains, dashing on roof and windows, would drown the voice of the minister, as if in mockery.

Peggy went little abroad in these days. Something of the heaviness of the season had fallen on her heart. She felt keenly Mrs. Grant's coldness and estrangement, and longed to clear it away. She longed to go and sit at that rigid, but yet righteous, woman's feet and tell her all her story. Her story! Sometimes she could hardly realise that it was hers. Not having the remotest suspicion of the true state of Mrs. Grant's mind in relation to her, she somehow connected that lady's conduct with Captain Oglivie. It was of him she longed to speak. But hers was one of those natures on which want of sympathy acts like want of sunlight on some sensitive flowers. In the dark, or the half-light of a dreary day, the flowers keep their portals shut. You may tear the delicate blossom open and destroy it, but you cannot by any means in your power make it expand and show its innermost heart, as it does at a touch of the genial light it was made to love.

So, instead of opening her heart to Mrs. Grant, Peggy shrank more and more into herself, and pondered on those past days, and felt her spirit grow dark, and chill, and sad. Questioning inevitably arose in her mind, at first touching only herself. Had she been right in yielding those frequent meetings? Had she not been hasty in accepting and returning the love of a stranger, though that stranger was a kinsman? Had she been deceiving herself? The thought crimsoned face and neck, as she bent over her work, with a secret shame. She was ashamed even of the thought; but it would return again and again, and with greater strength and clearness. That parting scene in the pine wood—so solemn, so sacred. Those words, which to her were binding vows—were they other to him? How the scene seemed to change under the doubt—its sweet and holy light turn to ghastliness.

But what had happened to make this change? Nothing. He had not promised to write, and she could not write to him. But, if he loved her, would he be content with silence? Had she not been content for a little time? But she was content no longer. It would be the same with him. She had only to wait, and then she would beg him to write to her grandfather, and all doubt would be at an end.

But the days and the doubt grew darker than ever.

OLD SAWS IN NEW SETTINGS, FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

BY SIDNEY DARYL.

"Where there's a will there's a way."

PART II.

THE following morning, after prayer, Dr. Lawson, instead of dismissing the various respective classes to their masters as usual, desired all to remain seated.

"I have," he said, "this morning received a letter from the trustees of the scholarship so generously founded by Mr. Beauchamp, informing me that Mr. Sutton, of St. Olave's, Oxford, who is to be the examiner, has fixed upon this day three weeks as the date on which examination shall take place. As you are aware, that will be four days before the holidays. Those, therefore, who purpose going in for it had best come up to my desk now, and put their names down."

Some little interest was, naturally enough, felt throughout the school as to those who would offer themselves as candidates for the new and valuable prize, though, as I before stated, it was commonly understood that it would be confined to the seniors. The Doctor's suggestion was at once adopted, and five out of the eight monitors, and three of the sixth form, walked up to his desk and wrote their names down. It was supposed that these would be all. What was the astonishment of the whole school to see Charlie quietly rise from his seat and follow their example.

Dr. Lawson himself was thunderstruck. At first he fancied that Charlie was up to one of his old tricks, and doing this merely out of bravado; but when he looked into the boy's eyes, so full of earnest resolve, and saw the expression of determination on his face, remembering the while his altered manner the previous evening, he felt that some incomprehensible change had come over him that would find a solution by-and-by.

As Charlie returned to his seat not a few facetious remarks were addressed to him, for all thought that Cheeky Pretor was only up to one of his larks, and that as to really going in for the examination, no serious idea of doing so had ever entered his brain. But, instead of laughing and winking his eye in acknowledgment of the chaff that met him, he turned fiercely on one of the aggressors, and whispered angrily to him—

"If you have anything to say, say it after school, and then I will show you how I treat those who interfere in my affairs."

The other candidates looked upon him as quite out of the race for the Lawson Scholarship; in fact, Cunningham and Leycester, between whom the real contest was supposed to be, never gave his pretensions a moment's thought. There was only one person who really knew what Charlie was capable of, and that was the master of his form, Mr. Seymour, who loved the boy from his heart, and had readily responded to his appeal to coach him up in play-time in certain subjects in which he was deficient. Owen Meredith says somewhere,

"Talk not of genius baffled, genius is master of man; Genius does what it must, talent does what it can."

And each day Mr. Seymour learned to appreciate the truth of the passage. Charlie seemed to pick up things by inspiration; he even astonished himself by the way in which teaching, that he had heard during past years and paid little heed to, now came back to him, as fresh and vivid as when it fell from the master's lips. Euclid was his weak point; do what he might, the various propositions would jumble themselves together in his head, producing the most hopeless confusion. In this respect Cunningham was greatly to be dreaded as an opponent, for he was famous throughout the school as a mathematician, and had hitherto distanced all his fellows.

"Never mind, Pretor," said Mr. Seymour, when they had entered on the last week preceding the examination; "what you lose in mathematics you will make up in classics, that I am quite sure of. Cunningham will have hard work to beat you there."

Through the whole three weeks that intervened between the Doctor's announcement and the day of the examination, Charlie worked with a pluck and perseverance that astonished everybody, and no one more so than Dr. Lawson. As for Mrs. Lawson, she was in ecstasies, and fully availed herself of the opportunity to crow over her husband.

"I told you so, my dear. I knew he would change some day, and be a better boy, and do great things. I shall not be at all surprised if he gets the scholarship."

"That is simply impossible," answered the Doctor, shaking his head; "in addition to the want of necessary preparation, he has not had anything like the opportunities of Cunningham, or, in fact, of any of the other competitors. However, it will do him no harm, undergoing an examination, and I am only too agreeably surprised to find that he can work so steadily."

It was the evening before the examination; and Mr. Sutton had arrived, and was dining with the Doctor. Charlie was in his room, once more sitting by the open window, this time with a book in his hand, which he was evidently studying closely. Presently he shut it with a sigh of relief, and, jumping up, said to himself—

"Thank goodness, that puts the finishing touch! I'm loaded up to the muzzle, and couldn't stand another grain of cramming without bursting. I'll go and have a game at rackets, it will wake me up; and I want something to stir my stumps, for they are stiff enough after this three weeks' coaching."

An hour later, and Charlie was lying on his bed with a broken arm, waiting to have it set. In playing rackets, he had slipped and fallen on the hard flags, his arm snapping underneath him like a twig. The mere bodily pain he had borne like a hero; and, though his face was deadly pale, and he felt very weak, he was in full possession of his senses. But he was in an agony of mind. After all his exertions, his three weeks' work, his right arm would be useless, and he must give up all notion of going in for the Lawson Scholarship. The thought of this drove him almost mad; and when the medical man did arrive he found his patient in a very feverish and excited state, and with every predisposition to be delirious. However, the disagreeable operation of setting the injured limb was satisfactorily accomplished, and Charlie was left in charge of Mrs. Lawson, who had come to him the moment she heard of his accident, with strict injunctions that he was to be kept very quiet. As soon as his room had been got into a little order, the kind-hearted, motherly woman took a chair, and sat down by his bedside. The lad's hand was lying outside on the counterpane; she took it between her own, and smoothed it so tenderly, and with such gentle soothing, that a gratified smile stole over his face, and his eyes opened on her with an expression of gratitude. Ay, Charlotte Lawson, schoolmaster's wife though you were, there are many big strong men now who bless your kindly face and goodness, and remember with affection how thoughtful you were for them when they were schoolboys at Rosleigh.

Charlie lay quite quiet and still for some time; but at last he said, in quite a firm voice, "Do you think, ma'am, I might see Mr. Seymour?"

"I think, my dear boy, you had better not," answered Mrs. Lawson, somewhat surprised at his request. "At least, wait till to-morrow morning."

"Oh, please, do let me," persisted Charlie; "it really won't do me any harm, and I do want to, particularly."

"Well," thought Mrs. Lawson, "there can be no great danger, after all." So Mr. Seymour was sent for, and came at once. To tell the truth, he was greatly upset by Charlie's accident, and dreadfully disappointed that he was thus placed hors de combat, as far as that examination was concerned.

"Pretor, I'm very sorry for this," he said, as he went up to the bedside. "It really is most unfortunate that you will have to give up going in for the scholarship."

"Give it up, sir!" was the answer. "I don't mean to give it up. Why I asked to see you was, that I wanted you to suggest some way or another that I may not have to give it up."

"But you know, Charlie," interrupted Mrs. Lawson, asut to point out the serious consequences that might follow from his undergoing any excitement in his present condition; but Charlie turned appealingly to her.

"Oh, ma'am, please don't say so. I have set my heart on having a try for it, and it will make me far worse to be disappointed."

I cannot give the whole of the conversation that passed; it resulted, however, in both Mrs. Lawson and Mr. Seymour going down and having an interview with the Doctor and Mr. Sutton. The latter at once suggested that Charlie should have the examination-papers to do in his own room, and that Mrs. Lawson should write the answers from his dictation. Here was the whole difficulty got rid of at once; the only obstacle that remained was the consideration as to whether it might not injure the lad's health, and delay his recovery. Then up spoke Mr. Seymour, who said that he knew Charlie would suffer a great deal more by a refusal, than if permission were granted him; and so it was agreed that nothing should be said to the medical man about it. The course suggested to be taken with reference to Charlie's examination was duly conveyed to the other competitors for the scholarship, and they readily acquiesced therein, having full confidence in Mrs. Lawson's fairness, and an equal belief in the utter hopelessness of his chance.

The last day of the term had arrived, the prizes were to be distributed, and the successful candidate for the Lawson Scholarship would be announced. On this occasion, the parents and friends of those boys who lived within a convenient distance always assembled in great force, consequently the proceedings were of a highly interesting and impressive character. Mr. Sutton had been up nearly half the night, reading the papers of the competitors for the scholarship, and had been occupied all the morning in his room, doing the same; so that whoever the successful one was, his name was known to the examiner alone.

At twelve o'clock the bell was rung, for guests and boys alike to assemble in the big schoolroom, where Dr. Lawson would present the prizes, and the result of the scholarship examination be made known. Soon the place was quite full, with papas and mammas and pretty sisters, who, after a good deal of pushing and squeezing and pinching, managed to make themselves comfortable, and to settle down into something like order. The Doctor sat patiently at his desk, waiting for Mr. Sutton, who had just sent a message to say he was coming in a moment. Before him were ranged a goodly array of books, elaborate in bindings and gilt edges, which were presently to be distributed.

Among the visitors present was Mr. Pretor, who had come down to see Dr. Lawson on the subject of removing Charlie from Rosleigh. He was sitting on one of the forms, with his son beside him. He seemed careworn and sad, though he listened attentively to all that was told him. One thing he was quite ignorant of, and that was Charlie's having been a candidate for the scholarship. When the father looked round and saw so many young and happy faces, it grieved him to think that his boy must say good-bye to school so soon, and go out into the world to work for his living. As for the young gentleman himself, he spoke quite quietly, without betraying in the least how anxiously and nervously he was awaiting Mr. Sutton's arrival.

He came at last; there was a bustle in the neighbourhood of the door, and Mr. Sutton hurried in, duly attired in cap and gown, and carrying the fatal list in his hand. He walked up to the Doctor's desk, said a few hurried words to him, and then, with a short preliminary clearing of the throat, addressed the school as follows:—

"Gentlemen of Rosleigh: It was with a feeling of profound satisfaction that I received, and accepted, the invitation of the trustees of the Lawsen Scholarship, to conduct the first examination of candidates for the honour of holding a prize which alone, for the sake of him whose name it bears, may well be coveted by you all. I have no desire to prolong the suspense of those who have, on this first occasion, competed for it; I may, however, say that each and all of them have done credit and honour to Rosleigh. In framing the various papers, the object I had in view was to discover the candidate most generally proficient in all the subjects. From what your headmaster has said to me in the course of conversation, I fancy the result will take most of you by surprise; but I am bound to add that he whose name I am about to mention is a considerable number of marks in advance of his opponents. Nothing remains for me to do but to declare that Charles Pretor has gained the Lawson Scholarship."

For a moment, masters and boys sat perfectly dumb with astonishment at this unexpected announcement. Then arose a burst of loud and enthusiastic cheering, that threatened to take the roof off the old schoolhouse, and made itself heard down in Rosleigh village. During Mr. Sutton's address, Charlie had taken hold of his father's hand; and then, when he heard his name read out, and knew he was successful, he whispered to him—

"Better late than never, father; I turned industrious at last, you see."

"God bless you, my boy!" answered Mr. Pretor, his eyes filled with tears, and his voice strangely shaky, pressing warmly the hand that rested in his.

"Pretor, come up to my desk," called out the Doctor; and Charlie rose and obeyed, stopping on his way, however, to bend down to Mrs. Lawson and kiss her outstretched hand; and then he went on and stood in front of the Doctor's desk, in the presence of the whole school.

"My boys," said Dr. Lawson, "I can't allow this opportunity to pass without publicly congratulating Pretor on his success, which was as little expected by me as yourselves." Here he shook hands warmly with Charlie. "I am glad to find that when he has made up his mind to success, he is as much at home in the examination-room as upon the cricket-field. My best wishes go with you, Pretor."

The allusion to Charlie's performance in the Past and Present match was the signal for another burst of applause, during which he walked back to his seat, and then Dr. Lawson proceeded to distribute the various prizes, and by-and-by the ceremony came to an end. Cunningham and Lyecester, though unsuccessful, were not ill-natured rivals; and when the formalities were over, they were the first to congratulate their hitherto despised opponent. And on this agreeable tableau the curtain falls.

In after years, Charles Pretor learned to bless that contest for the Lawson Scholarship, for it taught him that, however discouraging and unfavourable appearances, the race is not always with the swift, nor the battle with the strong, but that the true secret of success is to have the will to succeed, and the way will presently unfold itself.

"FIGHTING CHESTER."—A TRUE STORY.

BY I. D. FENTON.

"I HAVE no son, sir," said the old man, his features growing stern and pale. "You plead a dead cause. My son is dead—nay, would to God he had been only dead," and with a deep sob, the father covered his face.

"I am very sorry for you, Mr. Chester, pray believe me that nothing but the earnest hope of sparing you further pain would have induced me to intrude upon you now; Mark Chester will have to go to India, unless——"

"Nay, sir, in pity spare me—I have three daughters to provide for; he, whom you plead for, has already impoverished me. I have not the means, even had I thought it right, to buy him off. But," after a pause, "if you are going too, and if you see signs of repentance and amendment, then, dear sir, I beg of you, remind him that he has a father, who never ceaseth day and night to lift up the voice of supplication and prayer, that he may be turned from his sins, and taught to know the only true life of peace and happiness."

"I shall not fail to do your trust, sir."

When his son's messenger was gone, the old man bent his head; the tears rolled down his withered cheeks, for what grief is so bitter as that for a child, whose steps have wandered from the truth? As Mr. Chester wept, his mind pictured the days long past—the bright-haired frank-faced boy—the boy he had been so proud of—whose daring nothing could daunt, and of whose strong, firm will he was wont to prophesy great things. In fancy, he saw him growing up, still the same bright, loving, and brave boy; still the pride of a fond mother's heart, and the idol of the household. Then came the first sin, and the cloud no bigger than a man's hand, rapidly increasing until it covered and veiled the very promise of sunshine and Heaven's grace, until the child, the delight and pride of his heart, became an outcast and reproach. Twice, thrice, was he forgiven, and received back; each time when health had come again, had he returned to his old life, and repaid his father with curses: and it was for this son a comrade had come to make a last appeal. The regiment was under orders for India, and Mark, having found out that a soldier's life was not all idleness and pleasure, but that drunkenness and debauchery were strictly punished, was tired of his self-chosen lot. Weakened by past excess—depressed, discontented, and half-desperate—Mark shrank from the chances of war; and when the report of the Indian Mutiny was proved authentic, and his regiment received orders to prepare for embarkation, Mark would have given his right hand to escape. In his extremity, he dispatched a comrade with an appeal to his father. When this failed, there was still desertion, but for that he would wait until he reached India, where, in the hurry and press of war, he fancied he would have a better chance of getting clear off, and, besides, have a new life and country open to him.

The voyage was, like most voyages, tedious enough. There was nothing to do but eat, drink, gamble, and sleep. Drink was plentiful, and Mark generally won at cards. So, if indulgence in a man's propensities brings happiness, he ought to have been content; but good old Dr. Watts has told us that

"Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do;"

and so it proved. Mark was under arrest several times, and, so continually in disgrace that he obtained the sobriquet of "Black Mark."

The first news that greeted the regiment on landing was the horrible massacre at Cawnpore. Mark saw the faces of his comrades light up, and a strange burning rush went dancing through his own veins, making him lift his head higher, and, for awhile, forget his weakness. But the excitement soon faded; the heat, the constant use of stimulants, the extra fatigue, and forced marches, brought back all his evil propensities, and when the regiment was encamped at Kussowlie, he put his long-brooded-over plan into execution, and deserted. But every white face was marked. So it came about that, having got as far as Umballa, he was apprehended, and taken into custody by a party sent out to bring in some volunteers.

The sergeant to whose lot it fell to arrest Chester, being a kind-hearted man, trusted to the appearance of penitence displayed by the prisoner, and dispensed with handcuffs, and permitted him to march more leisurely than was strictly consistent with his duty. Mark repaid this kindness as might have been expected. When within forty-eight hours' march of head-quarters, he made off again.

Luck was, however, against him; he was again taken, and brought to a court-martial. His sentence was flogging, and a hope was expressed by the colonel that this unavoidably severe sentence would bring the culprit to reason, and show him how deeply reprehensible his conduct had been. Mark laughed in the speaker's face, and bore his punishment without a groan.

From that day the small remaining spark of self-respect and good feeling that had remained was wiped out, and when—his stripes being healed—he was once more on duty, his conduct was so flagrantly bad that, had men not been so scarce, he would have been drummed out of his regiment. Things were at as bad a pass as they well could be. Mark was drunk whenever he could get enough to make him so, and utterly regardless of all appertaining to a good, or even ordinary soldier.

The relief of the beleaguered garrison of Lucknow, by General Havelock, has been justly placed among the greatest achievements of any time. Never was there, to all appearance, a more forlorn hope, and never will history tell of a more complete success. A portion of the regiment to which Mark Chester was attached formed a part of the relief. The last forced march was over; men and officers, worn out and foot-sore, were lying about in every position, snatching a few hours' rest or sleep before the day of battle —a day which must be the dawn of the long morning of eternity to many a gallant soldier. High overhead spread a dark blue sky, sprinkled by a few strange stars. The thick air lay like a shroud, and upon it boomed incessantly the distant thunder of big guns. Mark had not fallen asleep; he had been reprimanded more than once the day past, and sat doggedly brooding over his lot, laying plans for escape or revenge. A man who was lying near, and had been watching him, suddenly sat up, and creeping along until he was close at his side, whispered—

"When you sent me to your father, Chester, he gave me a message for you. I was only to give it under certain conditions. Now, although I don't see that, according to the old gentleman's thinking, the time has come yet, I have a queer dread of to-morrow, and fancy, somehow, I won't come out of it with breath enough left to talk to you. So here goes. Your father said, 'Tell him'—that's you, you know, Mark—'tell him that he has a father who never ceaseth, day or night, to lift up the voice of prayer and supplication that he'—meaning you, Mark, again—'might be turned from his sins, and taught to know the only true life and happiness.' These were his words, Mark, and for the life of me I cannot get them out of my head to-night."

Mark Chester's face crimsoned, then became ghastly pale, but seeing his comrade watching him eagerly, he broke into a harsh defiant laugh, saying—

"So you are fighting shy now, Tom?"

Tom's face grew angry. "No I'm not—no one can say that; but I won't be alive this time to-morrow. I feel as sure of that as I am of lying here, and it would be a pity for you not to know that there was a chance for you; and, if I was you, I'd write a line, asking the old gentleman's pardon, and stick it in my jacket, in case of being knocked over. Good night, Mark; it'll precious soon be bugle call," and Tom crept back to where his musket lay.

Next day, while he and Mark were fighting side by side, a round shot struck him full in the chest. Mark heard the crash, and turning, saw his comrade's place vacant. The burning stream that was dashing through his veins became like fiery lava. His hand grasped his sword with new strength. His father's words seemed ringing in the air, high and clear, over the horrible din of fight, the crash of guns, the agonising shrieks of the wounded, and the curses of many a poor lost soul. On went the gallant force through blood and fire. Wherever the fight was thickest, or danger most imminent, there did Mark's voice and courage cheer and nerve his comrades. And when the battle was over, and Havelock's heroic band was inside the walls of Lucknow, men talked to each other with glistening eyes of Mark's deeds, and called him "Fighting Chester," a name which stuck to him during the whole of the long terrible days and weeks that followed.

The events of the defence of Lucknow are well known. Where all were brave, it would be unfair to single out one. Mark's name is enough to show that he was foremost in every duty requiring endurance, courage, or trust, and so won, not only the admiration of his commanding officers and comrades, but regained his own almost dead self-respect.

By the time the mutiny was quelled, Fighting Chester had three good-conduct stripes, and had been promoted to sergeant.

* * * * *

"Who's that smart, good-looking fellow with the stripes?" asked General —, as he stood by the colonel after reviewing the remnant of his old regiment.

"Oh, that's Fighting Chester—Mark Chester."

"You don't mean the man we used to call Black Mark, who was flogged at Umballa?"

"Indeed I do. Rather a change, is it not?"

"Oh, then, of course, that accounts for the change. Bears out my theory about flogging."

"Not at all, general; flogging made him a greater reprobate than ever. If it hadn't been that we could not spare a man who could hold a rifle, he'd have been broke fifty times. Cranmer here will tell you that he dreaded the sight of the fellow, and fully expected some horrible ending. It was fighting, not flogging, brought him to his senses. He came out strong at Lucknow; the fellows called him Fighting Chester the first day, and when he found they were praising him, he was not to be stopped by anything; he volunteered for every post of difficulty."

It was all true; Chester was a changed man. But nature was not to be cheated. The extraordinary fatigue, coming upon a broken constitution, laid him up with fever, and just eighteen months after the end of the mutiny, Mark Chester was landed at Portsmouth with a batch of lean-faced, shaky invalids, and sent up to Netley, from whence, in due time, he was discharged with a good-service pension.

It was a sunny afternoon late in June. The haymakers were busy in the fields, and everywhere the sweet English landscape was bright with such scenes as are met with in no other country, and bear all the charm and warmth of home to the wanderer's heart. Mark saw it all, and many a time during the short walk from the railway station to his father's rectory did he pause to drink in with greedy ears and thrilling heart the song of the birds and blithe whistle of the workmen.

His last pause was at the garden gate. This time, however, he heard neither voices nor songs; his eyes were fixed upon an old man, who was sitting upon a bench under a branching lime-tree. A fine old mastiff, with his head resting upon his master's knees, sat gazing gravely in his face. The dog looked round, and came bounding down the walk. A minute more, and Mark was in his father's arms, and the old man, with trembling lips and happy tears, was thanking the Lord, crying—

"For this my son was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found."

BACKWARDS—FORWARDS.

BY THE REV. R. S. BROOKE, D.D.

MY brow is sad, my heart beats low,
I sit within my darkened room;
Two spirits are beside me now,
Invoked, to share or chase my gloom.

The one regards the chequered past
With fitful gaze, now sad, now bright;
The other's eyes on heaven are cast,
And scarce a shadow dims their light.

Memory and Hope! I greet you now;
Fair sisters with your mystic glass,
On which, as from some lake's smooth brow,
Reflected figures come and pass.

Give me thy glass, O Mem'ry, first—
My spirit strains upon the sight—
My youth's free step is here; the trust
In all I met—the eye of light;

The friends I loved, the paths I trod,
The wild dark hills I wandered o'er;
The fresh waves of the heart's young blood,
Which bore me in to Life's green shore.

And many a face I loved too well,
And many a voice 'twas sweet to hear,
Come back to life, at thy bright spell;
I know and feel that they are here.

O Memory! let me gaze more deep;
For midst these shining lights of morn
Are things that make these eyes to weep,
And cloud my heart with grief and scorn.

O thoughtless hours! O days of folly!
Occasions slighted—strength misused—
When passion ploughed, and melancholy
Reaped the wild grain of gifts abused.

O loving hearts, once warmly beating!
Where are you now? cold—cold and gone:
O sweet young voices, hushed and fleeting,
You've died away, and I am lone.

Withdraw thy glass, O Memory!
Thy pain is greater than thy pleasure,
For sin and suffering ever lie
Like dross amidst youth's golden treasure.

And give me thine, O Hope, so fair,
If that therein I may descry
Some counter good, that might repair
The wrongs and ills of days gone by.

Oh! comfort to my heart is given!
How bright thy visions, how entrancing!
For see, beyond the opening heaven,
The golden halls of God are glancing.

Yet still Life's path must first be trod,
Midst tears and thorns, midst cloud and care.
The deathbed grief, the churchyard sod—
These things will be, and we must bear.

Yet through each clouded scene below,
Bright Hope can send a piercing ray;
And Christ's sweet love round weal or woe
Will pour its calm and solemn day.

And thus I feel, that now and ever,
While gazing thy clear glass within,
My soul will use its strong endeavour
To overcome both grief and sin.

And whatsoever my future story,
If I but trust, and strive, and pray,
The purchased and the promised glory
Will be my soul's eternal day.

A WORD UPON HAVING A REFRESHER.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

WHAT'S a Refresher? Ask a barrister. If he doesn't know, then he is evidently not the man to manage the difficult suit in which your friend Fight-it-out is now engaged. It's very certain that at all events he isn't a Q.C., if he is ignorant concerning the question of a Refresher! What's it like?—well, it's a certain cash reminder of coming duties—and it's on the whole dearer than an English sherry-cobbler or an American gum-tickler, both of which are considered by the afore-said nations to be refreshing in the extreme. After all, however, this is no direct answer to the question—What's a Refresher? and it must be patent to the reader that the answer to be given depends greatly on the person asked. Probably a street-arab would define it as sitting on the streaming pipe of a London water-cart in full play in the heat of summer; and, probably, the fashionable exquisite would consider it a cigarette after a Turkish bath, or an ice at Verey's after a stroll on the sunny-side of Regent Street. Tastes of course differ, and a rustic clodhopper would, doubtless, have a heavier sort of eating estimate about refreshment; any how, it must be seen that the question at the commencement of this paper isn't to be answered in an off-hand way.

There is refreshment of the mind as well as of the body; and a holiday is one of the nicest things in the world when it combines both. A restful day or two now and then is better than a long dose of recreation; its very brevity gives a briskness to the relish of the holiday. Here at this pier-head, where I am with difficulty writing this paper, while the breeze is playing games with the sheets, and giving two or three sharp snatches at them in a playful way, plenty of people are getting a Refresher. Some few, however, seem to be holiday finishing, and look as though work would be wonderfully welcome again! There sits a sensible sort of fellow in an alcove, and if I'm not mistaken, he's reading THE QUIVER. Perhaps, he's reading me! I feel a sort of interest in him forthwith, and cannot help reflecting that moral nearness is greater than material nearness. There's a queer little sharp-featured man close to my seat, who is not one half so near to me as the possible reader of my thoughts. Vanity of vanities, I'm watching him very closely to see if he's nodding his head approvingly. Sensible man, very! I think he does! Ah! what strange stuff we're made of—little titillations of pleasure come to us in these ways which we are half-ashamed to own. But, perhaps, he's reading another man, and then the titillation's gone; any how, let us hope he's getting a Refresher out of a many-arrowed QUIVER. Here are numbers reading books; fancy what a combination of refreshing powers: the sea-spray and the fresh air invigorating the body, and thought stimulating and quickening the mind; that's having a Refresher in a double sense indeed! How listless, at the best, must be the lives of those who can retire from duty, and have no taste for reading! I have heard people laugh at the story of the little girl and the alphabet, when she said it wasn't worth going through so much to learn so little!—but what a sorry time the said little girl would have of it in seasons of retirement, or in the after days, if she couldn't refresh her oft-jaded heart with the pages of a book!

To take thoughts concerning refreshment somewhat in order, we must first have time for it; and it isn't in any sense lost time. You will soon make up for it in quantity—you can do more after a holiday; and you will improve it in quality—you will do the work better! A day or two of perfect rest will give amazing zest to life, and send you on again as with a bloodless spur, which, instead of jading you, will speed you to the winning-post of duty with alacrity and zeal.

Work in itself is a grand thing. Here is God working on every hand around us. The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Yes! the work of his hand—not a kind of law-work, which goes on and on in machine-like order, but that work of his hand, guided by Divine thoughtfulness and love. Work is good for us all; and real hard work too. More men die of laziness than of labour, and there is no being on earth so contemptible as an idler. The hard-worker, either by sweat of brain or brow, will be the one heartily to enjoy a day's refreshment. It is amazing, however, how the constitutional ideas of men differ as to what a Refresher is: one rushes off to some exhibition, or some competition, raises all his energies to high-pressure point, and returns home, perhaps, a wiser, but scarcely, in physical respects, a better man; while another loves to get face to face with Nature again, delights to feel the soft kiss of her fresh breeze, and to hear the melodious voice of her chorister-waves.

I am sure that there is a wondrous nerve-restoring power in the very sounds of Nature—the silvery laugh of the retiring wave, the ripple of a purling brook, running like a silver thread through the village meadows—these have a soothing monotone; and the drowsy hum of the bee, and the browsing of the cattle, have a ministry of repose which cannot be other than refreshing to the nerves. Of all places for refreshment, give me the musical water-courses of Devonshire, with their overshadowing hills, and their fern-covered valleys; or else the Lynton Rocks, with the sweet, wholesome breath of the ever-fragrant sea!

It has been said by a philosopher, in relation to human life, that on sunny days you remember all the past sunny ones, and on sad days you remember all the past sad ones. I am sure of one thing, that as we grow older each day of refreshment brings back to us the sound of some voice that is still, and the touch of some hand that is cold. As we gaze on sea or shore without them, it is our joy to know that they are on that more beautiful and more restful shore, where sorrow and sighing never come, where there are no bitter separations, and no more graves.

No day of refreshment, however, would be perfect to the Christian without the realisation of His presence by whom the worlds were made; and who has adapted all sights, and sounds, and associations to minister to the gladness and gratification of the eye, the ear, and the heart of man. When the day of refreshment comes, if you are conscious of one thing more than another, it is a desire to make many others sharers of your joy. Very well! Do not let that thought die out in sentiment. Take your daily paper and peruse it well; you will see advertisements from various parishes and districts, saying such and such poor people, or aged women in City Mission districts, or Ragged-school gatherings, want money for a day's excursion—just one day's outing into the green lanes and the breezy air from smoky, overcrowded London! Now, do not wait until to-morrow. Send a cheque or some postage-stamps off at once, then you will enjoy your own rest in a redoubled way; you will have done something to furnish refreshment for your brethren amongst the needy and the poor; and verily, even here you will have your reward.

I love to stand in the hay-fields, and to see the long excursion-trains speeding their way with crowded carriages on the Monday, with the panting engines, hurrying to the sea. You can have no sympathy with Miss Lispering Loveself who says, "How these excursionists spoil the watering-places with their baskets, their bread, and their beer." For my part, I know no sight much pleasanter than to see multitudes of toil-worn artisans, their wives, and children, regaling their senses with these sights and sounds of the sea, and taking their frugal meal upon God's own beach-made table-land. That must be a cold heart which lives to self alone; and not only cold, but it must be shorn of that sweetest of all pleasures—the sharing of another's joy. To give others a Refresher, then, ought to be our common duty, and would, assuredly, be our joy. We say, "I'll give him a Refresher" often enough, when a man owes us money, and there happens to be an over-due cheque or bill. Let us be equally anxious to send Refreshers to others in a better sense. We need not ask, how? when? where? The secret of doing good is not so very difficult to discover. A few flowers for the sick-room, a basket of summer fruit for the feverish patient, a home-visit for the servants of your family—these are Refreshers indeed!

We all need refreshment—physical, social, mental, and spiritual. Not alone the body—no! a friend's face is often better than a summer sky. Not alone the social—no! the page of a book is often sweeter than the face of a friend. Not only the mental—no! we read on the best authority that there are seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

Many people make mistakes about Refreshers. I apprehend that many of the working multitude do in these same summer excursions. There is a great deal of cant talked about robbing a poor man of his beer; but, as a workman said the other day to me, "Where do you get that article, sir? Beer! why it's poison!" and the irritated brain and the spoiled holiday are often, very often, the result of adulterated beer. This is only a type of other mistakes made on a day's refreshment. There's a youth at this moment flopping about in a boat, who looks anything but at home in the cradle of the sea; and there's another at the pier-head, who looks as if his amateur cigar didn't improve his complexion or his comfort. To have a Refresher is certainly very different, either from the shilling's-worth of rough sea purchased by the former, or the copper's-worth of cabbage-leaves being consumed by the latter.

I was told the other day of a divine who used to say, "If I had time and talent, I would more fully open up this important subject," &c. Now this applies to the writer concerning many aspects of refreshment. But there is one, and that a very serious one, with which I close—that is, emphatically, concerning the Lord's day. I am sorely afraid that this dear England is beginning to hold lightly by the Sunday. Many periodicals, and many prominent personages, are publishing and talking as though the Lord's day was not a day of refreshment, because it is a day of religion! A more egregious mistake could not be made. Given the multitudes who have returned at eventide, hot, jaded, and excited, from some crowded company of Sunday excursionists, and those who have been listening to the sweet story of old at church, and afterwards have knelt around the altar of the household at home, to seek and to share the blessing of the Great Father; and then, as you watch the contrast, I think I need not say which company have had the best of a Sunday's refreshment.

LETTER AND SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

T. PAUL tells us, in a remarkable passage, speaking expressly of the New Testament, that the letter killeth and the spirit quickeneth. (2 Cor. iii. 6.) Strong language indeed, but justified by the words of the Lord Christ himself. "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."

The mischievous results of keeping too rigidly to the letter of directions is well known in common life. A servant who never thought, and only did precisely what we ordered, would be unbearable. So is a companion that quibbles over the form of every sentence. Nations could not exist if their laws were administered by the letter,—if all killing were punished by death, and there were no power above the judge and jury to bend their cast-iron verdict and sentence into a milder and softer shape. It is told of Lord Nelson that, before a great battle, he gathered his captains in his cabin, opened his charts and explained his plans minutely; but that did not satisfy him. When all was over he said, "Remember, gentlemen, if you should feel perplexed, that no serious mistake can be made by any captain who places himself beside an enemy's ship." So completely in that noble mind was the letter of his own directions sunk and swallowed in their spirit. Therefore he was truly great. It was not by any slavish regulations, but by inflaming every one with his own ardour and resolution, so that a new life was breathed into them when he was by, that he swept the enemies of his country from off the face of the deep.

Now, in religion, the same observation has always been just as true. Obedience to the letter could hardly go further than the Pharisees contrived to push it, and yet no corpse, loathsome to every sense, could be further from life than their religion. They tythed their very garden herbs—mint, anise, and cummin; they would not eat with unwashen hands; they actually disputed about whether it were sinful to carry a pin in their clothes on Sunday. But at the same time they studied what oaths might be safely broken. To swear by the temple and the altar was nothing to their consciences, and they contrived, for the honour of God, to refuse to support their parents. Woe unto them! for they omitted the weightier matters of the law. And what were these?—things which were not contained in slavish rules, and could not be grasped by the disciples of the letter, but hung round every rule like a balmy atmosphere, like the perfume for which alone some unsightly flower is precious. The weightier matters of the law were judgment, mercy, and faith—things entirely pertaining to the spirit. And so they grew daily darker and more unblessed. First they saw a poor man, who had just been healed, carrying home his bed, and, instead of rejoicing at his cure, they complained because he had not left his only resting-place to be lost, upon the Sabbath-day. "It is the Sabbath-day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed." Then they saw a withered hand restored; and now, going further still, they did not blush to complain of the very act of mercy and love itself. A little further, and they have come to even blacker wickedness. They plot together the murder of Jesus. They hire false witnesses, and bribe a traitor to kill the Prince of life. They troop around his cross with cruel and unmanly taunts. The religious chiefs of Israel teach the very Roman soldiers to tell lies: "His disciples stole him while we slept." Alas, for the amazing self-deceptions of the heart of men! they seem to have imagined all the time that they were godly and conscientious people. They refused to go into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled. They would not put the rejected bribe of Judas into the treasury, because it was the price of blood. Hypocrites, liars, and assassins that they were, they were nervously anxious lest the corpse of their victim should hang upon the cross at an unlawful time, and so defile the Sabbath. The letter killed them. Which revered the law of God aright, they, or the Holy One who clashed with its letter boldly as often as the spirit was at stake, who claimed to be lord of the Sabbath-day, who touched the leprous and the dead, and who was, nevertheless, fulfilling all righteousness, doing the Father's will, and finishing his work?

And it is very noteworthy that, even as regards temporal life, the letter killed the Jews, while Christ was raised up by the Spirit. For they dreamed that still they were God's people; and when the Roman war came on, they flocked to Jerusalem at the feast as usual, and were shut up in prodigious crowds, as in a trap. Yet the promise declared that no enemy should ever attack them at that time. Then the same delusive hopes made them spurn the most favourable terms. But the raven, and the vulture, and the kite—famine, and plague, and sword—came down upon their overcrowded multitudes, until the phrenzy of hope gave way to the sullenness of despair, and the survivors went away to slavery, and thistles grew where the songs of David used to peal.

I.—Think, now, how the letter may kill in our own time, and among those who have the New Testament to guide them.

1. It kills by making men satisfied with far too low and poor a standard of obedience. Satan will whisper to the soul: "Fear not, while you have kept just inside the line of right and wrong." And yet you have deceived your neighbour, without exactly lying to him; you have got the better of him, without exactly committing theft; you have trifled away time, without exactly plunging into sin; you have been flushed and excited, without falling quite into intemperance. How often do men turn angrily upon good advisers, or upon their own misgivings, and say: "Show me a text against what I have done; tell me where it is forbidden; which of the commandments have I broken?" The letter is searing their conscience, it is killing them. The spirit, "if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise," would break the snare, and they should escape.

2. It kills by making religion wearisome. Nothing tires and disgusts the mind so much as an endless round of dry regulations that must be observed, and yet cannot be understood. You will find a homely example of what I mean in a child's dislike to read aloud, when he is forced to mind a number of dry rules and stops. The freshness of his book is lost until he is able, by entering completely into its spirit, to rise above these regulations. He does not then violate, but more accurately observe the rules. And just so, I am not arguing against the letter of our dispensation, but in favour of the only way by which the letter can be really made living, the catching it up into something higher and more effectual than itself, the entrance of the Spirit to give life. Without that, religion will lose its soul and relish, and sink into a slavery, a dull routine, an irksome tribute, that we must pay to God, but cannot help grudging him; and God will see that want of heart and frown upon it, and the frown of God is death. The difference between formal and true religion is the same as the difference between an automaton and a man, who breathes, thinks, and loves.

3. A sure way by which the letter kills (that is, the mere letter) is by breaking up the Gospel message, so that one only thinks of a little piece, and neglects all the rest. You cannot remember a long message without understanding it. The surest and quickest way to learn a long lesson by rote, as every schoolboy knows, is not first to load the memory mechanically, but clearly and fully to grasp the most minute meaning of the words. Then the work is half done. Now, people who take up the letter of Scripture quite forget this, and make the most wonderful mistakes in consequence. They talk of the mercy of God, just as if there were not a word about his vengeance anywhere; or else of his justice, as if there were no hope. The Antinomian forgets all about being judged by works, and the Roman Catholic pushes faith contemptuously out of its due place; so that, not only does the letter kill the soul, but a few letters contrive to kill the rest.

Our moral at this point therefore is, do not be content with knowing intellectually the Bible, or the Gospel plan; you must catch the spirit of it. Remember how Christ said to the religious world of his day, Search the Scriptures: do not be content with having them; you do wrong to think that in them, as a matter of course, you have eternal life safely conveyed to you. Their business is to testify to a living Saviour, and your duty is to study till you drink in their import. "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think that ye have everlasting life, and" (as if he said, "and yet") "they are they which testify of me."

II.—The Spirit giveth life. The New Testament, I think, never once uses this word in our low modern sense, in which we speak of the spirit of a passage as another word for the sense of it.

Scripture confines it to two senses—the spirit of a man and the Spirit of his Maker. For our subject the word is taken up and explained by verse 17: "Now the Lord is that Spirit" (or far more correctly); "now that Spirit is the Lord: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

Look for a moment at this idea. The value of any message we could send our fellow-creatures would lie altogether in its meaning: we want people to understand us. And the value of a book lies in its meaning also, not in its fine sounds; but in the New Testament (whether by that name we mean the message, or the volume that contains it) the mind is not that of man, for its authors claimed to use "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth;" therefore, any benefit we can expect is not from the letter, nor yet from John or Paul; but from the mind of the Spirit, which no one but himself can explain. Without him you receive as little influence from care and study, as one who touches an electrical machine from which the spark has fled. With him, no matter by what agency the blessing come, it bears the mark of its origin, as plainly as the electric spark does, after flashing around half the world.

Perhaps some reader of this page has often studied his Bible anxiously enough, and found it cold and dull, and even commonplace. Perhaps we all know what it is to go on, flattering ourselves that we are imbibing good from a passage, when indeed we scarcely notice the exact meaning of the words. Perhaps it has also befallen us to find some old passage apparently exhausted, burned down to ashes; and yet at some later and more holy time, that same verse has leaped up into radiancy and splendour, as suddenly as fuel at the touch of flame. And it was the baptism of fire that made the change; and he who wants to derive blessing from his Bible, yes, and from any faithful proclamation of the Word, must act as a man who was preparing to receive God's own Spirit into his heart: in reverence, in purity, in prayer, in faith, in lowliness, in honouring Christ.

What is mere speculative truth? When the Romanists plundered Jews and roasted Turks alive, they were impelled to those works of Satan under cover of belief in Christ; and there is reason to fear that texts have been forged before now, and false papers trumped up, as evidence that our Lord was God. But never did the Holy Ghost whisper that same familiar truth into the deep and secret places of the heart, without a new desire for truth and holiness, a tender love for the fallen and sinful, springing up in the listening soul. And conversion in our days is not so often the reception of new truth, as the coming of old truth in a new vigour and into a new importance.

But all this does not set aside the utmost reverence for the written or spoken Word. Paul and

Paul's Master, whose testimony against the mere letter is so powerful, both quoted the Word, in the spirit and by the Spirit's guidance. The difference is between the mere letter and the same letters—Old Testament and New—read as spelling out one great and comprehended Word, "the Word of God." The sword of the Spirit must be wielded by the Spirit's hand. For us the Word may be like one of those dull and heavy clouds which hang all day long upon the western sky, chill, and threatening and repulsive. Or it may be like the same cloud, in every line the same, yet grand beyond all painter's cunning, gorgeous with unearthly splendours, fittest type and purest symbol of the glory of our Father's house. It is only a question of whether the sun be streaming on it from behind.

A FIRST LOVE.

GIVE ye greeting, brave old trees,
All tempest-scarred, and gnarled by time.
With faltering step and feeble knees
To view ye in your summer prime

I steal. To sit beneath your shade
I come; whiles on mine ear again,
From cunning haunts your leaves have made,
Falls many a wild, refreshing strain;

And through your breeze-stirred branches glance
Sunbeams, that touch with dazzling fleck
The quiet shade, and play and dance,
As jewels bright on beauty's neck.

I never may forget the hour,
The happy hour, my truant feet
Bore me, in flying from a shower,
To this your wizard-like retreat;

Nor how a longing seized my soul,
That slept not, till your forms so grand,
From base to crown, from branch to bole,
Lay mirrored by my novice hand;

Nor, as I bent me o'er my prize,
The blissful thrill, that tingling ran
The tears of joy into mine eyes,
And made me tenfold more a man.

Art opened now her vistas fair,
I trode them, growing as I went,
My days touched with a pleasing care,
My bosom with sweet discontent;

The discontent that makes men strive
In hearty emulation still
To mount, how well soe'er they thrive
And lends rare power to the will.

Though sixty summers since have fled,
That impulse hath not passed away;
Though winter sits upon my head,
The love you woke knows no decay.

The charm your first acquaintance wrought
On me, with boundless good was rife;
For lo! the inspiration caught
That morn, gave purpose to my life.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

DOWN IN THE VILLAGE.

A STRANGER in the streets of Strathie was always an object of curiosity and interest, the advents of such being, like those of angels, few and far between. When one appeared at the entrance of the street, it seemed suddenly to be known from end to end, and there was a pushing aside of muslin curtains, and a peeping and peering through the leaves of dusty geraniums, whose faces all turned one way, along the whole length of its line. The guidwives, who had already got rid of pressing domestic matters, and snodded (tidied) themselves up for the day, would be standing on the vantage ground of their doorsteps, and looking both before and after the passage of the visitor with unabashed curiosity.

The little river-side cluster of cottages led to nothing and nowhere. It did not share in the traffic which the print-work had brought to its near neighbour of Burnside, which skirted the high road to Bleaktown.

There arose, therefore, a great commotion in the little out-of-the-way place when, early in the autumn morning, there entered the street a string of straggling, footsore, haggard men and women, with children of all ages dragged at their mothers' skirts, or bound by the plaid on their fathers' backs. The children left their porridge unsupped and ran out into the road, the wives followed to the doors, albeit in their morning costume, and even the men who were at home at that hour lumbered up behind. In a very little time the whole village had turned out of doors, sans cérémonie, to gaze on the strangers.

There were men, mostly with longish, thin hair and deep-set, blue eyes, and sharp, hatchet faces, gaunt and lean, and with beards of a week's growth. There were women, whose beauty had been marred or utterly ruined by privation, exposure, or toil, and yet whom none of these things had coarsened or brutalised, as they coarsen and brutalise the people of other than Celtic race. Hardly able to drag one foot after the other, the miserable drooping figures yet retained something of grace, the worn and tanned features something of comparative refinement and fire. The band were of all ages. One withered crone, awful with "eld," was led by a girl whose wild hair, like that of the men, fine and thin, hung round a face of utterly ravishing sweetness.

The people of Strathie were not long at a loss to account for the advent of the strangers. There had been an eviction from the lands of some great noble, up in the wilds of Sutherland, perhaps, and these were a remnant of the scattered people.

They sympathised strongly, those good folks of Strathie, with the evicted. Attachment to their native soil and to each other was the cause of their distress, for the great noble would gladly have shipped them off to foreign lands, where plenty was awaiting them. But the villagers were not political economists—in those days political economists were not so common—and so they absurdly held that there were better things than even plenty of porridge, though that was an excellent thing in its way.

The strangers had come down the country by a cross-road, and having tramped along the same since that day's dawn, hungry and thirsty and tired, they had turned into the fields above the village, to eat what they might find, and reach the margin of the stream for water to drink and a bank to rest upon. Some were making a meal of green corn and raw turnips as they entered the village, and did not seek to hide their depredations, but sat down on the roadside, in front of the cottages, to finish their unwholesome repast.

Such was the scene which presented itself to Peggy Oglivie as she entered the village on the morning in question. As she went along, doles of oaten bread and drinks of milk were being distributed by the kindly cottagers, and the services of an interpreter had already been secured in the person of an old Highland woman, who was already hearing and explaining their sufferings to an excited little crowd.

Peggy stopped just opposite to where this little crowd was gathering, in the centre of the village, at the grocer's shop, which was her present destination. Then, her mission fulfilled, she turned and sped up the village, intending to send Jean with help and comfort to her wretched countryfolk.

Taking a short cut over the fields to the north side of the hill, where the ascent was steepest but speediest, she reached the wood just as the rain began to descend. As she entered, the sound of a child crying reached her ears. She stood still and listened, and there mingled with it the moan of some one in pain.

She had not far to look. Almost close to her, under a tree, sat a woman, evidently one of the party whom she had left in the village, with a miserable infant in her lap, while another child of two or three years old crouched crying by her side. A raw turnip, partly peeled, lay near. It had evidently proved too distasteful to the nursing mother, and too hard for the little child. Peggy understood it all in a moment, and stopping to enact a little pantomime of speedy return, darted off up the hill. When she entered the kitchen there was no one there, so what she did was to seize upon the inevitable basket of cakes. Then, hastening to the milk-house, she filled a pitcher with the morning's milk, already creaming over, and, without waiting to see any one, hurried down again.

Short as her absence had been, others were there before her. There stood round the woman, who had fainted when Peggy left her, her husband, Mr. Haldane, and an old man from "the works" who had accompanied the latter. The husband had gone off in search of help for his wife, and having found Mr. Haldane on his way to Strathie, had dragged him to the spot where he had left her in extremity, dying for want of food, as the old Highlander explained to his master. But more pressing than the words of appeal through an interpreter, was the passion of entreaty in the poor man's haggard face. Now he was kneeling down by his wife, uttering lamentations and extravagant endearments, while the tears ran down his grizzled cheeks. She was coming to herself, it seemed, as Peggy came up to them, for she had opened her eyes on her husband's face.

"That's right," said David Haldane, taking the pitcher from Peggy's hands, with no more recognition than if he had just parted from her, or himself sent her on her errand. The children were crying, but he held it first to the blue, trembling lips of the mother. She tasted, but could not drink.

"What is to be done?" said Mr. Haldane. "I fear there is something more the matter than even hunger. She must be got under shelter at once, for the rain will soon be through the roof here," and he looked up at the thick pine-boughs, already fringed with drops.

"There's an empty biggin (small building) not far from here," said Peggy. "Let me go and find Tammas: he keeps his tools and seeds there," she explained.

"I shall have you worn out before half the work is done," he replied, "if you run up and down that steep brae much oftener. Could we not take her there at once, and then I could leave her and send the doctor—that is, if you are willing to take so much responsibility, Miss Oglivie," he added, as if for the first time conscious of her individuality.

"I will take it," said Peggy, quickly.

Then Mr. Haldane, with her husband's help, proceeded to raise the woman from the ground, and to wrap her in Peggy's plaid. She could not stand, much less walk.

So they twisted the ends of the long plaid round their necks, and, having set her in the midst of it, lifted her up between them and bore her gently on. Peggy went before with the baby, and the husband followed after with the second child, now quite pacified, in his arms.

By the time Mr. Haldane struck into the road again the people were once more on the move. They had not exhausted the possibilities of Strathie, as Miss Luckie predicted, but the superior advantages of Burnside had been rapidly circulated among them, and thither they were on their way. There they would probably insist on settling down in a body, and in that case what was to be done? This was the problem which Mr. Haldane was called in to solve. There was no such thing as a workhouse in Burnside, or in any of the neighbouring parishes, where they might be received for a time; and, for the purpose of forcible ejectment, there was no power whatever at the command of the inhabitants of that or the neighbouring villages. The only representative of law in the place was a superannuated sheriff's officer and part of a perambulating policeman.

David Haldane was prepared for the difficulty of dealing with a set of people, stiff-necked and rebellious by nature, and made more obstinate and unreasonable by their sufferings. Happily, he was just the sort of man to whom they were inclined to yield. He had upon him, in feature and in person, the stamp of a leader and commander of the people. His look of authority had in it nothing of the irritating element of self-will, sure to provoke the opposition it is bent on putting down.

"The first thing is to get them under cover," he said to Collin, "or we shall have the whole batch of them laid up. Let them follow us up to the works, and we'll get them into the new shed, and see what can be done with them."

Collin gave the word, and then went on with his master, the whole tribe, to the number of forty at least, following behind.

CHAPTER XX.

DEATH IN THE BIGGIN.

DAVID HALDANE had not forgotten to send the doctor to the poor woman: it was not his habit to forget; but the doctor had forgotten to come. It was the morning of the next day before he visited the hovel, and Peggy Oglivie was there before him.

But the Highlandman had come up to the house in the morning, looking more worn and haggard than before, to tell his benefactress that even on the comfortable bed provided for her, his poor wife had not slept, but had tossed, moaning and in pain, while he had vainly tried to hush the wailing of the infant. He had carried away his own and the child's breakfast, and having dispatched hers, Peggy had hastened after him with a jug full of warm tea for his wife.

When the doctor entered, the man was sitting with the infant on his knee, and Peggy was kneeling beside the woman, coaxing her to drink a little from the cup which she was holding to her lips. The woman swallowed a few mouthfuls, and then fell back upon her pillow of straw, and Peggy rose to meet the man of medicine.

She explained to him, at second hand, what the poor creature had suffered throughout the night—the pains in the head and back, and burning thirst, which her husband had detailed to Jean. The doctor stooped to examine her, and, as he rose from that brief examination, pronounced the one word—"Fever!"

"Typhus," added he, as if in answer to a question he had put to himself. Then glancing at Peggy, whom he knew by sight—"No place for you, Miss Oglivie," he said; "fever highly infectious. Woman will probably die."

Luckily, the poor people did not understand a word of this speech.

"Shall you see Mr. Haldane to-day?" inquired Peggy. She had already more faith in him than in a host of doctors.

"Yes," he answered, abruptly. "Shall be down his way; had better see him, and tell him to send up some of her clan to nurse her. Better leave them now."

And with this the doctor, whose seeming carelessness shocked his listener, hurried away, full of real anxiety both for patient and nurse. His horse was tied to a tree at the foot of the hill, and he mounted and rode straight to the print-work. He found that David Haldane had been at work betimes among his people. Half of the immigrants had been sent off on the previous afternoon in one of the great covered carts belonging to the works, much comforted by his assurance, that there was nothing to hinder them from seeing their friends again. The remainder had been accommodated for a night in the shed, with beds of clean straw and packing. This morning they had been sumptuously breakfasted on porridge and buttermilk, and the manager had already chosen a site for their cottages, and looked out material wherewith to build them—viz., turf, wood, and stones from an old dyke. With such help as they could get among the other workers, the men were to build themselves sheltering roofs, under the superintendence of David Haldane.

David Haldane had to go about his ordinary business that morning, but Miss Oglivie, and the danger to which she was exposed, was seldom out of his mind. As soon, therefore, as he could get away he mounted his horse and rode over to Delaube.

He had never been there before, but was prepared to find the place something of a wilderness. He entered at the front entrance, but no one met or greeted him. The neighing of his horse at the gate, to which he had fastened him, made him aware of the exceeding stillness. He crossed the hall and entered a room. It was the ordinary sitting-room of Peggy and her grandfather; but no one was there. There was every sign of habitation, but no inhabitant. And there came upon David Haldane, for the first time in his life, that sense of dreaminess and enchantment which was so large an element in the life of Peggy Oglivie.

Seeing no one, he went round to the back of the house and stood in the kitchen doorway. An old man sat and smoked by a smouldering fire, and looked up as his figure darkened the doorway.

"Can I see Miss Oglivie?" said David Haldane, frankly.

"Oo, aye! Come in an' wait a wee. Mr. Oglivie has na' been able to get up the day. He's very queer. But she'll be doon or lang. The wife's oot, or she would fess her till ye. Come awa' ben."

With that the old man rose and hobbled through the house, dragging the visitor through the central sanctities of kitchen and pantry, back into the parlour, into which he had already peeped.

"I am glad you have come," Peggy said, simply, as she entered the room; "and I hope I have not kept you waiting. I fear the poor woman is very ill," she added, gravely.

Her whole tone was grave to sadness, and the embarrassment which was rising in the young man's manner at her entrance, disappeared at once.

"I have seen the doctor," he said, "and he tells me there is danger; and I came here to warn you not to expose yourself to it."

"I am not at all afraid," she answered, quietly. "Besides, the harm, if any, is done already; and I have been asking grandpapa if I may have the little one up here for a few days, till her mother is better. Jean will help to nurse the poor mother. She is with her at present, and I promised to relieve her."

"Then, if you will show me the way, I will go with you," he said. "I do not believe much in infection myself, especially if one is quite without fear, and in perfect health. I know the way round," he added; "but perhaps we had better go the way you went and came so quickly yesterday."

"It is very steep."

He smiled. "I think I can keep my feet."

She took a little scarf of black silk and put it over her head, pinning it under her chin. "I am quite ready," she said.

He bowed, and she went on before him. Round the house and to the foot of the garden he followed her, and into the little zigzag path among the trees, where she looked back to see that he was coming.

At the bottom of the path they came upon the biggin, where Peggy entered, while her companion found himself obliged to stand at the door, as the space within was already more crowded than was convenient. The woman lay still in her corner, where Jean had managed to put up a sort of screen. The latter was engaged in trying to feed the infant, and addressing remonstrances in Gaelic to the poor man, who was seated on the little table, rocking himself to and fro with a moaning sort of murmur.

"Has the doctor sent up the woman's medicine?" asked Mr. Haldane from the doorway.

"That he has," said Jean. "She quieter since she had it; but this bairn's very ill indeed; it's been out o' ae fit intil anither the whole morning."

With that Jean looked down into her lap, where the child lay tucked into her apron. "Good preserve's, its deid!" she exclaimed; and throwing her apron hurriedly over the face of the infant, she came out into the doorway, from which Mr. Haldane stepped back, and then into the open air, followed by Peggy.

Here Jean again uncovered the little face, upon which the unmistakable seal was already set. "I maun tell the father," said Jean, "and he's sure to raise a terrible wulla wae" (wail).

"Bring him out here," said David Haldane. "Stay; I will," he added; and going into the hut, he laid his hand kindly on the man's shoulder, and signified his wish that he should come outside.

True enough, as soon as Jean, in a few words of his native tongue, informed him that the babe was dead, he lifted up his voice and wept.

"He had better not tell her what has happened till she misses the child," said David Haldane; "and I suppose we had better go."

"Ay; ye can do little good here," replied the old woman, unceremoniously; "nor you either," she said, turning to Peggy, who stood pale and sorrowful a little aside, having looked in the face of death for the first time.

At length the patients were pronounced out of danger, and began to gain strength. The new cottages down in the village were built and tenanted, and a huge, great fire was kept up in one that still remained empty, in order that it might be dry enough for entry. The pair were about to be removed from the biggin, and with them all further pretexts for David Haldane's visits to Delaube.

It was to announce that everything was ready for that removal that he rode over, for the last time, so he bethought himself. As on the occasion of his first visit, he had to find his way in, and, somehow, his step was not so bold. It might be fear of intruding on the invalid that made him turn aside without entering the room, and go round to inquire of Jean. But when he looked in at the open door, instead of Jean, there was Peggy standing with her back to him in the act of tossing a cake, to take off the loose meal before carrying it to the girdle; and opposite to her, set up on the dresser to be out of harm's way, the other little child, stretching out her hands for the portion which had been too hot for her, and which Peggy had set up to cool.

The child had seen him enter, and desisted from her importunity to stare at him, and Peggy, following the movement, turned on him almost at the same moment. She smiled a welcome. "I cannot shake hands with you," she said. "You see how busy we are."

David looked at the sweet face flushed with the warm work, and thought he would like to try another form of salutation; but he only blushed—a very unusual thing with him—and went over to the child and kissed it instead. Then he began to tell her about the removal, and she went on with her baking, while he leant on the dresser with one arm round the child.

He had often seen the operation before, but it had never occurred to him to think it graceful. Rough red arms and hands plunging among moistened meal, though scrupulously clean, were not very pretty; but every movement of those slender-arms and rosy palms seemed grace itself. Cake after cake she turned out, rounding each on the board with a rapid movement of the hands clasped one above the other, till the circle seemed as perfect as if made by a pair of compasses. He watched how dexterously she tossed the thin, brittle round, and cut it into quarters, and conveyed it unbroken to the girdle, and was sorry when it came to an end, and she looked up with a tired flush and a little sigh of weariness.

David Haldane was not slow to notice these.

"You are tired," he said. "Why do you do this? I suppose it is hard work for one who is not accustomed to it."

"I do it because I must, just now," she answered; "Jean is laid up to-day. Poor Jean! she is getting old and frail. All my life she has been working for me, and now it is my turn to work for her. But I really like work," she added.

After a little pause, he said, "I do not think you have ever been over the works. Would you like to see them some day?"

"Very much," she answered. "I have often heard Jean speak of them, and how pretty it was to see the rows of girls sitting at the long tables painting the webs of cambric with camel's-hair brushes."

"That must have been before my time even. All the processes have changed since then. I fear you will be disappointed if you expect to find anything pretty now-a-days; but you will come and see?"

She promised; and soon after he took his leave and rode back to Burnside in a very different mood from that in which he had ridden from it. The very horse beneath him seemed to have felt a lighter weight, for he swept on as if, for the first time in his life, he was riding for pleasure, and not for business.

There are times when marked events take place in our lives, and change their aspect suddenly and sharply. At other times, we are busy with something which seems quite outside of them, and go gliding on, till at length we look up and become aware that we have drifted into a new position, that nothing about us is the same as it was, that nothing for us will ever be precisely the same again.

The latter experience had come to Peggy Oglivie. She had glided down the stream in childish playfulness; she had lapsed in girlish fancy into a beautiful dreamland; and when, with a sudden shock, she was brought up on the shore of reality, all that had made up her past was receding out of view. She was no longer the child of that aged household, but its mistress, to whom it must look for help and guidance. Her youth had lasted but a single summer, and, because of the links that were missing between the generations, the cares of later life fell on her heavily, as they fall on all who stand in such a lot.

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—III.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

CYRIL THE CARELESS.

"CAN quite think that Uncle Cyril deserved to be called 'the Careless,' grandmamma," said Edith Everley, taking her customary seat beside her grandmamma, to listen to the tale; "for when he comes to see us now, mamma does scold him, and tells him she shall pity his wife when he has one."

"Yes, love," answered grandmamma; "I fear he has never mastered his prevailing sin. No childish punishment had ever power to make him remember, for more than a moment, and all the evil I saw through my glasses when he was only a child has come to pass in his manhood. A short time ago he lost an excellent appointment through his carelessness. But with his present life we have nothing now to do: I am going to tell you of his childhood. He is buying now dearly his own experience, and wishing, as too many do, he had listened to his mother's warnings.

"He was naturally from his birth destructive and careless. He broke more toys and destroyed more clothes than all the nursery put together, and was more often in mischief and punishment. The nurse, who, as I have told you, almost worshipped your papa, was sadly plagued when this new inmate of her nursery began to run about. She dared put nothing out of her hand, but his busy, restless fingers were into it. He was as inquisitive as a raven; and not only did he want to see things, but he had a desire to taste them also. Everything went into his mouth; till, as poor nurse said, he was never safe, and she was never easy about him, until he was in bed and asleep, and that sleep was generally not effected until he had disturbed the little tidy cot in which he had been laid, and precipitated pillow, blankets, sheets, and quilt on to the floor, and had flung himself, with his head at the foot of the cot, on the bare sacking, busily talking to himself in his own baby language, whilst he made this novel arrangement for a night's rest; and having accomplished it, after many scuffles with the under-nurse, who came to put him tidy at least a dozen times, he finally, with a sigh of relief, would say 'There!' and be asleep in a moment.

"His dislike to wearing-apparel was as great as to bed-clothes, for he never would keep on his shoes and socks, or his hat; and poor nurse has often cried when, having dressed him in his best, and sat him down for a moment to dress herself, she has found the cockade torn from his hat, in an effort to get the hat off, and the buttons off one or both of his shoes, by pulling at them to disembarass his feet of these encumbrances.

"He was a fine, strong, handsome child, and could carry things which many children of his age could scarcely lift; and fancy nurse's terror one day when, expecting visitors, she had dressed him nicely in a spotless white frock, to see him coming along the nursery, carrying the large black tea-kettle, which he deposited on the carpet at her feet, with that triumphant 'There!' which was the word he always used, with an accent of perfect satisfaction, at the termination of his mischievous performances. These traits of disposition in his baby-days led me to expect he would always be, what nurse declared he was—'a handful;' and he certainly has been.

"As he grew older, and had presents of books and toys, like the other children, his were always at once lost or destroyed. He would stamp on a thing on the ground, rather than pick it up; and the loss or destruction of even his most valued possession never appeared to affect him in the least. He would borrow what he wanted from the others, and then lose it, consoling the children with the assurance that he would pay them when he had any money, which he certainly did, even to the last penny he had. He was as reckless and indifferent about money as about everything else. He only valued it as far as it procured him any present indulgence, and he spent it all the moment he had it, if he did not first lose it.

"One thing I must do him the justice to say, he spent his money with equal lavishment on others as on himself. He delighted in giving presents, and was thoroughly good-natured, as he still is. Since he has been grown up, he has given away a handsome gun, a present from his godfather, to a young friend; and when I remonstrated with him, he only answered, 'Well, the poor chap had not one, and was asked to shoot in the moors. I shall get another, some day, I dare say, and I can always borrow dad's.'

"That which tired my patience with him more than anything, was his losing everything. He was very fond of drawing, and, glad to encourage him in any useful, quiet occupation, I set him up with pencils, india-rubber, paper, and everything I thought he would want. Only a few days after, I had brought a book into the schoolroom to read aloud to the children whilst they drew and worked; but I was continually interrupted by a whispered request from Cyril to his brother Philip. At length I inquired what it was he so continually asked for.

"My india-rubber, mamma,' answered Philip, 'and he never passes it back again; it is such a bore.'

"Where is your own, Cyril?' I asked.

"I don't know, mamma; Maude had it last.'

"Of course this was indignantly denied, and a war of words would have succeeded, had I not stopped it by desiring Cyril to leave off drawing until the india-rubber was found; but as he hated the trouble of searching for anything, I gained little peace by this suggestion; for he only wandered about the room, upsetting things, and causing exclamations of dismay from his sisters at an overturned workbox, or paintbox, so that I was obliged to order him to sit still, and do nothing. Before the work was ended, everything I had so carefully provided for his amusement was lost or destroyed, and the missing india-rubber, which he so persisted was last in Maude's possession, was returned by the laundress, who had found it in his pocket. He was never, by any chance, fit to be seen; his laces had always lost their tags, and were hanging about his heels; the buttons off his waistcoat; his knees through his trousers; and the brim off his hat so that it was impossible to take him anywhere with me, without having him re-dressed from top to toe.

"There came, one day, to the neighbouring town a grand circus, which had been for some time advertised as about to appear, and the children all hoped to be allowed to go and see it; but no promise had been given them that they should, and they had, I believe, nearly forgotten it, when one morning, soon after breakfast, Uncle Roger arrived in his carriage, and said that all little ones wanting to see the circus were to jump into the carriage at once, and come off with him. All the children were at play in the garden, and I ran out to tell them they were to come just as they were. Uncle Roger said he could not wait for any dressing, as he had to run up to London on business, and he should go to the station from the show, and send them home in the carriage. My heart misgave me about Cyril, and my worst fears were confirmed when I saw him; at each knee hung a festoon of cloth; the peak of his cap hung over his left ear, where he had pushed it, that it should not interfere with his sight; one elbow was clean through the jacket; and his hands and face were caked with mud; he had been constructing a mud-hut he said. However, it was hopeless thinking of his going to the circus, and the other children went without him, leaving him, poor child, with his muddy knuckles rubbing the tears out of his eyes. I was very sorry for him; but I hoped the lesson might be of service. Alas! no; his sorrow over, he forgot it and its cause, and was the same untidy, dirty boy the next day.

"A more serious misfortune, however, soon followed on this, and did, I think, make more impression. It was during holiday-time—he was a big boy, between eleven and twelve—his father had forgotten to pay a small sum into the bank, to a fund of which he was treasurer, and without consulting me, or I should have told him it was dangerous, he bid Cyril take it. It was sealed up in a small packet, which he tossed to the boy, telling him to run off with it, and tell the manager who sent it, and he would know all about it. Away went Cyril, whistling to his dog to follow him, and we could see him, as he crossed the fields, throwing sticks for Nip to fetch, and peering up into the trees and hedges for birds' nests, which he delighted, like a boy, to capture. I saw him from my window, but did not know what errand he was on; he often went across the fields into the town to buy something for himself. Finding him back in the schoolroom at tea-time, I asked no questions, until I noticed his eyes were very red, and that his sister Maude kept whispering something very earnestly to him. I then asked what was the matter; but he turned away his face, and did not answer; and then Maude said—

“‘I don’t care, Cyril, I’ll tell mamma if you won’t; for something must be done.’”

“‘Be quiet, Maude; you shan’t,’ he said, springing forward and putting his hand before her mouth.

“‘Nonsense, Cyril,’ I said. ‘What is it? Tell me directly. Who ought to know your troubles, if not your mother?’ With all his faults, poor boy, he loved me dearly; and, passionately excited as he was, these words calmed him.

“‘I’ll tell you myself, then; Maude shan’t.’”

“‘I don’t wish to, Cyril,’ she said, ‘if you will. But, mamma dear, you won’t let papa be angry with him?’”

“Dreading, yet longing, to hear what he had done, I entreated for an explanation. And then he told me he had lost the money. He wanted to buy a stick for his dog, and had put the parcel in his pocket, and, as a matter of course, the pocket was torn. He had gone back every step of the way he came; but in vain, it was not to be found. At once I sent out the garden-boy to help him in a fresh search, but it was fruitless; and on his father’s return, there was no help but to tell him. He was very angry, of course; sent him supperless to bed; and stopped his weekly allowance until the money was paid, which of course kept him without pocket-money all the next half at school. At first he was very penitent; but that feeling soon wore off; and he only continued to say he could not help having a hole in his pocket.”

“Poor Uncle Cyril!” said Edith; “how frightened he must have been when he got to the bank and found the money was gone. I wonder it did not make him for ever afterwards as tidy—as tidy: if it was in a story-book it would say so, wouldn’t it, granny?”

“Well, perhaps it might, my dear; but I must own it had but small effect on my poor boy, and that he is still Cyril the Careless.”

THE WIFE

WRONG ON BOTH SIDES.

BY JOHN G. WATTS, AUTHOR OF “PICTURES OF ENGLISH LIFE,” “TALES AND SONGS,” ETC.

CHAPTER I.

“DEAD!” exclaimed Robert Hartwell, with anguish depicted in the most terrible characters upon his youthful face, as he sprang into his father’s bed-chamber.

“Dead! dead!” echoed his mother, a lady barely of mid-life, but on whom care had prematurely imprinted many a sign and mark of age.

“Dead! dead!” sobbed his sister, tenderly kissing the yet warm cheek, that never more on earth should turn lovingly to hers.

"Oh, poor, poor father!" groaned the young man, following his sister in the sad embrace.

A hush now fell upon all, so far as words were concerned; but the three mingled their tears and ill-suppressed sobs, in the saddest, truest union. A gentle tap came at the door; Robert, who could scarcely have been nineteen, opened it. The servant handed him a letter. As he caught sight of the superscription, a change passed across his face, a reproachful curl stole to his lip, and he cast the missive aside.

"Cruel, cruel, man!" he murmured: "by the smallest reach of generosity from you, our beloved father had been spared to us."

"Hush, Robert!" interposed the newly-made widow. "God's will be done."

An hour afterwards, that letter was returning to its sender, unopened, and no intimation accompanying it, of what had so recently happened.

That the reader may understand why, at such a moment, Robert Hartwell could evince feelings to draw down the rebuke of his mother, it will be necessary to give a little of the family's former history.

Robert Hartwell, Senior, had, till within a couple of years of his decease, been exceedingly well to do. Combining the business of ironmonger with that of saddler, he had gradually accumulated a considerable sum of money, and was looked upon as one of the most prosperous tradesman in the town of which he was a denizen, and which, by the way, was one of the largest in the West of England.

One day a fox-hunting gentleman-farmer, who was a good customer, came to him with a plausible story, and succeeded in borrowing a large sum of money on his own personal security. When the hour for repayment arrived, the cash was not forthcoming, and soon afterwards he suddenly collapsed. Everything was mortgaged so deeply that he could not meet the interest. As a consequence, ruin had ensued. Within a week the wretched creature was found dead in a copse near his abode, and a discharged pistol in his hand told the terrible story of self-murder. The blast which overthrew his house, brought misery about the ears of the man who had befriended him. The latter being strictly honourable, gave up all he possessed, paid his creditors fourteen shillings in the pound, and began business afresh, hoping at no distant date to be able to hand them over the remainder.

Somehow, his honesty did not produce the effect it should have done, and he found great difficulty in getting his credit renewed, even in the feeblest degree. Mrs. Hartwell's unmarried brother, a wealthy farmer in Kent, was appealed to; but he was found very slow to respond. Though far from ungenerous as a youth, maturity had brought a change over him. He had grown to like money for its own sake.

It is by no means a difficult thing to save, provided we can blind our eyes to the calls of duty and the claims of humanity. Success had been poison to this man's better nature; he was too much inclined to attribute want of success in others to want of care. "Look at me!" was too frequently upon his lips, quite ignoring the source from whom all blessings flow. No wonder, then, when appealed to for the loan of a few hundreds, until confidence and credit should once more smile upon the late insolvent, that his reply was anything but comforting.

For some time he steadily refused to advance a single penny. "My advice," he wrote, "is, leave the town in which you have made such a terrible blunder, go to some place where you are not known, and begin business again in a smaller way. Doubtless, by care and industry, the lost ground may yet be recovered."

In return, it was urged that, with such a well-established business in their hands, to run away were suicidal.

After a great deal of begging, the Kentish farmer was induced to advance a hundred pounds. The money was soon exhausted in the purchase of materials and wares, and long before the yearly bills could be sent out, the Hartwells were sorely aground again. All kinds of shifts were made with a view to tiding over the evil day. Bessie went out and taught French and music, while Robert obtained a situation in a lawyer's office, whereby he earned a few shillings a week. He had only just completed his education, which had been conducted with an idea to his going into the medical profession. All was unavailing, materials and goods grew scant, and if anybody did trust the struggling man a trifle, inferior articles were supplied at high prices. As a consequence, customers began to complain and trade to desert his counter. Appeals were again made to John Giles, Mrs. Hartwell's brother, but to little purpose. In reply, he hinted his belief that Mr. Hartwell was fonder of his glass than was good for his till. The poor fellow, who never entered a tavern, and did not take a glass of ale in a month, bowed his head and shed tears.

"Never mind, dear; look up," said his wife, laying her hand gently on his shoulder.

"I should be sorely off now, Patty, if I could not look up," returned the afflicted man, "up to that One who tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb."

A few weeks afterwards, with love and forgiveness upon his lips, he sank into the embrace of death.

CHAPTER II.

A DAY or two after the funeral, Mrs. Hartwell took counsel with her children upon what had better be done for their future living. The result was, a resolution to quit the town in which they had known so much misfortune, and go up to London. In that Babylon they would be able to shift and struggle, unknown and free of prying eyes. After selling off the greater portion of the furniture, and calling in a few outstanding accounts, they started for the metropolis.

Obtaining a suite of apartments in the neighbourhood of Islington, the little furniture they had brought up was set out to the best advantage, and an announcement was made by means of a brass plate, that the educational opportunities of the neighbourhood had been increased: "Establishment for Young Ladies" were the exact words.

Robert was not less ready than his mother and sister, for the morning that witnessed the affixing of the plate, saw him set out in search of employment. Not liking law work, he determined on making application among the merchants and larger traders. He was surprised that everybody he addressed could tell he was just up from the country, and discomfited to find himself rebuffed on every hand. When he reached home that afternoon, his mother and sister were ready to meet him, and full of anxious, tender inquiries; and, though he put the best face upon his day's adventures, yet for all that, they could see he was disappointed; therefore both strove to cheer him as best they might. The next day, and the next, brought no better fortune to him, nor did the academy prosper at anything like the rate its proprietors had expected.

Strung to increased exertion, Robert trod in all quarters to obtain employ, including even attorneys' offices. As the little stock of money swiftly melted away, his anxiety grew more intense. From applying for a clerk's place, he got to asking for a situation as warehouseman; and at last, so desperate became affairs, that he was glad to offer himself as a porter. Now they began to fall behind in their rent, and in a little while were politely requested to suit themselves elsewhere. Suiting themselves was not the most difficult task: it was suiting other people that gave them trouble. Few liked the idea of a school being kept on their premises; and, more than that, the applicants were unmistakable marks of broken-down respectability.

At last, after much difficulty, they were admitted into a small house, which had been tenantless many months. There were evidences of damp about its walls, and other appearances not calculated to attract; but the unfortunate family were really glad of any shelter. No sooner did they begin to light fires for the purpose of drying the rooms, than they found, to their horror, the damp increase. Perspirations broke out on every bit of plaster, and unpleasant odours found their way into every apartment. The chimneys all smoked—that is, they did not smoke half enough, but seemed to delight in ejecting into the rooms that which they were constructed to carry over the roof. Once more the plate announcing the "Establishment for Young Ladies" was displayed. It seemed such a satire upon the neighbourhood, that it was hardly to be wondered nobody came to inquire terms. Finally, and as a last resource, the two women were compelled to seek needlework at a slop-shop hard by. Colds and coughs, as the winter closed in, became the common lot, and yet they dare not complain, for already they were behind again with their rent. Bessie kept up her spirits, or appeared to do so, even when both Robert and her mother were inclined to despond. One by one, every little article that could be at all dispensed with, was carried to the broker's and sold, and Robert was fretting and starving himself into mere a shadow.

Things had arrived at this terrible pass when, one evening, he returned with a smile on his face and tears in his eyes. He had obtained temporary employment, and it might lead to something better. His clothes by this had grown very, very worn, but to-day they bore marks about them—let us not call such stains, for the soilings of honest labour are as much decorations of honour as are the strife-rents in a warrior's banner—which they had never known before.

"Thank God!" exclaimed Mrs. Hartwell, devoutly; and both she and Bessie caught him in a hearty embrace. They always gave him a hearty embrace when he came home, but if they were a little more demonstrative this particular evening, it was not from any selfish motive, but from pure rejoicing at the gladness he evidently felt; and at the peace which they knew his anxious heart must experience at the fact of having his prospects of helping them increased.

"Now, I trust," said the gentle Bessie, pushing him into a chair by the fire, "we shall hear no more about your living upon us, you naughty boy."

"Oh, no," he replied, gleefully. Then placing one shilling and ninepence on the table, "There! that's my day's wage!"

"And where and how did you earn it, Bob?" asked the girl, pouring out a cup of tea from the pot, which had been kept for him on the hob, and handing him some bread without any butter.

"I'll tell you in a moment."

"Oh, you can eat and talk too, though it is ill mannered. I don't want you to leave off eating, for you must want something, after all that hard work; but I'm so anxious to know everything, I cannot stop till you've done your tea."

"Well, then," said he, "I've been employed to-day at a wharf in Tooley Street, near London Bridge; I've been helping to remove parcels of goods from one warehouse to another."

Had he told the whole facts of the case, he would have said that, for the sum of threepence an hour, he had been carrying burdens under which he could hardly stagger, rolling ragged hogsheads that scratched and tore his unused hands; and that he had been the fellow-labourer of some of the rudest and roughest to be found on the south side of London.

In the morning he was away before breakfast, and so on every day to the end of the week, by which time he had earned twelve shillings. Furthermore, he had been ordered to be at the wharf by eight o'clock on the following Monday. In a week or two, Robert's superior manner—already he had got nick-named the "Swell Porter"—attracted the notice of one of the foremen, and in the end he was taken into regular employment at a salary of fifteen shillings a week. His mother and sister also began to prosper somewhat. They had found work at a large West-end baby-linen establishment. Mrs. Hartwell and her daughter could now earn four times as much in a day as formerly, and without working so long by three hours.

The wretched house wherein they had been existing, combined with the meagre diet they had so long been compelled to make shift with, had by this begun to tell upon the health of all three. Robert, by denying himself everything he possibly could do without, had greatly assisted in the reduction of their debt of rent. At length the last farthing was paid up, and at once they set about seeking more healthy accommodation. The deadly exhalations amid which they had so long been living, had done their work too surely, for while they were actually in treaty for lodgings, typhus smote mother and son in one hour. Bessie, in her distress, did all that she could—fetched a doctor, who, seeing how affairs stood, advised the instant removal of both patients to the Fever Hospital, and herself to another abode. The poor girl at first pleaded hard not to be separated from those who were so dear to her, but, when the medical man informed her that nothing but the hospital could possibly save them, then she dried up her tears, and set zealously about promoting their departure.

PAIN.

BESIDES the business, the pleasure, and the rest, which seem to share life between them, how large a portion of its time and strength is given to that universal claimant, pain—pain of body or of mind; suffering, whether from disease or accident, or remorse, or fear, or satiety. Pain, in some form or another, is inevitable; but it is more than inevitable, it is advantageous; it is more than advantageous, it is necessary: and the question is, not merely how we may suffer least, but how we may profit most.

If we analyse our own individual experience, we shall find the strange fact, that it is not by shrinking from every possibility or appearance of pain that we can in reality and ultimately encounter least; not by a natural flying from it in every case, as from something unnatural, but by a voluntary endurance, and even search for it in not a few instances, by a utilising, and, so to speak, a culture of it in many. The unforced payment of a small tribute to this universal king, not only bribes him from further extortion, but often buys from him an almost total immunity. But it must be done in a reasonable time and manner. He must be met half way, and propitiated with early offerings. "It is good for a man that he bears the yoke in his youth." If we seek the reason for this state of things, we merely peer vainly into darkness that hides the origin of all things; we are asking idle questions of God himself. It is worse than folly to trouble ourselves as to that which is inevitably hidden, and which, probably, we are incapable of perceiving, even if it should present itself before us.

To make good our theory as to pain anticipated and cultured, we have but to call to mind the pains of self-denial, of active benevolence, of martyrdom; the pains of curative and preservative measures for health of body and mind; the pains of toil and hardship for the bread we eat, the knowledge, the art, the society we enjoy. This pain or sorrow is not to be found equally distributed in the acquisition or possession of these good things. Like health, and wealth, and happiness, it has no dead level amongst men, or even for the man; but yet the black thread is to be seen constantly, here and there and everywhere, in the warp and woof of the wonderful texture of life. However vulgar and petty in some of its lowest details, it is a strange and awful fact that this giant of wrong, of sin, of pain, broods over all our beautiful earth, and has even cast his shadow on the heavens and slain the Son of God himself. Strange and awful, but we must even face it to the end, till at last we rise and leave it in the dust of forgetfulness and death.

adversity;" and, although there are ills in which we cannot see anything that is not bitter, his words convey a great truth. We learn, or we might learn, from this sad teacher to be patient; to be strong; to bear with our fellows in our common disease; to put our trust and hope in something above the calamities of the world; to find a footing for our interests and affections in that which is not weak and slippery like the common ways of life. All this has been written for us, and preached to us, over and over again. The beauty of self-denial, too, for the sake of others, is apparent in all history, and most apparent in the greatest of all histories. But we do not so readily perceive that there is a self-denial which is necessary for our own sakes, and that there are pains and troubles and dangers which we should anticipate, in order best to grapple with them. A man may have a limb so injured or diseased, that his future safety or happiness can be found only in its sacrifice. This involves present inconvenience, pain, danger; but he does not hesitate. So it is with many of the ordinary concerns of life, and so it is pre-eminently with our higher hopes and possibilities. Life, in this light, is one grand self-sacrifice; not the sacrifice of blood to make atonement; not the apparent sacrifice of a man who gives up something good that he may thereby buy something better; but the sacrifice of a man who puts away with pain something—whether it be a possession, or a sentiment, or an indulgence, or an affection—which stands in the path to something the superior grandeur or truth of which invites him further forward.

What is that which we have been told?—"It is better to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire." And again: "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it." And do we not hear elsewhere, in the same Divine language, that we must pass through pain here, which is no means of purgatory, nor of propitiation, but is, nevertheless, the necessary medium of perfection? Even to that broken perfection which is to be found now and then in our experience here, there is no path which is not shadowed more or less with sorrow. The spirit must be sublimed in a fiery crucible; the metal beaten out with hot and cruel strokes. It is hard to speak of this matter—the most practical in the world—except in figurative language, because it comes to us in such diverse and sometimes subtle details,—it spreads itself so broadly over life, and pervades it with such a mysterious power, that we cannot represent it in its entirety, except by an illustration. But there is one general and marked result which we may easily describe as following pain and sorrow, that is, the breaking up of the ordinary routine of pleasure and desire by something which is connected with error and infirmity, and even death, and should therefore call these to mind, if they have been long unthought of. Whatever we suffer, from the pang of toothache to the loss of the dearest friend, is significant of the decay and the incompleteness of all which now surrounds us. Whether our pain be the result of our folly or our misfortune, we alike learn that man is not intended to attain here to the most perfect happiness, and that he must look for the gratification of his better hopes and capacities to something beyond death. Still more, there is a rational self-denial which lives in the spirit of such an expectation, such a faith; and the pains which it inflicts are often scarcely felt in the intensity of that spirit. And as the practice of this self-denial grows into a habit; as men, in the contest between principle and passion, learn constantly to mortify the one that the other may live, so their reward, however far, becomes nearer, more tangible, and even present, and the pain itself becomes less.

But there is a self-denial which is irrational—a fanatic asceticism, or self-torture of some kind or other—which we must carefully distinguish from the other. Indeed, there is scarcely a false religion on the earth which does not prescribe its purgatory for its devotees: not saying, Strive after such a virtue, and give up such a vice, no matter what pain it may cost; but, For such a sin, submit to such a penalty, that it may be washed from the list that stands against your soul—for such a pardon give so many pounds sterling, so many drops of blood, so many repetitions of a prayer, so many years of moral and mental and physical suicide. Such credulity may be dying out now, but it has numbered its victims by millions.

The liability to pain is a gift to us for the preservation of both mind and body—a sentinel who stands on guard over us when we are ignorant or careless of danger. He rarely betrays his post; but there are occasions when his warnings must be disregarded. The happiest man is not he who has experienced the least pain, but he whose pain and pleasure alike have produced the happiest results. Opposed as these two are, they combine to form in him a unity of purpose and action. In the light of the faith of Christ, they are not two wild principles let loose upon the earth to drive men at their pleasure, but guides which, if truly followed, will lead towards the right path. They can, indeed, when alone, teach man but little of the truth which it is expedient that he should know; but, within certain limits, they are just safeguards from error. Pleasure, indeed, is fearfully abused amongst men; but the avenging pain is sure to follow, not so much in anger, after all, as in mercy. Pain is thus the faithful lieutenant of God upon earth, and ceases not to perform its office till the last moment of existence has closed the door upon repentance for ever. It is one of the most difficult, as well as the most important, functions of faith to recognise in its proper sphere this great agency of pain; to see it as the minister of God upon earth, and to receive it as such—awful as it sometimes seems, and red-handed with the murder of the innocents. And the light of faith is, after all, the only light in which we can look on it with any hope and comfort. No suggestion of philosophy has ever resolved to man's satisfaction the mystery of this world's troubles; no precept of philosophy, however truly followed, has armed us completely for the encounter. As science can trace from the wound the path of the messenger of pain, but stays upon the threshold of the sentient spirit itself, so it can follow a system and a Providence through the dark and the winding ways of the world's history, but must pause before that sacred source which is enshrined in eternal mystery. OUR SOCIAL BEES; OR, WILLING WORKERS.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, F.R.S.L.

EMOCRITUS is reported to have said, "More are made good by exercitation than by nature." The famous Greek was right. We have heard of rare geniuses that could be profound in judgment without reflection, exact in figures without calculation, elegant in composition without practice, and eloquent in speech without preparation. But we have been fortunate enough to meet with only one who professed such extraordinary powers; and that rara avis was very short-lived. Being weak in the wings, from want of practice, he soon fell a prey to the bold, strong, but lawful competition of aspiring industry. Being irritable in difficulty, and impatient for honour, his ten talents were trammelled. Patient persistence has thus often achieved what genius has never essayed; and the earnest worker has retained his well-won place, in the front rank of earth's worthies, long after they who, by a single stride, rose to honour, have ingloriously sunk into oblivion.

"The lamp of genius, though by Nature lit,
If not protected, pruned, and fed with care,
Soon dies, or runs to waste with fitful glare."

This has been recognised by all the gifted men of past days, who succeeded in stamping their character on their own and subsequent generations. "There never was an eminent who was not an industrious man," said Cotton Mather. Dip into the biographies of our great men, and you shall find them, like working bees, with a concentrated purpose seeking the well-being of the colony to which they belong. However conscious of the fertility of their genius, they recognised the necessity of cultivation. However muscular their minds, they could not dispense with the gymnasium. The golden key which opened to them the stores of honour, wealth, or wisdom was work. A celebrated painter once produced a very powerful, though not finished, picture in three days. He asked 100 sequins. The gentleman for whom the artist had executed the work, objected to the sum as being excessive for the work of but three days. "What!" exclaimed the vexed artist, "do you forget that I have been thirty years learning how to make this picture in three days?" We know a London physician who, after receiving his patients during the appointed hours of call, can demand, and does constantly obtain, thirty guineas for a visit of not so many minutes.

But this facility of execution, and fulness of reward are, with very few exceptions, the fruit only of antecedent toil. The men were training for years who by a coup de main have carried off the laurels. Their conquests of an hour have resulted from a lifetime of lonely, patient, unremitting exertion. Sir Joshua Reynolds truly said, "Excellency is not bestowed on man, but as the reward of labour." Look, for example, at Demosthenes, retiring to his subterranean study, copying Thucydides' history eight times to catch the style, and practising speaking with pebbles in his mouth to cure his stammering. Look at Seneca, plodding at his work so that he wrote to a friend and declared, that not a day was allowed to pass without his writing something, or reading and epitomising some good author. Luther preached almost daily, was continually engaged in controversy, carried on a most extensive correspondence, and yet, to the surprise of all Europe, published, among other books, a very fair translation of the Scriptures. Erasmus was "ever on the wing," and yet, by the cautious employment of his time, produced fully a dozen folio volumes of great learning. Milton from boyhood was fond of studious retirement. He seldom quitted his work before the midnight hour; to which late study, doubtless, may be mainly attributed his blindness. Wesley travelled about 5,000 miles in a year, preached on an average three times a day, and wrote tracts and books to the number of two hundred. Sir Matthew Hale, for many years, spent sixteen hours each day in hard study of the law; which, for mental rest, would be varied now and then by mathematics or philosophy. David Hume sat at his desk thirteen hours a day. The distinguished statesman, Charles James Fox, attributed his wonderful success as an orator to his determination to speak once every night during each session of Parliament. The Rev. Charles Simeon, whose published sermons number 2,536, and form twenty-one volumes, was known to recompose the plan of one sermon thirty times; and some of his discourses occupied several days in composition. One of the greatest living preachers was known, in his prime, to spend eight hours each day for four days on one sermon; and a late principal of a Nonconformist college used to advise his students, when starting in ministerial life, to write each sermon carefully six times before preaching it.

These are but a few instances out of many which serve to show that, in literature, art, science, and commerce, it has been by prolonged and patient effort—not by a sudden, startling leap—that the great men of the past and present have taken their permanent positions of influence. Each has been able to say with Wesley, “Leisure and I have long taken leave of each other,” and all have found work the sure path to reward.

But apart from the valuable additions we may make to our social hive—apart from the honour, the influence, the wealth we may acquire as compensation, it should be remembered that work itself is a blessing; that the best wages are in the working. Toil educates the faculties. As physical labour develops the muscles, strengthens the respiratory organs, promotes digestion, and thus confirms the constitution; so mental effort accords grasp to the judgment, tenacity to the memory, and tone to the affections. Nature is industrious. All things around us retain their health by action. The earth is ever changing its aspects; the air is ceaselessly in motion; the sea is restless—nothing is idle.

A sight more joyous than the dead morass?
Do not the skies, with active ether clean,
And fann’d by sprightly zephyrs, far surpass
The foul November fogs, and slumb’rous mass,
With which sad Nature veils her drooping face?
Does not the mountain stream, as clear as glass,
Gay-dancing on, the putrid pool disgrace?
The same in all holds true, but chief in human race.”

Why then should man dream of physical or mental health without industry? Labour is the indispensable condition of preserving a sound mind in a sound body. They are pitiable weaklings who yield to sloth. Counteracting the beneficent law of labour, they become strangers to buoyant health, peaceful relaxation, and refreshing sleep; ay, they pauperise themselves, and defeat the grand object of their creation. The Marquis of Spinola once asked Sir Horace Vere, “of what his brother died?” Sir Horace replied—“He died, sir, of having nothing to do.” “Alas!” said Spinola, “that is enough to kill any general of us all.” We wonder not that Dr. Adam Clarke should say, “The old proverb about having too many irons in the fire is an abominable lie. Have all in—shovel, tongs, and poker!”

One thing is quite certain, that the surest way to be happy is to be employed. There is a Spanish proverb—“The hound that is chasing the game does not feel the fleas;” and the Turks say, “A busy man is troubled with but one devil, but the idle man with a thousand.” We have observed often, that when children, growing tired of their playing, become troublesome, if the parent set each child some trifling task, the little folks are happy. There is no doubt that nine-tenths of the sorrows of life proceed from idleness. Inactivity gives birth to evil thoughts, unwholesome comparisons, murmurings, fears, despondings. No man need be slothful from the want of occupation. The Good Master of the vineyard has given “to every man his work.” He never designed that one son of Adam should be a mere supine spectator of the deeds of his fellows, but assigned a special service to each, and will expect ultimately an ingenuous account from all. Neither need any man look far for his sphere of toil. It lies before him. In the circle in which he moves, however limited, he will find enough to occupy his earnest, solemn, anxious thought. In addition to his lawful worldly engagements, he has self to conquer; a carnal heart to crucify; evil passions, lurking in the recesses of the soul, to subdue; habits, which indulgence has fostered into a second nature, to break off; and sins to be rooted out, which infest the life with the tenacity of weeds which shoot their knotted fibres beneath the surface of the garden. Then there are the young whom he may instruct, the poor whom he may aid, the suffering whom he may comfort; there is the Church to help in its militant struggles with darkness, and his generation to serve. The claims of humanity are too pressing, and the wants of the world too great, to allow any man to be idle. From all parts of the earth we are summoned to action; and happy is that man who, with prompt and unreserved consecration, yields his faculties to the work of the Lord.

All ministers of the Gospel have found indolence one of the most fertile causes of spiritual depression among professing Christians. For your own sake, therefore, reader, as well as for the world’s sake, and the Church’s sake, bestir your energies, be a worker and not a drone!

SECOND LOVE.

SAY good-bye here, for our paths are twain,
 And let us part while we can in love;
 Fear not for me. I have borne the pain,
 Yes, once already! but not again,
 I will hope no bliss but a bliss above.

There was something once :—when the stars come out,
 When I look at the quiet moon alone,
 'Tis only then I dare think about—
 Ah me! but my spirit's joyous shout
 Faded away in a mournful moan.

The Spring came dancing over the plain,
 The birds sang out in their careless mirth,
 The sunshine brightened to mock my pain,
 For I never could be a boy again,—
 Could not be young any more on earth!

Have you ever trodden a path alone,
 That you never trod alone before?
 Ah me! how gloomy all things had grown,
 And yet I talked in my former tone,
 And tried to smile with the smile of yore

Yet what was changed did not pain me so,
 As what mid changes remained the same,
 The laughter that wrings out the heart of woe,
 The same old lights in the sunset glow,
 The very sound of my household name!

And so I walked on my lonely way,
 I did not seek for an idol new:
 But ivy grows when the wall is grey,
 We smell the rose that is withered away;
 From the faded love sprang a love for you!

You smiled upon me—your eye was bright,
 Your cheek was ruddy, and smooth your brow,
 You cast a sunbeam across my night,
 But ever darkening before my sight
 I saw our parting—this parting now!

So say good-bye, for our paths are twain,
 And let us part while we can in love,
 The old can never be young again,
 The young ones smile at the old man's pain,
 But there's neither old nor young above!

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

YOUNG HALDANE AND AULD HALDANE.

DRASS winna grow at his heels," was a frequent saying among the workpeople, concerning their young master—"Young David," as he was more familiarly and affectionately termed by the old folks, who had known him as a lad about the works. The saying might have been applied on the present occasion, by way of metaphor, to the mental process by which he was arriving at certain conclusions. In the course of his ride home, he had settled, as far as he was concerned, the whole course and object of his future life. He gave no time for the growth of those after-thoughts which hinder most people, and lead them to turn aside in the midst of their slowly forming purposes. He was one of the few who know their own minds. He knew that he had seen the one woman whom he could love, and whose love he would care to win; but knowing this, and resolved to win her, if possible, he could possess his mind in patience. The resolute are seldom rash.

If Miss Oglivie had been rich, the heiress of all the lands of Oglivie, he would have resolved to win her all the same. It was not that he thought highly of himself; he never thought of estimating himself at all. By simple force of manhood, he felt that he had a right to win this woman, or any other woman on whom he had set his heart. If she chanced to be set upon a height above him, he must reach the height, that was all; he would not drag her down from wealth and ease, though for himself he valued these so lightly. He would win them, and lay them at her feet. Nevertheless, he was glad that the woman of his choice should know the meaning of poverty and toil. It was all the more joy to win for her what he considered her rightful heritage; and then there would be no portion of his life to which she must needs be a stranger, as he feared there might be, such as their often is in the lives of men who have struggled up, and find no sympathy with their early trials in the hearts of those who are nearest and dearest to them in their later days.

David Haldane the younger had known poverty and dependence himself. He was but the grand-nephew of the old man, who had been separated from his relations during all the earlier portion of his successful career. His father had been carried off by the press-gang, and had died at sea while he was a mere infant, and the widow, with her little son and aged mother to support, had been fain to throw herself on the mercy of her husband's uncle. Old David Haldane had allowed his nephew's widow and child but a small stipend. He had no idea of removing them out of the condition in which he found them. Still, but for him the little household would have starved in the years of famine; and they had plenty in a humble way. Then he took the boy into his service and "had an eye upon him," as he said; and at length he took the mother to keep house for him, which she did till she died.

Under his mother's care, David had received the excellent groundwork of education provided for children of Scotland at the parish school, and as he developed at the works a genius both for mechanics and chemistry, his uncle had sent him into Bleak-town to attend the classes for mathematics and natural philosophy.

According to his own ideas, the old man had not been niggardly toward his relations. He had not used his wealth to raise them into a higher station than that of honest working people. He had not done this for himself. He lived as plainly and dressed as plainly now that he was a large capitalist, the owner of extensive works, the master of some hundreds of workpeople, as ever he did when he carried all his worldly goods on his own square shoulders. Of all his wealth he consumed but a worker's share, sufficient for health and comfort, and no more. In the way in which his fortune had been made he spent it—namely, in extending "the works." The works were to him wife and children, and end and aim—at least, so it appeared to the outward observer. On himself he might grudge to spend; on the works, never. The newest and most expensive improvements in machinery and plant were at once procured. What the works returned to him he returned to them again, and the returns were not single-fold. He had not worked to live: he had lived to work, and seemed to hold his work higher and dearer than life.

Under these circumstances, it had come to pass that, at the age of twenty-eight, David Haldane the younger was not in possession of an independent income. Holding in all respects the place of a son towards his grand-uncle, like him, he belonged to "the works;" and hitherto he had not felt it irksome, that his best energies should be so devoted. Strange as it may seem, he had never before had a longing to lead a life of his own—at least, not since the school-boy days, when he had longed for peril and adventure, and had thoughts of running away to sea. He had inherited his grand-uncle's passion for work, as he had inherited the features of his face.

For the first time in his life a vision of home and wife—of life and a place in the generations, rose before young David Haldane; and he felt the desire for independence. Not that he was in reality a dependent. There was strong and delicate independence in the very fact of his serving his relative as he did, for a mere nominal salary, in the very prime of his strength and usefulness, yielding his whole energy and power to the insatiable works. Had not the old man supported his mother, and her mother, and himself too, and had he not a right to this return? At the same time, the young man knew his own pecuniary value, and that he had long since repaid all the money expenditure which his uncle's kindness had involved. As for the kindness itself, that could only be paid in kind. Now that the time had come when he thought it right to claim an independence, as far as money was concerned, for the sake of his future life, he was still as ready as ever to devote to the service of his uncle much that money might not purchase. That very day he resolved to place himself on this new footing, by asking from his uncle a regular salary as manager, and the power of investing his future savings in the works.

In the chill autumn evening "old David Haldane" sat by a fire, in the well-worn, dingy parlour of the printwork house. Before him stood his tumbler, and the "ship's biscuit," on which he nightly exercised his still splendid teeth; and opposite sat young David, with his resolution on hand, but not knowing very well how to frame it—not to his uncle's taste, but to suit his own notions of delicacy in the matter.

They were very like each other, these two men, like enough to be taken for father and son. The old man had the advantage, in point of massiveness and strength; the young man was evidently of finer, and more sensitive temperament, and might prove less robust in the stress of life, though capable of higher things.

After a silence of some duration, no unusual thing in these evening tête-à-têtes, the young man spoke. "I think you have been satisfied with my management of late," he said, fixing his eyes on the old man's face, who was gazing into the fire with an expression which to his companion revealed neither his mind nor his mood.

The old man looked up sharply. "I don't think I ever found much fault, David, my man," he said; "but things are lookin' very well at present. What were ye goin' to say?" he went on, speaking with a broad country accent. He was too shrewd not to know that he had only had the preface as yet.

"Well, the truth is, I have something to say," replied the young man, dashing right into the heart of the difficult subject. "The works can well afford to pay a manager, and if I manage well, I want to have the pay—that's about it. I don't forget what I owe you on my mother's account and my own," he added, seeing a somewhat hard smile on his uncle's face; "but that is not a debt which can be paid with money. I want to make my own life. Give me whatever is fair to live upon."

"And what might you consider fair?" broke in the old man, looking keenly at his grand-nephew.

"What you would have to give any other man in my place," was the prompt and straightforward reply.

"Then you don't mean to live here any longer?" said the old man, interrogatively.

"I hadn't thought of that: of course, you must make a deduction for my expenses here."

"What's the odds, man?" said old David: "it'll a' be yours when I'm gone." It was the first time he had ever made the least allusion to the disposal of his property.

"But I don't want you gone, and I do want the money—what money I can make—that is, I may want it." He hesitated a little, and then added, abruptly, "I may marry."

"Better leave that alone," said the old man. "But who may the lass be that's taken your fancy?"

—nobody here about, I reckon.” He had jumped to the conclusion that his nephew’s heart had been ensnared by some beauty of Bleaktown, the daughter, doubtless, of one of the manufacturers whom he went there to meet on business. He seemed to expect an answer to his question.

“I’ll tell you that when I get her,” laughed the young man.

“Settle first about the lass, and I’ll settle about the siller,” rejoined old Haldane, warily. He acknowledged the fairness of his nephew’s request, but he was fond of power, and could not bring himself to accede to it at once.

But the young man shook his head. “No, no, uncle,” he replied, “I must be sure of what I have to offer. But I don’t want you to settle it to-night. Think it over, and let me know your mind some day soon. I’m off to my den now, to finish an experiment I’m trying with the new blue.” And David Haldane the younger rose, and taking a key from the nail on which it hung by the fireplace, nodded in a friendly and yet half-restrained manner to the elder David, and left the room.

They were both men of strong will, these Haldanes, and a collision between them would be difficult to adjust—nay, if it came to that, would most likely be found incapable of any adjustment whatever, save that of each going his own way in opposite directions. The elder man had perhaps the stronger will of the two—that is, the least likely to be moved by reason, the least liable to influence. He would have his own way at any cost, even at the cost of his own comfort and peace, even at the cost, when it went beyond a certain point, of grievous wrong: for a strong will is not in itself a noble quality, as many seem to think; it is as often, indeed, a source of weakness as of strength.

Left alone in the dingy parlour, old Haldane put out the candles, and sat looking into the fire. His thoughts had been turned out of their ordinary channel, and, from speculations on his nephew’s future, they reverted to his own past. There was a time when he had not worked only for work’s sake, when a vision of home, and wife, and little ones had kept him warm on many a wintry tramp. There was a time when, as he neared the end of every succeeding round, the vision became warmer, and closer, and brighter as he rested in the little farmhouse, with a fuller purse and a lighter heart, under the same roof with his promised wife, and the day drew near when he was to give up his wandering life, and settle down with her as a respectable shop-keeper. The old man’s brow darkened, and his eyes flashed fiercely in the firelight, as memory retraced, in characters far more vivid than any in which succeeding events appeared, the vanishing of that vision.

He had left Bleaktown with a heavy pack on his shoulders, but a light heart in his breast, on his last round of travel, when, a few miles beyond the town, he had encountered the two Oglivies, riding with a noisy band of boon companions. In a frolic they had stopped him—they knew him well—and insisted on buying his whole stock, pack and all. After some debate with himself, as to whether he should go on to the little farmhouse, a few miles further in the direction which the riders had taken, he turned and hastened back to town.

In the pack which he had just parted with there was a pretty silken kerchief, intended for his sweetheart, which he had taken out and reserved at the sale. This act of reservation had been noticed by Gilbert Oglvie, who insisted on examining the article, and declared that he wanted it for a sweetheart of his own. After some parley, he had parted with it, and the first thing he did on his return to town was to go and buy another exactly similar. Some other arrangements made concerning his future business, he had taken the road again, and hastened to the home of his betrothed. He entered the house, and there, in the clean kitchen, in her afternoon dress, was his Jeanie sitting down to her wheel with the kerchief he had just parted with, and the neighbour of which he carried in his pocket, folded modestly over her bosom. Her mother sat knitting in her accustomed seat; but David Haldane’s whole world had changed. He sat glaring at the token of treachery on his sweetheart’s neck, for he did not doubt that it was the gift of gay Gilbert Oglvie.

“Has ony ill come ower ye, David?” the mother had asked, in alarm, and he had made no answer, but had risen and beckoned the girl to follow him. Bright, saucy, buxom Jean followed him into the little garden, with temper already roused by her lover’s looks—for what could there be to look black about when she was by?—and he had sternly demanded how she came by the kerchief. But Jean indignantly refused to satisfy him.

He had left her standing there in pride and anger, and gone into the house, and made the same demand upon the mother, and the old woman had answered, simply—“She got it frae yoursel’.” Then David Haldane had left the house never to return. And there and then had ended the one love of his life.

“I vowed to be upsides with him,” muttered the old man, looking into the fire which threw a lurid gleam over his face. “I swore David Haldane would be laird o’ the lands o’ Oglvie, and there’s a David Haldane that will! But for him! I would like to turn him oot alive! It’s little triumph to triumph ower the dead, and we’re near of an age, we’re near of an age!”

CHAPTER XXII.

BREAKING UP.

On that same evening, Peggy and her grandfather sat together by the firelight. The old man was in his wonted attitude, slightly bending in his chair towards the pleasant glow. Peggy sat on a low stool on the opposite side of the hearth, her chin resting on her hand. She was wearied out, and, feeling the kind of sadness that comes with bodily weariness, she was glad of the healing, restful darkness, and had not lit the candles, but had suffered it to gather round them in the silence.

"Where's Jean?" said the old man, suddenly.

Peggy had waited upon him all day, and he had not noticed the old woman's absence until now.

"She's not very well to-day, grandfather," said Peggy; "but she thinks she'll be better to-morrow. If she's no better, may I send for the doctor?"

"She may do about that as she likes, as about everything else," he answered, in a tone of unusual energy, which startled Peggy.

"Do you want anything? shall I bring the lights?" she asked.

"No, no," he answered; "there's light enough to light me on the road I'm going."

His sunken eyes flashed in the firelight under his shaggy brows, and Peggy fancied that his face had a strangely livid look. She came and sat down by his knees on the hearth, and clasped them as she used to do when a child.

"Are you ill, grandfather?" she asked.

"Breaking up," he answered, quickly, and more gently—"fast breaking up."

"What can I do?" she said, clinging to him with a subdued sob.

"Nothing, little one," he answered. "What can you do, when the tide is coming up, to keep it from covering the sunken wreck? I feel the waves about my feet."

Sitting at his feet, she trembled, as her cheek touched the chill hand. With all her warm young life she clung to him.

"Let me send for the doctor," she pleaded.

"I might have done better to send for him long ago," he answered, with a faint flash of grim humour. "I might not have burdened the world so long. There's one thing you must promise me, little one," he added: "Whatever you do about this wretched hulk of a body, don't bring any one here to doctor my soul; let me go my way without a stranger standing by my bed, speaking sacred words into senseless ears."

He alluded to the universal custom of having the minister at every deathbed. She was silent, and he repeated, "You will mind that, little one—no minister."

"Grandfather," she said, lifting her face from his knees, "let me be your minister—any one can be a minister. Let me read to you."

"Do," he answered, dreamily.

"I can see by this light," she said, rising.

She brought a book, her New Testament, stirred the fire, and sat down again at his feet, but seemed at a loss what to read. But he helped her in this.

"There is one chapter I remember better than any other," he said. "It was my mother's favourite chapter, and I learnt it, verse by verse, at her knee. Read that, little one."

He named the parable of the prodigal son, and Peggy found the chapter, and read without interruption to the end.

When it was finished, there was an interval of silence, which was broken, at length, by a sigh from the old man, so heavy as to be almost a groan. Then he murmured, "Ah! but he was young—the prodigal was not an old man, little one. If a man feeds long enough with the swine, he becomes as one of them; he has neither the will nor the power to arise."

"But if he had the power given to him, his being old would make no difference. Do you think it could to God, grandfather?"

"You are nearer him than I am, little one. It is not so many years yet since you came from him, and I have wandered long and far."

"But you are drawing nearer him again," she answered, "and so we are both alike, perhaps."

Another pause, and again the old man broke the silence.

"I feel more myself to-night," he said, "than I have done for years. If there was only time, I would settle some things to-night."

"There will be time to-morrow," Peggy answered. "And there is a great deal I want to tell you, grandfather," she said, her thoughts suddenly reverting to Captain Oglivie.

"Yes, yes, to-morrow," he repeated; "there will be time to-morrow."

He seemed afraid of breaking the spell of peace which seemed to have fallen on his spirit.

"Everything seems different to-night. For years and years I have borne in sullen silence. I thought it brave, little one, when smitten of God and afflicted, to bear it thus, as I thought it brave to blaspheme. A coward's trick, I called it, to cry to God in time of trouble, when I had never called on him before; and to-night it seems such mad, rebellious folly. It is all so different if God is indeed a Father."

The last words were spoken as if to himself, and again there fell a stillness on the room. There is other joy on earth than that of youthful pleasure, or of satisfied affection—joy akin to that which there may be among the angels of God; and some such joy visited and strengthened the inmates of that silent chamber, as the moments glided past.

It was time to part for the night. Poor Tammas came at the accustomed hour, and with many a suppressed groan wheeled his master off to bed. Then Peggy went down into the kitchen and prepared a dish of gruel, which she carried into the little room beyond in which Jean and Tammas slept, and administered to the faithful old servant who lay there, suffering still more from the impatience with which she endured her ailment, than from the ailment itself. The truth was, both she and her young mistress had frightened themselves into the belief that the feverish cold which had attacked her, was the dreaded fever, through which she had nursed the Highland woman and her husband.

Soon all the house was silent, and Peggy sat dreaming in the firelight, till her little world was a paradise of forgiveness, and hope, and love; then, somehow, the waking dream, in which Captain Oglivie was standing behind her grandfather's chair, and wheeling him about in a garden flushed with roses, while she walked by his side, melted away into unremembered visions. She had fallen asleep.

It was quite dark when she awoke, feeling very stiff and cold. She rose to steal to her room in the dark, for the fire had gone out, and it was no easy matter to procure a light in those days. As she passed her grandfather's room with noiseless steps, she heard, or thought she heard, a groan. She stood still and listened, and the sound was repeated. Then she gently opened the door. He was breathing strangely, and yet not as if asleep. She spoke to him, but there was no answer, and, her heart palpitating with sudden fear, she descended quickly to the kitchen to procure a light.

Tammas and Jean were asleep in the little room beyond, and she was unwilling to disturb them. The kitchen fire, carefully covered up so as to keep alive throughout the night, speedily gave her the light she sought. But soft as her movements had been, they had roused the pair of sleepers, and, stimulated by a whisper from his wife, Tammas called out, "Who's there?" in a tone of valorous defiance.

Peggy went to their half-open door and answered, softly, "It's only me. I've not been in bed yet, and I think there's something the matter with grandfather."

At these words, Jean seemed to fling off the illness of the day before, and, wrapped in her plaid, she was soon standing beside Peggy at her master's bed.

As for him, he seemed to sleep a strange, uneasy sleep, in which he laboured for breath. It was in vain that they tried to rouse him out of it. Then mistress and servant looked into each other's face, and each read the confirmation of the fear that this was no sleep, but the dark passage into that slumber from which there is no waking.

Jean wrung her hands in mute despair, and sat down on the foot of her master's bed, evidently to await the end. Not so her young mistress. "Stay here," she whispered, "and I will go for the doctor."

"At this time o' nicht, and pitch dark," murmured the old woman. "Na, na, Tammas 'ill gang, bad as he is at the gait."

"I'll go in half the time," said Peggy, in a low, firm voice; and with a lingering look at the insensible form on the bed, knowing that even the remnant of life with which it stirred might be gone before her return, she hastened from the room.

She found poor Tammas reduced, between pain and fear, to something like total imbecility, crouching over the kitchen fire, which, he had stirred into a blaze. But he got the lantern and lighted it for her, and, wrapped in her cloak and hood, she stepped out with it into the darkness.

How very dark it was! a darkness that might be felt. Her lantern just served to show her the path. It glanced on the bole of a tree, now and then, as she took her way through the wood; but beyond rose walls of darkness on either hand, and a canopy of darkness stretched above her head. The night was moonless, starless, windless. Worse than the lack of light, Peggy felt the dead calm—the utter breathlessness. It was like the cessation of universal life. She reached the foot of the hill, where there was a little thicket of hazel and briar. Something patted her on the cheek; it was a light branch which she had brushed against. A spray of bramble caught her. It felt like the clasp of invisible arms stretched out to detain her. It needed a high heart to stand still and disengage herself from the clasp. But she passed on swiftly, over the fields and through the sleeping village, till she came to the doctor's house. It was all dark too.

Peggy had knocked rather timidly, and had not succeeded in rousing the servant, but had only roused the more lightly-sleeping master, who, after a short interval, threw open his bedroom window and thrust out his head arrayed in his night-cap, only it was too dark to see it. In answer to his question, she speedily satisfied him as to the urgency of her mission.

At length the little doctor came down, having packed himself into his clothes, but having forgotten to remove the night-cap, which nodded approvingly at Peggy.

"And you came here all alone in the dark," he said, in astonishment, as he gave her admittance. Then, with sundry ejaculations, he thrust her and her lantern into his study, and hastened to rouse his domestic helps.

It seemed a long time to Peggy before the doctor's gig was ready; but at last he came and led her out and placed her in it, and taking some things that might, he said, be useful, from various shelves in the study, took his place by her side and drove away in the darkness in the direction of Delaube.

BELLE.

Twas Sunday morning. The cows lay asleep in the meadows, the sweet Sunday bells rang short sermons on the air, and the villagers were wending their way to church. There was the father, a little constrained in his Sunday clothes, but still proud of the change they made in his appearance; there was the mother, matronly and fair, but rather worried by the attempt to convey her flock safely to church; there was Fanny, with her cottage bonnet trimmed up afresh, and gay with new ribbons, casting side-glances at the young farmers, out of eyes that, when looked at by her mother, were modestly downcast and completely demure. Tommy and the children were lagging behind, and only little Belle was absent from the procession. Belle had strayed. Naughty little Belle did not much care about church. She was not good like mother, to sit so still, and listen so long; so Belle had strayed out into the cool green fields. There were hot blazes of light, on the dusty highway, but under the hill, and in every dell, were cool patches of shade, and in one of these latter little Belle now sat, in a half-sitting, half-lying posture, opening and clenching her little hand, in an attempt to capture a large showy butterfly, whose bright-coloured wings were now just within her grasp, and again yards away in the blue calm before her. She was a pretty little girl, and deserves a description; but then Belle deserved so many things she did not get, and this, I am afraid, must be one.

When I say "Belle," there starts up before me a child's simple figure, a round little face, red gold hair, like the fashionable chignons, sweet sensitive lips, that were too much given to quivering, and eyes—Belle's eyes were as blue as convolvuluses and about as pretty. Strangers, seeing her for the first time, launched forth into fuller descriptions; but this, as I have said, I will not attempt. Stretching now after the butterfly, which was high above her head, describing gay circles in the air, Belle wheeled suddenly round, and came face to face with a stranger, a young clergyman, who was also half sitting, half lying on the grass, with the back of his neck against a tree, and with a book in his hand, which he was reading intently, quite unaware of the butterfly and Belle.

But if he had been a flash of lightning he could not have transfixed Belle more completely to the spot. She let the butterfly go, though as usual he seemed on the very verge of imprisonment, and stood staring, not so much at the man, as at the white "choker," the insignia of his office, which adorned his neck.

Here was Nemesis in the most horrible form, overtaking her actions—a clergyman, who would doubtless take her with him, in his hand, and would suggest, perhaps insist on, summary punishment for this wilful little breaker of the first long commandment.

Then there would be of course no help for Belle. Her mother was always "guided by her betters," and unknown horrors would then fall on her head. "Why," thought Belle, severely, "was that clergyman, too, not at church?"

There was sufficient answer to this in the young man's wasted frame, and the spots of hectic colour on his cheeks; the fatigue would very certainly have been too much for him.

But Belle saw nothing of all this, as indeed it was not to be expected that she should. She thought the "gentleman" simply exempt from all unpleasant duties, on the ground of being one of those fortunate "grown-ups," and as for health—why the colour on his cheek was beautiful to behold, like her little schoolfellow Anna's doll, which did, indeed, rejoice in somewhat unusual bloom.

All these thoughts flickered through Belle's little brain as she stood before him in fear and trembling, longing, yet afraid, to run away. For how could she hope to convey those little pattering feet of hers noiselessly through the rustling long grass that grew thick on the road to liberty? That clearly was out of Belle's power. So she stood where she was, a sad-faced little culprit, waiting before a most unconscious judge.

How long the time seemed to Belle before the young clergyman raised his eyes from the fluttering pages of that book to the little child's face before him, working so unpleasantly with convictions of guilt. At length, however, the dreaded moment arrived. The book went down, the gentleman's eyelashes up. Belle's cheeks flamed into warm beauty, and the foolish little lips set to and quivered.

Altogether, she assisted the very idea she was most anxious not to convey—or she would have done so to any unoccupied mind; but the clergyman, coming straight from the sweet words of the Psalmist, saw in her no truant, and did not even perceive the trouble on her face. All he thought was, "Why, here is a pretty little girl; now, if my poor Kate had but lived, I too might have—," and he smiled at her, this inconsiderate judge.

Belle dropped him a little curtsey, and her heart beat just one shade less quickly.

The young man put out his hand to her, and kissed the fair open brow still shining from mother's yellow soap, and little Belle stood, his arm round her waist, with all her calculations completely at fault.

What would he say to her—this gentleman who caressed little girls when they should have been at church?

He said nothing, nothing at all, only held her, looking at her closely, as if trying how it would have felt to have had anything so bonny belonging to him—his very own. But if this were amusement, it was so only on one side.

Belle had now partially recovered from her fright, and was sending impatient thoughts after the butterfly, and her feet were positively longing to take a run upon the grass out among the kingcups; but the clergyman, attracted by some vivacious little movement on the part of his prisoner, began to address her, and Belle recognised flight as impossible.

"Stay and talk to me," he said; "we have all the field to ourselves you see."

Belle did not see anything of the kind. Was there not the frisky brown pony—that pony that was at once the admiration and dread of Belle's life—kicking up his heels behind him, gayer and more frisky even than usual? Were there not birds of every form and note concealed in the hedges, high up in the trees, pouring forth their version of melody upon the silent air? Had not the butterfly returned from his travels, and was he not even now, in company with a gayer, gaudier, showier specimen of his tribe, beating bright-coloured wings almost in Belle's little face. And there were insects Belle knew all over the grass, purple moths, and—but then the clergyman was certainly not thinking of purple moths.

"And what is your name, little girl?"

Here again, Miss Belle's thoughts criticised, this was so like a stupid "grown-up."

Belle could not remember to have ever met one who did not ask her what was her name; an act of attention Belle did not at all appreciate; indeed, she thought it rather unpleasantly inquisitive than otherwise, and was, perhaps, proud of not sharing in the weakness, for she certainly was not curious as to the clergyman's appellation. However, she made him another little bob after the fashion of village children, and gave in her name with all due gravity.

"If you please, sir, Belle."

"Belle? How very pretty! Your mother must be a sensible woman to have given her child such a pretty name. It must be good to go through the world with a name like Belle."

All of which was of course quite beyond the comprehension of his audience. What did Belle know about going through the world—Belle, whose only aim now was to get out of his grasp into the freer air beyond?

"And where is mother, Belle?"

The clergyman said this in all innocence, with no thoughts of applying the answer, and absently withal, for his brain was busy with holy conjectures, and far enough away from the child's misdeeds.

But poor little Belle did not know this, and her heart beat fast under the blue cotton frock that mother had made last week, and which was, indeed, her very best and grandest attire.

"Mother is at church," she said, "and father, and Fan; so's Tommy, and the little uns."

Poor Belle, she had brought it on herself.

After such a speech, how could the clergyman, preoccupied as he was, fail to say—

"And why are you not at church too, little Belle?"

It was over now, and Belle had all the courage of desperation.

"Please, sir, I didn't want," she said.

This, we will suppose, by way of making things better. But now the clergyman was quite awake to the situation, and properly grave.

"Oh, really, and why did you not?" he asked.

She had no resource left but the child's one, dating far back. Large tears gathered in Belle's blue eyes—convolvulus filled with dew—and then overflowed, rolling slowly down her fair cheeks, and splashing heavily on her fat, dimpled hands. Belle had on no pinafore, and she did not dare convert her new frock into a mop, so she stood there the picture of embarrassment and distress.

It was not in nature not to pity her, and Belle had an arm round her, and a fine white handkerchief soaking up her tears, before she knew where she was. The "gentleman," it must be remembered, was very young, and was, in his way perhaps, as soft-hearted as Belle herself.

"Why, how silly! What a foolish little maid! Look here, Belle, if you cry like that you will make me unhappy."

Sobs fainter, at the same time distinct.

"Because I am sure you are sorry, Belle—you will have vexed mother, you know—but you can't be more than sorry."

"Did you ever," said Belle, "do anything so wrong?"

Did he ever, arrived as he was at man's estate, do anything as wrong as this child! He hardly dared to look at her, this guileless little child, the greatest fault of whose life was the purest innocence beside his sins, good man though, indeed, he was justly accounted to be.

"Did you?" said little Belle, all her soul in her eyes, and waiting as if her chances of improvement depended on his words.

"Many things, Belle, though not perhaps this one. I am only too sorry to be kept away from church."

"What keeps you?" asked Belle, and there was a slight touch of scorn in her voice.

She did not believe there need anything have kept him. He liked better, she supposed, sitting in the bright sunshine to keeping bolt upright in those highbacked pews.

"I am too ill, Belle. It tires me too much."

But little Belle still looked incredulous. She too might have laid claim to illness, she thought, if fatigue were the outward signs.

"What is the matter with you?" she asked.

"I am dying, Belle; but you, I suppose, know nothing of that."

"Yes, I do," retorted Belle, who was always insulted by ignorance on any point being imputed to her, "because I had a little sister once that died. Are you glad you're going to be dead?" said Belle, going on quickly, and carefully avoiding whatever grammar came in her way. "I shouldn't."

"You shouldn't?"

"No," said Belle, decisively. "When baby died mother had her put in the ground, and I shouldn't like, if I was baby, to be all alone there at night."

"Your little sister is not really there, you know; she is up in heaven, one of God's little angels."

Belle looked up at the blue sky, dotted all over with little fleecy white clouds.

"You would like that?"

"Better," said Belle, "but not and leave mother, and father, and Tommy, and Fan—oh, and not and leave the little uns."

The little ones! In the name of all the impossibilities, how many younger could there be than Belle?

"Not unless God wanted you to; then, he would take you first up into his beautiful heaven, and give you wings, and make you into a little angel, and give you back your little sister; and your father, and mother, and Tommy, and Fan would all follow, and would be so glad to find you there when they went."

"And the little uns?" inquired Belle, anxiously.

"And the little ones, certainly. Will you not try to be good, that you may go up there, when you die?"

"And when do you think you shall be dead?" asked Belle, who preferred to look at the subject from his point of view, rather than her own. She was too young to feel awe, and put the question in perfect good faith.

The clergyman smiled rather sadly. "When shall I be dead?" he said. "Well, Belle, if you come and play here in the fields this time next year—not on a Sunday, Belle—you will be a good little girl then, and will always go to church on a Sunday—this time next year, Belle, I think I shall be—dead.”

Belle looked interested, and would have liked, I think, to have heard more; but her newly-found friend was no longer aware of her presence, and had drifted with his own words long past her.

“I shall be—dead!”

Should he indeed be dead—all the doctors had told him so—this time next year, when Belle, just one shade prettier, just one shade less of a baby, would be, perhaps, sitting threading daisies, in this very field, where now she was sitting, looking up in his eyes, her own wistful and large with thought? Suddenly all the bells broke out—four strokes, then the hour. Service in the churches was over.

“I must go,” said little Belle, as there began to be forms visible in the distance. “Mother ’ull want me to help mind the baby, while Nan lays the cloth. Good-bye, sir.”

“Good-bye, Belle. You will think of what I have said, and try to be a good little maid, that when your time, too, comes to die, God may take you with him into his holy heaven, as he did your little sister; then you will not be afraid, any more than I am now.”

“But I am never ill,” said little Belle, and so put up her mouth to be kissed, and left him.

He watched the last flutter of her blue cotton frock, catching in the hedges, simple and pretty in the sunshine, and felt that for him, at least on earth, he should never again see Belle.

Summer faded, the brown leaves of autumn dropped on the ground, winter cold froze up the ponds, spring succeeded, and summer again came round.

The young clergyman had spent the year abroad, in warm summer climates, and the hotter sunshine had been good for his complaint; there was now even hope given him of his life. He who had been so long preparing to depart, must now stay in the world, and work yet another hour in the vineyard.

And so it had happened, the chances of time had brought him again to the little primitive village in which he had last seen Belle. Passing through it, and meeting a woman who had known him when he had last been there, he made close inquiries touching the child, whose sweet face and unawakened heart had made so deep an impression on him. He had, been often thinking of her, and had longed that it might so have pleased God that the words he had said might indeed have been to Belle like the bread that is cast on the waters, and the seed that, when sown in faith, bringeth forth sometimes a hundred-fold.

“Belle, sir?” said the woman, putting up her apron to her eyes—for she was of that class whose tears fall easily—“we aint got no Belle now, sir; she’s been under the ground now hard on a month.”

Under the ground, along with the little sister, whom Belle thought must have been afraid to have been left there at night! Under the ground! Belle, with her blue eyes closed, as convolvuluses close for the night, with her red lips, red no longer, with her sweet voice hushed, and her pattering little feet still for ever! Under the ground! Belle, who, she had told him, was never ill,—under the ground! dead before the clergyman who was to have been dead this year!

“There aint none of us too young, is there sir?” said the woman, when she found that the young man was too shocked to speak. “And she was such a sweet child, was Belle! She used often to speak of you, sir, and how you was soon going to be dead—excuse me, sir, and lor, who’d ha’ thought it ’ud been she to go first?”

“Did she seem afraid to die? Did she know she was dying? How was it?”

“Well, sir, the early part of this spring—this last spring as ever was—there was scarlet fever about in the village, and there was a many took it, and had it bad, but there didn’t none have it so bad as Belle, and there wasn’t none, sir, as took it so quiet.”

“She had been always a goodish child, but when she took the fever, she seemed all of a sudden to become more like an angel than a child, she was that sweet and gentle. And she’d lay there, and talk of them angels, how they were coming with their white wings, to take her up, and she, poor child, with her pretty lips all red with the fever, and her little hand so hot. Are you going, sir? Would you like as I should show you the way to church? They’ve put Belle in along with her sister, her as she was always talking about, and the clergyman’s daughter have put up a stone to her, for the gentry all round loved Belle.”

So talking, the woman led the way to the little corner of the country churchyard where poor Belle now lay. Then the young clergyman signifying his will, she left him there, standing alone.

The graves all around it were green, and were pretty enough beds for any tired form, and little Belle’s was bright with flowers. There were fuchsias, and crimson and scarlet roses, and some blue flowers that recalled to him her eyes. Though, indeed, he required no outward help to set the little picture before him. In his own mind there was always Belle sitting in the field by the hill, with a shaggy brown pony in the background, and no end of blue butterflies in the air. And now, though her cotton frock would still be as good as new, its childish little owner was lying at his feet, cold and dead.

Then he turned his eyes on her grave, and the simple superscription upon the stone, which the clergyman’s good daughter had erected to the little village favourite, that was never again to be known in the village.

The only thing written there was—

and underneath some sacred words added:—

“Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.”

WRONG ON BOTH SIDES.

BY JOHN G. WATTS, AUTHOR OF "PICTURES OF ENGLISH LIFE," "TALES AND SONGS," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

BESSIE, dear, look up! See how brightly the sun shines to-day; and remember how dull and dreary yesterday was: so shall it be with our fortune."

These words were addressed, one fine morning in the month of May, in an attic in the neighbourhood of Knightsbridge, by Robert Hartwell to his sister, who sat propped up with pillows in an old arm-chair. Hither she had removed after her mother and brother had been taken to the hospital, thereby gaining two advantages—change of air, and close proximity to the establishment whence she obtained work.

For a couple of months did that young woman battle for her daily bread, no small portion of the time in constant dread of hearing that her mother or brother, or both, had fled this world of dreams to that of everlasting realities. At length, to her great joy, she saw them out of imminent danger. Robert gained strength more rapidly than did his mother, and had been free of the hospital five weeks, at the moment when he was thus consoling his sister.

That Bessie was very ill, needed no second glance to discover. Yes, a week or two after the convalescent's return home, her overtaxed powers had given way, and for many days she stood in danger of needing a bed within the walls the other had so recently quitted. A low fever fell upon her; but, thanks to a purer air, and much kindness from the landlady of the house, the disease, in spite of her weak state, was vanquished, leaving her, for all that, in a very prostrate condition.

Two or three hours' work a day was as much as Robert could find strength at first to perform; but he soon, in spite of spare diet, grew stronger. Alas! when he was in condition for full service, he could not get the work to do. His illness had forfeited for him his permanent situation, and he was only a casual labourer.

Bessie had listened to her brother's kindly words with a smile, and when he had done she softly replied, "Bob, dear, you're a good fellow, and always try to cheer me up; but I wish you would do what I desire: write to Uncle Giles—I don't say ask him for anything—but write."

"Never!" ejaculated the other, almost fiercely.

"Don't be so unforgiving."

"Bessie, darling, I'm not unforgiving; but you know we should never have seen the troubles that for months have beset our way, if our mother's brother had possessed the least feeling."

"Perhaps he meant well. He was a curious man, and had been to see us but once in eighteen years, though dear mother hardly let a summer pass without paying him a visit. His later letters seemed to show that he was labouring under very false impressions with regard to poor dear pa's habits."

"There, I can't give in, dear," cried Robert, jumping up and running into the back attic for his hat. He returned directly, smiling, and continued, "Now, I'm not going to argue with you any further, but I'll out and see if I cannot earn you a nice little dinner for to-morrow. There, throw this old shoe after me for luck," placing a slipper in her hand. "The landlady says she'll be up to see you presently. It's very kind of her letting me have the other attic for a shilling a week, and unlimited credit. Well, there are some good people in the world, after all; ah, and mind now you don't get crying, as I found you'd been doing the other day, while I was absent. Good-bye, and God bless you."

"Good-bye, and God bless you Bob," sighed she.

"All right," he returned, stopping at the door; "now then for the old shoe."

"There! if you must have it," and the sick girl feebly tossed the slipper in the direction he was taking.

"Good-bye," once again came from the stout-hearted fellow, and away he hurried on his errand.

CHAPTER IV.

THE old shoe was not true to its tradition that day, for Robert found no employment, and indeed for a whole month afterwards his earnings were but small. Meanwhile, his sister, amid all drawbacks, gradually mended, and presently was able to resume work; Mrs. Hartwell too improved, and at length was restored to her children. One morning soon after that gratifying event, Robert arose more depressed than usual.

"It seems to be of no use struggling here any longer," he said; "but there are other places where youth and industry are sure to stand a fair chance. You know, mother," he urged, "that I am not afraid of hard work. If we had only money enough to carry us to Australia, our fortunes would be made."

Both mother and sister cast inquiring looks at each other, and then agreed that the idea was a good one; but where was the money to come from?

"Let me write to Uncle Giles," said the widow.

"No, mother, I will never consent; I would die first!"

"Robert, you are too hard in your judgments, and such conduct brings its own punishment. When I listened to your advice to return unopened your uncle's letter, I was bowed down by the greatest grief I had ever suffered, and scarce knew what I was about. I certainly, afterwards, believed we should be able to make our way, and then I fondly thought, when we no longer stood in need of help, that I would seek out my brother, and, while speaking words of forgiveness, show him how much he had wronged your father."

"Mother, I could not let you humble yourself to one who so little cares for you. It strikes me that the Government grants assistance, though I do not know the qualifications necessary to obtain it. At all events, I feel certain, if the Government won't do anything for us, that there's a society specially devoted to sending respectable women out to colonies free of expense, and I might manage to work my passage over. I'll go to-day and see what I can learn respecting such things."

After having been to the wharf to see if his services were likely to be needed, and finding they were not, our hero started for the office of a certain shipping agent in Fenchurch Street, whereat he purposed making the proposed inquiries. Passing through a lane running from Eastcheap, his eye suddenly fell upon a doorpost, whereon stood, in modest unflourished letters, this inscription: "Tussle and Twine, Solicitors." Tussle and Twine! why, they were the London agents for the attorney in whose office he had been copying clerk. He wondered if they could give him anything to do, in the event of his emigration scheme failing. He would call in, as he came back, and perhaps, if they had nothing for him, they might be acquainted with some firm that did want assistance. He was on the point of pressing forward when he kicked against a small parcel. He stooped and picked it up. As he did so it opened in his hand. He started, turned pale, thrust it into his bosom, hastened into the office, and asked to see one of the principals.

"Name!" inquired a boy perched on a high stool.

"I am on important business, but my name is unknown to the firm," was the reply.

Requesting him to take a seat, the boy, an active little fellow, with eyes that were all over you in an instant, hopped off his stool and disappeared behind a green baize door. He returned in a few seconds, saying that Mr. Tussle would very shortly be disengaged. About five minutes afterwards a full, strong voice called down a tin tube, which terminated just under the ear of the before-mentioned boy as he sat on his perch, "Ask the gentleman to walk up."

Hurrying in the direction pointed out, his heart throbbing fast and heavily, Robert tapped at the door.

"Come in," cried the lawyer. He obeyed. A long-limbed, wiry, red-faced, white-haired man of fifty to fifty-five was sitting behind an office table near the window. He looked up and surveyed him with knitted brows, and then sharply asked, "Your business, sir?"

"Oh, I wish to inquire, sir, if"—(the other referred to his watch, and made a note of the time upon his blotting-pad)—"if anybody coming into or going from your office has recently lost anything?"

The lawyer started and pricked up his ears like a terrier at the sight of a rat. "Eh! lost anything? What do you mean?"

"Simply that I have found something near your doorstep, of great importance to the owner."

"What is it? documents or a——"

"I shall not state what I have found. If neither you nor any of your people have sustained the loss to which I allude, the matter is at an end between us, and I shall go on and lodge what I have picked up with the police."

"If you'll be good enough to give me a minute," cried the other, growing quite excited, "I'll make inquiries."

He called down the tin tube, "Jackson, tell Mr. Winkle to come up;" and Mr. Winkle did come up accordingly. He was a thin old man, in very shabby black, with a stoop in his shoulders—a thin white face, and thin white fingers like the claws of a bird.

"Who has gone out of the office lately?" inquired Tussle.

"Nobody, sir, has gone since Mr. Twine and the country gentleman."

"Has anybody in the office lost any money or—did you say it was money?" turning to Robert.

"I did not say what it was," he replied.

"I've not heard of any loss in the office myself, sir, but I'll go down and inquire."

"My good man," interrupted the prize-holder, "you need not trouble yourself. What I have found is of too much importance to have been entrusted into the hands of any clerk in this office, without coming through one of the principals."

The old man was fumbling the handle of the door while these remarks were being made, when all at once he was sent flying by a little sallow-faced, grey-eyed man in a white neckcloth and clerical-cut coat and waistcoat, who plunged into the apartment, breathless with alarm and hurry. He was followed by a middle-aged, country-looking man, who walked a little lame, and who also appeared considerably agitated.

"Here's our friend lost his pocket-book!" gasped Mr. Twine, for he it was who had so nearly upset the ancient clerk.

"Yes, between here and the Bank."

"What sort of a pocket-book was it?" asked Robert.

All eyes were instantly turned on him, while the countryman cried, "A large black un, wi' a brass clasp, and J. G. upon it."

"What did it contain?"

"Seven hundred pounds in notes and twenty suvrins."

"I found it by the doorstep" said the restorer, quietly, "not ten minutes ago."

"And most honestly and honourably walked into this office to inquire if we knew the owner," observed Tussle.

"That's mor'n many 'ud ha' done," cried the countryman; "and now, young gentleman, you've acted as ye'd like to be acted to, and so, as an acknowledgment o' your manly integrity, there be three ten-pun notes to put in your fob."

Our hero turned away from the money, but the other followed him up with, "Catch hold," and pushed them into the breast of his coat.

Self reliance had ever been Robert's ruling impulse, and accepting money as a reward for merely an act of simple honesty, at once struck him as not the right thing—as, indeed, robbing the deed of much of its virtue. "Gentlemen," said he, "though ashamed to accept these notes, yet money is of the utmost importance to me. For months I have been in London seeking a situation, until I am in the condition you behold. I was on my way to a shipping agent's, to ascertain if by any means I, with an ailing mother and weakly sister, could get sent out to Australia, when I was so fortunate as to find that pocket-book. Now, if, instead of giving me this money, you will kindly assist in furthering my wishes, or better still, of helping me into any moderately remunerative employment, I shall feel myself your debtor to the end of my days."

All were perfectly mute for some seconds, and then Mr. Twine asked, "What have you been accustomed to, my young friend?"

"Before I came to London, I was copying clerk in an attorney's office."

"Indeed!" exclaimed both lawyers in a breath.

"Yes, at Mr. Joyce's, at Millington. You were his agents?"

"Yes!"

"What's your name?" asked the countryman, with great eagerness.

"Robert Hartwell."

"My nephew!" He would have caught him to his arms, but Robert shrank away.

"Don't shun me, my lad—don't shun me. I understand your feelings, and I deserve your scorn; but learn to forgive: John Giles has had his trials, rest assured. I have borne the punishment meted me by my Maker, I hope meekly. Your mother and sister, where be they?"

"They are in London, sir."

"Oh, take me to 'em at once. Gentlemen," turning to the lawyers, "I was not prepared for this; I will call and see ye to morrow morning."

Robert, who was not less surprised than his uncle, bade Messrs. Tussle and Twine, good day, not wishing to give vent to his feelings before them, and hurried down-stairs into the street. The farmer followed, and soon the two stood side by side.

"I could not speak to you in the presence of others," observed the younger, "but now we are alone I must tell you, sir, if you really are my uncle—you know I never had the pleasure of seeing you before—that while I regret to hear you have been so seriously afflicted as you say, yet it will be impossible for you and me ever to hold commerce, and I shall not think of allowing you to see my mother."

"Don't say that, Robert—pray don't!" earnestly pleaded John Giles. "I know I've been a bad fellow, but perhaps not quite so bad as you think. Heaven is witness" (the tears coursed rapidly down his cheeks) "how hard I've striven to find ye out, that I might make amends: that is, what feeble amends were in my power."

Robert himself was visibly moved.

"You will let me come home wi' ye, and see my sister, if for only once, that I may explain all and ask her forgiveness. My heart is not what it was, or I should not stand suing in the public streets. You will now, won't ye?"

That afternoon John Giles sat beside his sister in the garret at Knightsbridge. Bessie and Robert were there also.

"We were all mistaken," said he, after listening to the sad story of his brother-in-law's last struggle and eventual decease, "and I, sorely, very sorely. Prosperity made me forget my duty to my Maker and neighbour; but God in mercy rebuked me. A few days after my letter to you, finally declining further assistance, a murrain broke out among my cattle. In less than a week more than half my stock was dead. My anxiety carried me into a fever, which, though it began to abate in twelve or fourteen days, left me but a baby in strength. Now, when I could no longer go about my usual business, and was entirely thrown upon myself, I began to understand how rotten a staff I had taken to lean upon. Many years o' my life had been spent in utter disregard o' every duty. Self had been my sole study. I had cared for nobody, and now I fretted to find that nobody cared for me. Not a soul came to my bedside but my servant and the doctor. What was the use of all my money to me now? I fell into deep fits of despondency; thought of the harsh manner in which I had acted to you, and would have given anything to have called any one of ye to my chamber, but was ashamed after what I had done. One morning the pastor of the church, to which I never went, and whom I had often gone out of the way to insult, hearing of my sickness, dropped in, and, like the Good Samaritan, poured balm upon my wounds, and spake many a word o' sweet counsel. He came again and again, till at last, under his holy ministrations, I was led to prostrate myself, with all my weight o' cares, at those feet that never yet from the truly penitent turned away, no matter what his offences. My first act, on being able to take a pen in hand, was to write off to your husband, asking forgiveness for the harshness of my last letter, and begging to know if the help he had sought would be of any use to him now. My letter was returned to me unopened. It was a great blow, but I felt that I deserved it, and bore it with as much fortitude as I could command, resolving in my own mind that when sufficiently recovered to be able to travel, to visit Millington in person. I carried out the idea. Judge my grief and astonishment, on reaching your town, to find Robert was dead, and that his family had departed no one knew whither. From that day my life has been one of unrest. This morning, however, I was rewarded beyond my deserts, by finding myself face to face with my nephew, under circumstances as gratifying to me as they were honourable to him."

"Uncle," said Robert, "I have cherished hard thoughts against you. Mother and Bessie have times and oft wanted me to write to you, but I never would consent. Much of the misery they have had to contend with may have resulted from my obstinacy and want of forgiveness, but I thought you had so wronged my dear father—"

"My lad, much that you all have suffered was brought about by my first having forgotten my duty. The last lesson upon the cross was forgiveness, even of our enemies. Let us shake hands, forget the past, and make common cause in love for the rest of our lives."

"THEY SEARCHED THE SCRIPTURES."

It has been recorded, to the eternal praise of the Jewish citizens of Berea, that when the first preachers of the Gospel came there proclaiming a new religion, "they searched the Scriptures," to know whether the things asserted by the apostle were true or not. Hence they acquired a title to a nobility of spirit and independence of mind far higher than fell to the lot of the inhabitants of a neighbouring city, who, under similar circumstances, clung with a blind tenacity and stupid bigotry to the worn-out platitudes of their fathers, and, as the last resource of intolerance and ignorance, raised persecution against those who claimed the right to exercise that reason which God had given them, and think and act for themselves. "They searched the Scriptures"—worthy example for all successive generations, and the only sure method of arriving at definite conclusions regarding some of the most awful problems that concern human existence.

Once grant the Bible to be the Word of God, and no language can be too express in declaring the importance of an earnest, prayerful, and conscientious study of its sacred pages. We have said "prayerful," for in such a study we are bound to remember that though subject to the same laws of criticism with other books, the Bible differs from them all in this, that it requires a spiritual insight rightly to read its contents. It has to do with spiritual things, which can only be understood by those who are Spirit-taught. No prayer can therefore be more suitable, on such occasions, than that short, but expressive, ejaculation uttered long ago by David: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

The geography, natural history, chronology, &c., of the Scriptures, are subject to exactly the same kind of criticism that these sciences are when met with in other writings; but when we come to consider the plan of salvation as therein revealed, we come at once into an atmosphere altogether removed from that which man ordinarily moves in—we are at once in an element of spiritual things, the doctrine concerning which we must accept from the plain grammatical teaching of those Scriptures themselves, receiving "as little children" whatever God has been pleased to reveal to us of himself, of ourselves, and of Christ the Saviour of the world.

The Bible being, as it professes to be, a revelation from God in heaven to man upon earth, touching the highest and most important subjects—subjects which concern his happiness here and hereafter: being thus a book sui generis, must it not be worthy of the deepest study we can bestow upon it? Even its accidents, so to speak, deserve our careful consideration. Whatever traces we find here of ethnology, geology, or any other science, should be studied, if possible, as they are studied nowhere else; and we rejoice to know that Bible-students in these lands, are coming more and more to see that nothing that concerns the Scriptures of God is without its importance. All sources of knowledge are being investigated to throw light upon its sacred page. The strata of the earth are being examined, ancient tumuli searched, musty records turned over, stony tablets spelled out, and the whole realm of Nature laid under contribution. Hence, we augur that a higher value than ever will be placed upon this sacred record, when, as we most implicitly believe, these various sources of information will be found to have thrown fresh light upon the Bible, and have combined with the words of Christ himself in testifying, "Thy word is truth."

Above all are the word and letter of Scripture worthy of our closest attention—that seamless garment with which the inspiring Spirit has been pleased to clothe eternal verities: and that attention they are gaining more and more every day. Bishop Ellicott's books on parts of the New Testament are models of what a close, critical investigation of Scripture ought to be, combining as they do the strictest reverence with the most scientific method.

In thus searching the Scriptures, we ought to be like the miner who mines for gold. It is those who carefully sift the sands and break up the quartz who succeed in detecting the precious metal, that would otherwise elude observation; and it is those who sift the language and weigh the words of Holy Writ, that succeed in extracting the precious meaning that lies beneath the outer surface of the Word of God. To those who thus seek to plunge into the depths of that Word—to strike, as it were, right down to the living rock, until they touch the virgin stream, and open up the clear fountain and original of Scripture, may those words of the Canticles be not inappropriately applied: “Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved.” The great Augustine, long ago, spoke of a first, second, and third draught of the Scriptures; and it is those who drink most deeply at this sacred fountain, who will return with fresh zest to quench their thirst for Divine things at this heavenly spring of knowledge.

Not only may the Bible be read as the infallible record of God’s salvation, it may also be studied as an exercise at once elevating and refining to the human mind. “I use the Scriptures,” said a great philosopher once, “not as an arsenal to be resorted to only for arms and weapons . . . but as a matchless temple, where I delight to contemplate the beauty, and the symmetry, and the magnificence of the structure, and to increase my awe and excite my devotion to the Deity there preached and adored.”

The Bible testifies to its Divine origin, by the abounding fulness of its revelations. In this respect, it stands side by side with that other revelation contained in the book of Nature. Who will undertake to say he has fathomed all the depths of natural science, that he has explored the uttermost limits of creation, sounded all the depths of the remote past, and read the history of primeval ages, until the whole realm of Nature lies before him like a transparent globe full of light? And who will venture to say he has sounded the depths of that other revelation, searched it from beginning to end, until it no longer contains a mystery, but lies before him like a clear, transparent page? He is but a shallow student in Divine things, who would yield to such a confession—one whose ignorance of the exceeding breadth of God’s law can be only equalled by the spirit of lightness with which he approaches it.

It was not after this fashion the great master-minds of antiquity approached the study of the Scriptures. “In divinity,” says Lord Bacon, “many things must be left abrupt, and concluded with this, ‘Oh, the depth!’ for the Inditer of Scripture did know four things which no man attains to know: the mysteries of the kingdom of glory, the perfection of the laws of Nature, the secrets of the heart of man, and the future succession of the ages.” It is recorded of the same St. Augustine already referred to, that he hesitated long over a single psalm, and was only led to write a commentary upon it by the urgency of his friends; “because,” he says, “as often as I essayed to think thereon, it always exceeded the powers of my intellect and the utmost grasp of my faculties.”

Each student of the Bible, who approaches it in a right spirit, must ever feel how little the much he knows is, in comparison with those untravelled regions, the very outskirts of which, as it were, he has only entered upon. Is it too much to say that the fulness of that Word will only be perceived when “that which is perfect is come?” if even then we attain to “the full assurance of understanding,” and shall not occupy the future ages in searching out the depth of those mysteries into which “the angels desire to look.”

May these few words suggest to us a deeper sense of the majesty, fulness, greatness of that Book which is in all our hands, but the very commonness of which has a tendency to depreciate its value, owing to that natural infirmity whereby we are tempted to hold cheap that which is procured without much difficulty, and which lies, so to speak, at our very doors.

CHANGING.

THE silence of the snows was on the earth,
The silence of the frost upon the stream,
The season sickened ere the spring had birth,
And life seemed slumbering in a deathly dream.
I cried, “How long until the hopes that seem, Shall stand more real than the griefs that are?”
There was no answer in the chilling beam
That sought the earth as from a heedless star,
And the grey shades arose and wrapped the sun afar.

The glory of the summer on the land,
The beauty of the summer in the trees,
The earth lay open, like the hungry hand
Of Want to passing Plenty, and his fees
Of proud compassion, and the kindling seas
Made merry with the sunbeams; but I cried,
“Ah me! what pleasure in the things that please
Too much for pleasure, and for men supplied
In all too full a cup, which once were all denied.”

The sorrow of the autumn in the leaves,
 The music of sad winds upon the wood,
 Came on my heart, as something that bereaves
 Of good, and yet is dearer than the good.
 Upon the summit of my joys I stood,
 And life went floating like a mist away,
 Bright with the tears that yet in nothing could Abide, but vanished like the tints of day,
 Hung in the fading west which are too pure to stay.

This was the cycle of my discontent,
 Which ever did pursue those seasons round;
 Until my patience of the world was spent;
 And, wearied of the changing sky and ground,
 Wherein no constant purpose can be found,
 Then I looked upward from the rolling years,
 Where, Ixion-like, my life was bound,
 And saw, all glorious from His sometime tears
 His face who changes not for mortal hopes or fears.

A WORD UPON SAFEGUARDS.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

HE proverbs of this world are often supremely selfish; they often work death rather than life. It would be difficult to estimate the damage, for instance, that such wicked proverbs as these have done: "Every one for himself, and God for us all;" "Self's the man;" "Every man has his price." There are other kindred proverbs, which encourage revenge and incite to excess. But the proverbs of the Bible, by their spiritual beauty, attest its high and Divine authority; they are all such as to secure our highest well-being—such as we would wish written upon the lintels of our doors and the living pages of our hearts. There is one, for instance, which had some sort of reference to the Jewish law concerning landmarks: "Whoso breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him;" and it is related to this very subject of safeguards. What a striking suggestiveness there is in it about the hidden and stinging retribution resulting from the neglect of safeguards. A serpent—something the man does not see or think of—is hidden in the tangled copse-wood. Whilst he may be looking to see if his neighbour is watching, or if an enemy is at hand, there, deep down in the very hedge-roots will be the silent, but sure avenger of his wrong-doing!

I need scarcely say that we are all surrounded in human life by many moral hedges, and that we need them. He who says he can do without them, proves, by the very pride of the confession, that he needs them most. Remove a man from surrounding restrictions and institutions, from Sabbaths and sanctuaries, from the influence of right opinion and the salutary sway of good society, and he soon loses moral tone and influence. Our virtues are not only strengthened by example, but our vices are restrained by many small safeguards.

I am quite willing to admit all that my friend says about moral strength coming from within. I know full well that principle in the heart, and not palings in the life, is the surest protection from evil; but I am equally sure that this very principle is weakened or strengthened in proportion as we are careful of little boundaries—propriety, decency, courtesy, delicacy, and sobriety. Directly a man begins to argue that this hedge of ordinances and that hedge of custom is nothing to him, it is time to look sharply after him. Beware then how you trust him with your name, your fame, your wealth, or your child. A man must be above the human, if he can do without the safeguards which keep others right; or else below the human, if he ignores the ordinary hedges of virtue and piety. Our blessed Saviour taught us carefully to preserve, as well as diligently to plant, hedges. He would have us compass the tent of our life by the surroundings of watchfulness and prayer. He never taught us to believe that we could bear up by an invincible resolution, or meet temptation with success, unless we had guarded the soul by devotion. We are to watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation. Every broken hedge is a beginning of danger. When once the lamb leaves the sheepfold, we little know into what black and deep ravines of the wilderness it may wander. It may quickly be maimed on the rocks, or drowned in the torrents. Once out of the enclosure, the dangers in its path are thousand-fold. So in our life; once let us be persuaded that it is a little thing to break an old custom, or to neglect a known duty, and then the devil will suggest, "As well wander a mile as a yard;" and as the wily tempter excused to us our first fracture of the hedge as a very little thing, so he will turn that into a ready argument, why, having once commenced, we should go on in sin. All gross sins begin with little indelicacies; all vast impositions commence with little frauds; all black perjuries originate in little falsehoods. It is well, therefore, wisely to ponder what the first fracture of the hedge may hereafter lead to: light conversation will ere long become loose; words of exaggerated description will soon merge into equivocating statements, and promises lightly broken, will become discounted at a cheap rate, like bad or doubtful bills. Little trespasses through the hedge will at last end in making the opening a wayfarers' road.

To avoid any fracture, however trifling, in the hedge of honesty, chastity, or truthfulness, is a far sterner duty than it seems at first to be. The inspired and practical teachings of Scripture must, therefore, form our barriers against sin. The hedge will prove both useful and beautiful. God has planted it, and, like all his works, it combines the skill of wisdom with the strength of love.

It must be noticeable also to us, how minute are the elements of which a hedge is composed. See how the eager huntsman often turns aside from the high, prickly thickset hedge, through whose well-compacted branches even he cannot plunge his steed. But examine it carefully, and you will find that it is composed of little twigs. Thin and easily bent in their separateness, yet are they strong in their unity; and with prickly thorns and blended stems, they are, if not impregnable, not easily passable. Thus it will be found, when rightly examined, are the defences of the soul and the minute regulations of the Christian life. My friend may tell me that the inner principles of soul-life are few—faith, and hope, and love. Doubtless, these suffice; and in their simplicity of power lies our truest strength. Most true! and yet, to take but one of these principles—say faith—how is that trained, and nurtured, and protected from decay? Certainly by the Word of God, by meditation, by devout companionship, by religious reading, by blessed examples, and by communion with God through Christ. The east wind of scepticism may blow upon the best belief; it is wise, therefore, to keep strong the hedge of Scripture: the lion of the forest may roam through, therefore let no wandering thoughts be the open thoroughfares by which he may enter in. Every thoughtful student of life must see that he who neglects the little defences will soon surrender the citadel, and that he who breaks the hedge of delicate speech and devout demeanour, will find his fall not far off. Moral safety lies not in one act or habit, but in the mighty unity of little thoughts, and habits, and ordinances, which constitute the hedge of the Lord about the path of life.

The Divine hedge once broken, it may also be seen, is not very easily repaired. The surrounding of character, like the quickset of a hedge, is a growth: it is not like a broken wall, where you can raise the dismantled stones to their place again. Like the withered shrub, or the blighted herb, it takes some time for the life to grow again; and what watering and tending it then needs. Each man's experience tells him how attackable he is in the weakened places of his former defences. The gap remains! Some rude hurdle may be stretched across it—but the break is there. After all, you can scale the hurdle or lift it: it is not like the invincible hedge itself. Grow again perchance it will; but that growth will be conditioned by time and care. The hedge once broken, how easy is the indulgence of any wayward or wicked habit! To rule the tongue, or restrain the temper, or curb the passion, when falsehood, anger, or desire rush to the breach and take advantage of the broken hedge, is hard and hot work indeed. Christian duty, therefore, in these respects is clear! How diligently ought all men to look to their defences and the safeguards of their folds, and to thank God for Sabbaths and sanctuaries and sermons, customs of early days, memories of home, decencies of demeanour, and strictnesses of speech inculcated in life's beginning, for friends that are dead and gone, for family altars, and many more "quicksets" in the hedge of influence. All experience says, "Each man ought to preserve these safeguards, and strengthen this hedge, for it surrounds the mansion of his earthly happiness and the spiritual sanctuary of his immortal soul!"

The proverb, to which reference has been made in this paper, speaks of a bitten heel—"a serpent shall bite him." How true this description is to nature! We see no danger, and at first feel no pain. Soon, however, the ankle begins to swell; the limb becomes contorted; the tongue becomes parched;—and lo! a serpent, hidden and venomous, has bitten the heel. Type this of the penalties of sin—so silent, but so sure—so certain in their advent, and so frightful in their end! Is not this very figure used in relation to the vice of intemperance? When the hedge of sobriety is broken by the carousal and the cup, at last the sin stingeth like a serpent and biteth like an adder!

How true this is of non-attendance at the house of God—whether it be the city sanctuary, or the sweet village church. Full of wisdom is the Divine injunction, "Not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is." Behold yonder is a man who significantly said he could worship God as well in Nature—that he could be as devout in his own room—as in the church of God, and that he knew full well the rocks and reefs in the voyage of life! In one word, he simply said that church and clergy too were alike a mistake upon the part of God.

But did he worship God in green fields?—did he draw as near to the Redeemer in his private room?—had the pilot no duty to discharge towards his soul in the sanctuary?—had the shepherd no need to watch for his soul in the church? Look and see what his end has been! Did he not cease to read God's Word, and neglect to pray?—was he not in time the prey of illicit appetite and lawless desires?—was not the breach in the hedge gradually widened, until the sacred enclosure of piety became part and parcel of the common wasteland of the wicked world, no more to be distinguished as the garden of the Lord?

The same truth is seen in relation to sceptical inclinations. When one little branch is broken, another soon follows: one Christian doctrine is doubted, a second is denied, a third is disparaged. Devotion is looked upon more as having a reflex influence on the mind, than as an asking and receiving from God. Sin is looked upon rather as folly than as guilt. Eternity is thought of rather as a may-be than a must! One step further, and then the sceptic considers his former companions superstitious and their conduct righteous over-much! He wonders that his friends have never emerged into the liberty, or rather the licence, which he himself enjoys. The day comes, however, in his history, when the raven of sorrow rests upon his heart. Health fails, or some dear one dies; he is left alone then! In the worst sense, alone! Once he fought against belief, and now, what would he not give to believe? Tell him of the land where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest, and he draws his hand across his brow and looks distraught. Whisper to him of the Divine Fatherhood, and, alas! he has already said, There is no God! In the hopeless helplessness of such sorrow—in the quivering lip and the desolate heart, surely there is evidence enough—that the bitten heel follows the broken hedge.

Most manifest, however, is this truth in relation to loose and profligate habits. It is sad enough to see prodigal after prodigal taking with him his heritage of health and energy, and spending it upon the husks of sensual pleasure! Woe to those parents who see the early hedge-breaking, and merely say, "Ah! young men will be young men;" and then, with a knowing wink, add, "We sowed our wild oats once; ay, Jones?" Of all sorts of wrong, no parent can inflict worse wrong on his sons than to be guilty of utterances like these! Surely they, too, in silent hours, have felt the serpent's sting coming with the memory of dissipated days and dishonourable deeds! The serpent is in every profligate's path; his sting will come in the memories of bygone days—in the wretched, unstrung nerves—in the enfeebled body—in the lost respect—in the dread anticipations of the future judgment! None who wish to avoid serpents can take too much care of their safeguards. Banish that man at once from your table and your circle who deals in "double entendres," and whose eye suggests the evil which his speech is not bold enough to utter. He who gives up any safeguards gets corresponding sorrows. Dishonesty, injustice, wrong, trickery, or chicanery leave fractures in the hedge of principle, where the enemy will come in to avenge himself. Naboth's vineyard may be gotten, but the getter thinks not of the penalty with the property. In all life we have need to remember that no one can really hurt us save ourselves. All other harm is seeming, but not real. It cannot touch the me! It may reach to our fame, or our estate, or our person; but it cannot maim me. God is no respecter of persons. "Whoso breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him." King David shall suffer as much as his meanest subject, and afterwards all his bones will be out of joint. The Divine law takes no cognisance of riches or rank. We are all temptable, or, as the old divines used to say, we are all peccable; and, depend upon it, we shall all be peccant, too, in the worst sense, unless we keep the hedge of God's inspired Word about our path, and tend it well with watchfulness and prayer. Tend your safeguard, and you secure your soul. "Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments." "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy Word."

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

MARKED FOR THE AXE.

DAYS passed over Delaube before the shadow of death was lifted from the house; but at length a respite came. Whether by the prompt use of remedies, or by the power of nature, Gilbert Oglivie came back to conscious life.

Though never again to rise from the bed on which he lay, the doctor had pronounced it possible that he might still have years before him, and on that possibility his grandchild set about ordering the affairs of the little household.

In the dim dawn of consciousness, it was that tender face of hers that hovered over him, and carried a soothing influence even into his dreams. When he came out of the shadow, she was by his side; when he looked at her with eyes of recognition, and murmured, "Is that you, little one?" it hardly needed her exclamation of gladness to assure him that one, at least, welcomed him back to life.

"Oh, I am so glad!" she had cried; and, after a pause, he answered, in a broken whisper, "I did not think to live to make any one glad that I should still live on, little one."

From that day, Gilbert Oglivie was changed. He had never been impatient with Peggy, who was now his nurse and constant companion; but all impatience, all moroseness and gloom, seemed gone from him. He had grown gentle and easily guided as a little child.

Meantime, Jean crept about the house in a feeble and dejected way, as unlike her former self as possible. She was one of those people who can bear any amount of bodily burdens, but who sink under responsibilities of a more serious kind. Poor old Tammas had become utterly unfit for outdoor work; the oats had perished—were rotting on the field; winter was close at hand; and, unless immediate steps were taken to procure a fresh supply, both food and fire would fail them. This was a rather dismal prospect in a house which might be snowed up for six weeks at a time.

One day Peggy wanted something for her grandfather which Jean's limited larder could not supply, and when the anxious nurse ventured to suggest that it might be procured in the village, "Where's the siller to come frae?" burst from the old woman's lips, with a sob of grief and impatience; and sitting down on a chair, she threw her apron over her head, and, for the first time in Peggy's experience, began to cry.

"You're ill and tired, Jean," said her young mistress, laying a caressing hand on the old woman's shoulder, on which she uncovered her face, and saying, testily, "I'm no ill, and I'm no tired," proceeded to lay bare the utter poverty to which they were reduced—the starvation which stared them in the face.

"Has grandfather no money at all, Jean?"

"It's a' done long syne," was the answer. "He told me himsel', the last time I spoke to him about something that was wanted. I thought o' speakin' to him about sellin' some o' the wood again: he did that when Mr. Louis was here. The belt at the foot of the hill was cut doon then; but I was feared to speak to him for puttin' him in a passion, and then this illness came on, and——"

"I'm not afraid to speak to him, Jean," interrupted Peggy; she might have added, no one need fear him now. "I'll ask him what we had better do at once."

The result of this little scene was, that Peggy was empowered to sell as much of the wood as was needful. It had not disturbed her grandfather to be told of the necessity, as she had told him, with her small hand resting in his, and her fearless smile of trust and confidence shining on him. They were not far apart, these two now. The human relation was being merged in a divine relation in which the elder was as the younger.

Peggy lost no time in going down into the village, and taking her way to the shop of Mr. John Frazer, wheelwright and carpenter. A gig stood at the door of the shop, and within stood the wright himself, up to the knees in shavings, talking to a tall old gentleman, who appeared to be waiting while one of the men examined the wheels of the vehicle, with which something had gone amiss.

Seeing that there was a pause made for her, Peggy stated her business in the simplest way; and the wright, with a great deal of deliberation, informed her that he was not in immediate want of the timber, but would like to have a look at it, nevertheless. If it served his purpose, he might possibly buy it, and find a use for it some time or other. She replied that he might come and look at it at once—the sooner the better, as it was to be sold without delay: and on this he promised to come that very afternoon, if she liked.

The man was a keen buyer, and he smelt a bargain, which was sufficient to tempt him if he had needed the article less than he did. She accepted the promise with thanks, and took her departure.

The wright saw his visitor very politely to the shop-door, watched her a little way up the street, and then, turning to the gentleman, who had witnessed the interview, said, "That's Miss Oglivie o' Delaube; ye'll maybe no' ken her, for she's lived like a hermit up on the hill there a' her life. They maun be ill off, I fear," he added, "or they would na' cut doon the wud."

If the wright had been observing his companion instead of his visitor, he would have noticed a variety of strange expressions passing over his handsome, but usually quite unreadable, face. He had fixed his eyes with the keenest scrutiny on Peggy, as soon as she named the wood of Delaube, and his feelings had varied from vindictiveness to exultation; the latter was uppermost while he listened to the last words. He could have laughed aloud. He was exulting over the man who had wronged him. He had triumphed at last.

But his face wore its usual mask of strong determination, as he said, in reply, "I'll buy the wood, John—as much of it as they like to sell."

"You're very kind, Mr. Haldane," said the wright, rather irrelevantly, it might seem, but wishing to make his listener believe that he thought it was out of compassion he was about to make the purchase.

"It's out o' no kindness," replied Mr. Haldane, roughly; "I want it, man."

It was very easy to see that he meant what he said. John Frazer saw the bargain slipping through his fingers; but Haldane was his oldest and best customer, and not to be gainsaid, so, with the best possible grace, he acquiesced in the proposal that he should go over that afternoon and make a valuation of the wood to be sold, to be purchased by that gentleman.

"Make it as fair as if you were the seller and me the buyer, John," said Mr. Haldane; and it was clear he was in earnest in that too.

"Weel, weel," answered Mr. John Frazer, "there's naeboddy to look after things but that bit lassie, only it's no every ane that would deal sae kindly by her."

John's little bit of flattery had not the usual effect of relaxing the somewhat stern features of his customer. In truth, it had irritated him almost beyond control, and he took his leave in a not over-genial manner. David Haldane did not find his triumph wholly pleasant to him—it would have been the worse for him if he could. He knew quite well that this unrelenting hate was a black spot in his soul, and the only good about it was, that he did not attempt to whitewash it. He knew it to be a black spot, and when Mr. Keith would have had him become an elder of the kirk, the man of blameless life and high integrity, with an eye to that black spot, had answered, resolutely, “No.”

David Haldane the younger was at a loss to understand the restlessness which had seized his uncle on that particular afternoon. The former sat working at his desk, the latter had taken to pacing up and down the counting-room, with his hands behind his back. At length the old gentleman fairly startled his nephew, causing a long column of figures, just at the summit, to topple over in his brain by halting abruptly before his desk and saying, suddenly, “Would £300 a year satisfy you?”

“For the present perfectly,” replied the young man, quickly recovering from the irritation and confusion of the overthrow, and much astonished at the inopportune time which his uncle had chosen for his announcement.

“I mean to add a house to live in,” continued that personage, “if it’s all right about the ledgy.” The younger David smiled, thanked him, and turned to his books again.

Having paced up and down a little longer, the old man came to halt again, as abruptly as before, and asked his nephew a question more startling still. “What would you think of Delaube for a place to live at? you know the house, an easy ride from here,” he said.

Had he guessed anything? It was not much, his nephew knew, that could be hidden from those keen old eyes. But the young man replied, after the most approved manner of his country, by asking another question. “What in the world has put Delaube in your head?”

“It’ll soon be in the market, or I’m mista’en,” answered his uncle, and went on to say that he was there and then waiting for John Frazer in order to accompany him thither, and make a valuation of the wood for sale.

Young David’s heart beat with great strokes against his side. On the impulse of the moment he was about to offer to go with his uncle, but just then one of the men came in to say that John Frazer was waiting outside. With a nod to his nephew, the old man hastened away, leaving the former evidently infected with his restless mood.

When Mr. Haldane and John Frazer reached Delaube, they stopped at the foot of the hill, and the latter alone went up to the house, from which he speedily issued again, accompanied by Peggy. They prepared at once for the work before them, Mr. Haldane taking out his notebook, and the wright furnishing himself with a pot of paint and a brush, which he had brought with him in the gig. And first they took a walk round the hill to get a general view of the wood. Mr. Haldane was very silent, but he could not help saying a few words to the fair girl who led them through it, and pointed out so patiently the finest trees she knew; he could not help looking at her, and seeing that she looked sad as well as patient. And the sadness gave her face—which seemed made for smiles instead of tears—an appealing expression, which melted the old man’s frozen manner into something very like kindness; and to kindness from any living creature, Peggy responded like a flower to sunshine.

The last place she led them to was her favourite spot, her wood-chapel, and they had no sooner entered the grove than Mr. Haldane said, “We had better begin here. These are well-grown trees, are they not?”

His companion assented. Peggy stood beside them, white and trembling.

“What do you say, Miss Oglivie?” the wright asked, appealing to her; “may we begin here?”

“If it is all the same,” she said, “I—I wish you would leave these.”

It was not the “woodman spare that tree” sort of sentiment that prompted the eager words. It seemed to her that the place resolved her painful doubts. She could not bear the thought that it should be swept away. It stood there as a witness for her. It would be easier to believe in faithlessness if it suffered change.

Mr. Haldane was about to insist that these were the very trees he wanted, but, looking sharply at Peggy, he met the appealing look, and desisted.

“It is quite the same where we begin,” he said; and they went farther round the hill.

At length, tree after tree appeared marked for the axe with a ring of white paint round the bole; and Mr. Haldane, who had kept summing up aloud the value of the wood, stopped at the sum which Peggy had named, as the extent of the sale. It was only twenty pounds; but wood was cheap in that part of the country, and a goodly number of tall firs had been doomed for this. The purchaser was ready to take more, and Peggy gladly arranged to let him know when any further sale was decided on. He was also ready to hand over the purchase money on the spot; but he wanted a formal receipt, and, not wishing to trouble her grandfather more than could be helped, she asked him to be kind enough to send it ready for signature. This he promised to do, insisting, at the same time, on her receiving the money.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

WITHIN four narrow, bare, and, it must be confessed, very dirty walls, the manager of the print-works pursued his experiments in colour. It was generally in the mornings and evenings that he occupied himself in this way, often working both early and late, while the day was consumed in general superintendence.

On the evening of the day on which his uncle had made him the offer of an income, handsome enough in those days and in that part of the country, he had retired to this inelegant, and not inodorous, sanctum. But the young manager was not as usual busy with his bottles and his powders. He was sitting idly swinging in his chair, earnestly contemplating a fierce little fire that burnt on the hearth at his feet. He wore a look of intense and pleasant occupation nevertheless. It was with substances more ethereal than pigments, however, that he was engaged. He was mixing the ideal colours of his future life, and the predominant one at present appeared to be couleur de rose. He might seem to be looking straight at a dirty bit of plaster, but between him and it there was a world of beauty and of love, and in its charmed centre the face which alone could radiate for him the sunshine of life.

The manager had had a very late night, but it had been necessary for him to get to work again early on the succeeding morning. He had been at it for several hours indeed, when he was called out of his sanctum to see after something in another part of the works. As it was only across the court, however, he left the key in his private door, which was never left unlocked save when he was either within or near at hand.

He had only been gone a few minutes when he returned, and there, like a realisation of his dreams of the night before, seated in the single chair of his inhospitable den, was Peggy Oglivie. She had asked for Mr. Haldane, and the porter had concluded that it must be the younger she wanted, and, finding the key in the door, had ushered her into the sanctum, and hastened in search of him. She was looking round on the shelf of huge volumes lettered "Patterns," and at the assortment of bottles of all sizes, and shapes, and colours which stood about, when he entered.

She rose as he did so, and he met her grave, sweet smile with a rather embarrassed air. It is always trying to meet our dreams in the morning light. Moreover, David Haldane was but a man, and he remembered that he had on a very shabby old coat, and could not help seeing that his hands were not over clean. He looked, it must be owned, rather awkward and constrained as he held out the dirtiest of the hands to show that it was not fit to be taken.

Her smile in return was quite re-assuring, though it might not have been so to a vainer man. She was not likely to notice either his coat or his hands. But her frank eyes looked at himself in an altogether unembarrassed, and therefore unembarrassing, way, as she said, "Good morning," and added, "I have been wondering what you have got in these strange bottles."

"I hope you have resisted any curiosity as to their contents," he replied, recovering himself completely; "there is enough in them to poison half Bleaktown. It is here that I experiment on colours and washes," he explained.

Before he could say anything further, she had taken a folded paper from a little black silk bag which she carried in her hand, and now presented it to him. He unfolded it mechanically.

"This is for my uncle, not for me," he said, seeing a receipt, written out in his uncle's half-text hand, signed by Gilbert Oglivie.

"A lad brought it last night, and was to wait for the signature," she answered; "but my grandfather was asleep, and I could not awake him, so I brought it here myself. I should like very much to see the works," she added.

Nothing loath, and telling her that he must lock up that Bluebeard's closet of his, he led her out and shut the door, and taking the key in his hand, proceeded to guide her through the rambling buildings. He took her first through the lower floors, where streams of water were running and pouring in all directions, with men and boys paddling about in them, some with bare feet, and some with clattering wooden shoes, while they transferred long webs of wet stuff from one huge vat to another. Now and then he stopped to explain something, as she stepped daintily over the wet floors; but she only shook her head at him till they were out in the court again.

"It's so confusing," she said, when they were clear of the swishing and splashing. "Is it always like that in there?"

He did not know the drift of her question, and laughed as he answered, "Yes, except that it's sometimes worse."

He had led her through the drying-rooms, where she felt suffocated with the furnace-heat, and then through the printing-rooms, where she could not hear her own voice for the deafening clatter of the blocks, and as yet he knew nothing of the impression it was making on her. He only knew that he was unspeakably happy in having her near him.

Passing through the counting-room and wareroom, they came to a light, airy apartment, whose windows commanded a view of the river, the meadow and the woods beyond. The workers here were few, and the place free of all noise and confusion. It was here that the artistic element of the work was elaborated. At one end of the room a few men were engaged in drawing, or rather copying patterns, while the rest were carving out the wooden blocks used in printing.

"I am obliged to go Glasgow or Manchester, and sometimes even to Paris for designs," he said, as they looked over a book together; "and these we must adapt to the taste of our customers. I might have done something in this department myself," he added, "for I am fond of designing; but there is so much to see after that I have no time."

"You will think me very vain, but I am sure I could improve on this," she said, pointing to one of the designs.

"It is not so easy as it seems," he answered, "to produce something new without being strange, and simple without being tiresome. Look at the hideous things which novelty alone produces, and the stupidity which is the result of want of invention;" and he put before her some dress-patterns. One resembled nothing so much as a brown crab sprawling over a white ground, and another was an ugly miniature of a cabbage rose, leafless and stalkless.

"I am quite sure I could draw prettier patterns than these," she repeated.

"You would make plenty of money if you could," he replied.

"Will you let me try?" she asked, cagerly.

"Certainly, and be very glad if you can succeed," he answered.

She was evidently quite in earnest, and was soon engaged in a practical study of the best style then in vogue.

The teacher was now as eager as the scholar, for a few strokes of her pencil convinced him of her taste and skill; and it had at length dawned upon him—slow to perceive a personal advantage even in his love—that a new and pleasant path of communication had been opened up between him and the almost inaccessible maiden whom it had been his fate to love.

As they descended the stair—for Peggy speedily remembered that nothing ought to detain her longer from her post at home—they encountered old Mr. Haldane. He was coming out of the door which led from the house into that part of the works; and when his nephew told him that Miss Oglvie had come to deliver the receipt in person, seeing that the visit was to him, he stepped back with his natural courtesy, and ushered her into the room he had left. She sat down for a moment in the chair he proffered, till he had examined the paper; then she rose and pleaded the illness of her grandfather, as an excuse for hurrying away, offering him on his own hearth her gentle thanks, and her friendly little hand, till he fairly forgot that she was an Oglvie of the Oglvies—forgot, as he looked after her crossing to the gate with his nephew, who had waited to conduct her, and thought what a handsome pair they made, she with her girlish grace and unmistakable ladyhood, and he with his manly vigour and beauty. Then he remembered, and turned from the window with something that sounded like a curse. "I would see him in his grave first! I would sink all I have laboured for at the bottom of the sea!" he muttered, as if in answer to the possibility that entered his mind at that moment. But he put it aside the next, little dreaming that on that possibility his nephew had already staked the happiness of his life, and was ready to lose in pursuit of it anything else fortune or his uncle had to offer.

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—IV.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

PHILIP THE PEEVISH.

DON'T like that; it isn't half so nice as the one I had before," said Edith Everley, in a whining voice, throwing down on the table a little sofa, intended for a doll's house.

Grandmamma entered the room at the moment, and putting her hand on Edith's shoulder, said, "Why, Edith, I thought papa had come back a little boy to me; that was just his voice, when I used to call him 'Philip the Peevish.' Aunt Maude had a name given her, and I thought he deserved one as much. Come and hear about him, and forget this small annoyance, whatever it is."

"Yes, grandmamma," answered Edith, though still turning about the little toy with a dissatisfied air.

"What is it that has disturbed my little girl?" said Mrs. Everley, kindly.

"Why, Hannah stamped on my little sofa I bought to carry home for my drawing-room in the doll's house; and she's bought this in place of it, and it isn't half so nice."

"Perhaps not, love; but as it was quite right of Hannah to try to replace what she destroyed, and as her means are not very large, you can but thank her graciously, and make the best of the little toy; which is, after all, better than none. Whining over and grumbling at the one won't bring back the other. What is not to be remedied it is wisest and best to bear cheerfully. So, come now, and bring your stool beneath the ash, and hear about papa."

Nothing could more readily have dispersed the clouds from Edith's face than this suggestion; and leaving the little sofa to take care of itself, or share the fate of its predecessor, Edith went off into the garden with grandmamma.

"Then this is to be 'Philip the Peevish,'" she said, settling herself comfortably on her stool. "Will you name them all, grandma? It reminds me of the kings, William the Lion, and Philip the Fair, and so on."

"Their names must come with their histories; we must be getting on with our story of to-day, or we shall not have time to finish it."

"All right, granny; I'm listening. 'Philip the Peevish.'"

"Well, Philip had the misfortune to have a nurse who loved him too much; she came to him when he was a poor little sickly baby, and nursed him so tenderly and lovingly, that she was the earthly means, no doubt, of saving his life. Of course, this endeared him greatly to her, and none of the other children, though she loved them all very much, could ever compare in her mind with this darling boy. An affront to him was one to her; and much as she loved me too, she never could forgive me if I ventured to punish or find fault with this idolised child.

"I soon saw the nice harvest she was sowing for herself, and also how she was making my boy the fretful, peevish child he became, and warned her incessantly. I really believe she tried to do as I wished her, and flattered herself she did not spoil the child; but his tears broke down every resolve, and made her give way to him directly. He soon saw this, and became a perfect tyrant to her. If it had not been for the counteracting influence of myself and his father, he would have been quite ruined; but I, Edith, saw through my spectacles the wretched, discontented, fretful spirit which would come of this pandering to his whims; how the little, complaining, whining voice, so often heard in the nursery, would soon grow habitual, and that as he grew older, the impossibility to procure all he desired would render him, not only miserable, but lead to breaking the commandment which bids us not covet or desire other men's goods. What was to be done? To part with nurse, whom we all loved and respected, and who was a second mother to the children, was not to be thought of; to take the boy from her care, equally impossible; he was too young for school, and she would have broken her heart to see any one else have the care of him. It was the subject of much thought and anxiety to me; but I could only come to the conclusion of having him as much as possible with me, to which arrangement she never objected, as she delighted in having him noticed, and taken down-stairs. At first he thought it a great treat; but soon finding each little peevish whim was not attended to, he wanted to return again to the nursery, and I had hard battles to fight to keep him with me. In vain I reasoned with him: the miserable, 'I want this;' 'I don't like that;' 'I'm tired of this toy;' 'I want Nursey,' was for ever sounding in one's ears. At length I thought of an expedient to break him of this wretched trick. Remember, he was very little at the time, and by no means a sharp child of his age, or my plan might not have succeeded as well as it did."

"Oh, granny! what did you do?" said Edith, rubbing her hands with delight. "Go on."

"Well, Edith, one day when poor little Philip had been, as usual, very fretful, I said: 'Philip, I have tried in vain to break you of your foolish, fretful ways,—of that peevish manner of asking for things, and crying for what you cannot have. Now I have heard of a person who undertakes to cure little people of their faults; I fear you will not like her way so well as mine; and, moreover, Philip, she has the most enormous spectacles, through which the faults she sees are so magnified—made so much bigger, you know—that she punishes them severely, according to the size they seem to her. I have sent for her to-day that you may see her, and judge for yourself, whether you would like to have her always with you, instead of dear Nursey. This naughty peevishness is the result of poor nurse's over-kindness, and it is an ungrateful return to her. I must see. I shall ring now, and desire Mrs. Whipwell to come up.' Accordingly I rang the bell, and desired the servant to show up Mrs. Whipwell, if she had come."

"'Yes,' the maid said, 'she had been waiting some time."

"With wide-open eyes, the tears still wet on his cheek from a fit of crying for something I had refused him, Philip waited, I have no doubt, with mingled anxiety and curiosity, for the entrance of the terrific Mrs. Whipwell. A heavy tread was soon heard outside, and the door opening, admitted a gigantic woman, carrying in one hand a rod, in the other a coil of rope, and from a leathern bag hanging on her arm, there peeped a number of books, which looked like school-books. Her bonnet was of black silk, in which was bright scarlet flowers; her shawl was scarlet and black; her gown was black; and her hair, or rather wig, as it appeared, was black, done in large formal curls; and on her nose rested the largest pair of spectacles I ever beheld."

"'Be seated, Mrs. Whipwell,' I said; 'this is the little boy about whom I have told you.'

"In a deep, harsh voice, Mrs. Whipwell answered, 'I see him, ma'am; he is big enough to know better than to cry, as he has just been doing, for what he was not allowed to have.'

"Poor little Philip drew near to me, and took hold of my hand."

"'He appears but a little fellow to us, Mrs. Whipwell,' I said, 'but I have no doubt through your wonderful glasses he seems big enough to suffer the punishment due to the faults which also seem big to you, and which certainly are very annoying to us. I have merely troubled you to come to-day to see him, and tell me if you can see what his faults are, and if you can cure them, supposing I am obliged to call on you.'

"'Certainly,' replied Mrs. Whipwell; and staring hard at him, she said, 'I can see a peevish, discontented child, growing up into a snarling, fretful man, who will be shunned by all; but I can see that if he begins at once to try, it is possible to overcome these naughty ways himself.'

"'And do you think that if we fail in correcting him, you could break him, Mrs. Whipwell?' I asked, smiling to myself, as the poor child drew closer and closer to me."

"'Yes, ma'am, I believe I could; this rod, or this rope, has seldom failed to master very obstinate cases; these books, which are very excellent ones, on geography, grammar, history, botany, chronology, ornithology, geology, conchology, keep them employed during the intervals of whipping; and I assure you, madam, at the end of a week, I have known a thoroughly fretful, discontented, peevish child, pleased with the commonest toys, happy and cheerful if only permitted to pursue the simplest amusement, which before he had thought dull and stupid. Oh! yes, ma'am, I could cure him; I could cure him, I make no doubt.'

"'Well, then,' I said, 'I have your address, and I will write and fix the day for you to come. I think we might give the little boy a week's trial.'

"Yes, ma'am, certainly; in a week we cannot expect him to cure himself entirely; but we can see whether he is trying to do so. You will certainly be able by that time to judge whether you will require my services or not. Tuesday next, ma'am, then, I may expect to hear from you,' continued Mrs. Whipwell, rising. 'And remember, if you please,' she said, in a deep, clear voice, 'no person—no nurse; no mother—must interfere with me. When once I have the charge of him, he is mine altogether.'

"Oh, decidedly, Mrs. Whipwell. Good day. I shall be sure to write.' And, with a majestic bow, Mrs. Whipwell left the room.

"Oh! mamma, mamma!" cried poor little Philip, 'I will—I will be good. Don't, pray, let that horrid woman come. I won't cry or be peevish, indeed, mamma.'

"Well, my boy,' I said, kissing him, 'I should be very sorry to have her for you, and if I see you really trying, she shall not come; but you must make up your mind really to try.'

"And did he try, granny?" eagerly asked Edith.

"He did, Edith, and succeeded so well that, at the end of the week, we were able to promise him he should not be given up to Mrs. Whipwell's tender mercies."

"But, granny, she wasn't real, was she?"

"Real, dear!" said granny, laughing; "yes, of course; real substantial flesh and blood."

"Ah! but I mean it was somebody dressed up."

"Well, perhaps it was? Can you guess who?"

"Grandpapa?"

"No."

"The nurse?"

"Oh dear no; she was a little woman, this was a gigantic person."

"Oh, I know, I know; that fanny man that called himself Hunguffin."

"Quite right, Edie; it was Uncle Roger, and, through his so kindly helping me in my scheme, papa lost all claim to the title of Philip the Peevish.

THE OVER

— Saturday, November 30, 1867. —

REDCLIFFE CHURCH, BRISTOL.

CANYNGE THE MERCHANT, PENN THE ADMIRAL, AND CHATTERTON THE "MARVELLOUS BOY."

THOSE of our readers who have pushed through the close, crowded, commercial and manufacturing Redcliffe Street, Bristol, will remember how Redcliffe Church gradually reveals its varied beauty and magnificence to the beholder. The rich tower, the west front, the noble north porch, and the elevation of the building, above the busy world at its feet, combine to justify the proud description of "the finest parish church in England." Nor is the beauty all outside; the interior is an architectural poem, full of that suggestive power which stirs the imagination and calls up a thousand rich associations. That long vista of sculptured stone, the "high embowed roof," the antique and graceful pillars, have all the impressiveness of true poetry. Then the question will arise, who founded this noble pile? Is an answer confidently given? Yes. In the streets of the old city you will, very likely, be told that William Canynge, "the richest merchant of Bristol," built St. Mary, Redcliffe. Perhaps some may add that Simon de Burton, Mayor of Bristol, began to build in 1292, and William Canynge the Elder finished about 1370. This seems so careful a decision that most are disposed to receive it, and depart, marvelling much that two Bristol merchants should have been able to raise so glorious a monument. Not two, however, but a dozen names may claim to be registered on the founders' roll. Besides Burton, William Canynge, Senior, and William Canynge, Junior, there are the Harringtons, Hungerfords, Cradocks, Medes, Sturtons, Dryicks, Says, Grants, Cheyneys, Fulks, Fitzwarrens, Straffords, Berkleys, and Montacutes, who aided, at various times, in the erection of the church.

Redcliffe Church contains the monuments of two once famous men. On the canopied tomb, under the centre window of the south transept, lies the figure of a man clad in mayor's robes, whose epitaph speaks more of earth than of heaven. We are told that he was "the richest merchant in Bristol," that he was five times mayor, employed 800 workmen, and was the owner of nine ships, the names and tonnage of which are carefully given. We also learn that, about seven years before his death, he took orders. This was William Canynge the Younger, so famous in Bristol annals. The merchant did not trust to sentimental emotions for the preservation of his name; he left a good round sum for the celebration of his funeral, with due pomp, and also for prayers and the burning of wax tapers. In the year 1470, four years before his death, he gave to Redcliffe Church a collection of presents, the very mention of which sounds like profanity, and bewilders a Protestant of the nineteenth century. What can the reader make of the following items?—"an image of God Almighty," a "heaven made of timber." This was matched by a "hell made of timber." After this item, we have, quite appropriately, "devils to the number of thirteen." No attempt is made to explain this odd number, making a baker's dozen. What could such images and apparatus be intended for? Simply to furnish the "Easter sepulchre," and form part of that singular Easter puppet-show, by which the ecclesiastics of the age tried to set before the eyes of the rude people the facts connected with the resurrection of the Saviour. Such was the ritualism of old times.

The reader may here be fitly reminded, that near the Canynge monument the child Chatterton was accustomed to sit, forming, amid the solemn stillness of the church, the strange fancies which took their final shape in the "poems of Rowley."

The south transept contains the monument of the once renowned admiral, William Penn, father of the famous founder of Pennsylvania. Here are contrasts! The father, a man of war, rests in one of England's noblest churches; the son, the apostle of a peace society, sleeps in a secluded burial-ground amidst the solitudes of the Buckinghamshire hills. The emblems of battle are on the tomb of the one, the wild heath forms a wreath on the grass-covered grave of the other. Torn banners and a rusty sword speak of the father's deeds; a flourishing colony and a noble city beyond the Atlantic proclaim the fame of the son. The monument of the admiral, nevertheless, whispers of peace. We are told that, at the last, he, "with a gentle and even gale, arrived and anchored in his last and best port," on the 16th of September, 1674.

But St. Mary, Redcliffe, is linked with another name, which invests the ancient pile with a peculiar mystery. This church was one of the schools of the boy Thomas Chatterton. Had we seen that strange-looking Bristol Blue-coat boy sitting by the tomb of Canynge, we might have deemed him a truant idler; yet that child lived to perplex wits, sages, and scholars, and then died, a starving suicide, in a London garret.

It may seem superfluous to say that Thomas Chatterton was born on the 20th November, 1752, educated in the mere elements of learning at Colston's Blue-coat school, and apprenticed to Mr. Lambert, a Bristol attorney, from whom he parted in wrath in 1770. Surely all this is commonplace enough: a birth, a charity school, an apprenticeship, and a quarrel with a master. Is not that the ordinary prose of every-day life? Yes; but now look at the poetry underneath. At the age of six years and a half, the sleeping mind of the boy was awakened by the sight of an ancient manuscript brought from the muniment-room in Redcliffe Church. "He fell in love with it," said his mother; and from that moment his young heart was wedded to romance. The bride was fair to behold, but she carried in her hand the cypress and the yew. The child now quickly learned to read, and old books soon became the gods of his heart. The Saturday's half-holiday was a day of strange work. A small room in his mother's house had come to be regarded as the boy's own, in which he kept what the poor wondering relations called "his rubbish." Yes, it did look very much like rubbish: a large piece of ochre, some charcoal-powder, black-lead dust, and sheets of old parchment. It seemed as if he were endeavouring to imitate the writing and figures seen on the old documents in Redcliffe Church, and to give the appearance of antiquity to new parchments. How dirty he did make himself on those Saturday afternoons! No wonder that poor Mrs. Chatterton was angered, almost beyond endurance, by the grimy appearance of her son at tea on Saturdays. Perhaps the boy Chatterton thus came in time to muse: "If I, a poor Blue-coat boy, declare these antique-looking poems which I have written to be mine, nobody will notice them; if I say they were found by me amidst heaps of ancient and long-neglected parchments in the old chests in the Redcliffe muniment-room, curiosity will certainly lead the antiquaries and lovers of mediæval poetry to read, and perhaps to admire."

Full of this idea, he began his extraordinary course of literary forgery, before his sixteenth year. In September, 1768, the new bridge at Bristol was finished, and in that month the readers of Felix Farley's Bristol Journal read something startling. A short poem, written in old English, appeared in the newspaper, containing a vivid description of the opening of the old bridge, three centuries before. Who had written it? The rumour ran that the author was a Bristol monk of the fifteenth century, named Rowley, chaplain in the family of the great merchant, William Canynge. Where had so remarkable a document lain hidden so long? Who had discovered it? The queries were slowly answered. The boy Chatterton had discovered the ancient MS. in an old chest, where the Canynge records had long been kept. More could not be learned from Chatterton, though the very dons of Bristol questioned him in the style magisterial and mood imperative. The youth turned sulky, and refused to answer any more questions. Here was a nice problem for antiquaries! an ancient poem discovered by a poor boy; a poet, too, of high power, whose very name had been unknown to the old chroniclers. It was most puzzling. No one, of course, suggested that Chatterton might have written the whole himself. The notion was absurd; a poor Blue-coat boy, working in an attorney's office, exhibit such a power of painting the olden times, and with all the old colouring too! Certainly not.

Chatterton next appears as the discoverer of ancient histories. Mr. Barrett, a surgeon of Bristol, was engaged in compiling a history of the famous city. Chatterton brought the anxious topographer copies of ancient documents, which threw a flood of light over the dark ages of Bristol. What could be more fortunate? the precious accounts were duly printed, and may be read in Barrett's "History of Bristol."

To the monk Rowley was ascribed the authorship of all. The boy had previously played off a less serious, but personally a more provoking, trick upon a Bristol tradesman named Burgum. The gentleman had a great reverence for titles and pedigrees. Imagine, then, Burgum's ecstasy of delight when the Blue-coat boy gravely showed him a document, entitled "An Account of the Family of De Bergham from the Norman Conquest." Here was honour! Mr. Burgum's heart and purse were opened; he gave Chatterton five shillings for linking him with the chivalry of Normandy! The boy in a short time, not only brought a supplement to the first pedigree, but a poem written in the time of Edward II., by a John de Bergham. After the strange boy's sad end, a harrowing suspicion seized Mr. Burgum, and he rushed with his pedigree to the Heralds' College. We will not describe the information there politely and coolly given; we beseech the reader to imagine it.

This was not the only family tree designed by the Bristol Blue-coat boy. Mr. Stephens, breeches-maker, of Salisbury, wished to ascertain his coat-of-arms. Chatterton gratified the gentleman, and also informed him, with due heraldic gravity, that he, the said breeches-maker, was descended from "Stephen, Earl of Aummerle, in 1095." Our readers will not forget that much knowledge of old history, and no slight acquaintance with heraldry, were necessary to give such fictitious documents the appearance of truth.

But Chatterton had higher aims than the invention of pedigrees. He informed a leading publisher, in 1768, of the existence of "the oldest dramatic piece extant," written by one Rowley. Surely a London publisher would nibble, if not bite, at such a bait. No answer came; and the ambitious Bristol youth took a bold step. He sent to Horace Walpole a packet of manuscripts, on "The Rise of Painting in England," declaring them to be the work of Rowley, a priest of the fifteenth century. Here was something indeed. Who was this Mr. Chatterton, the fortunate discoverer of such precious relics? perhaps a quiet, affluent, literary gentleman, living in elegant seclusion near Bristol, like Walpole himself at Twickenham. A polite and most complimentary answer was sent to Chatterton, in which some natural inquiries were made respecting the original manuscripts. The youth now probably thought the road to fame was open, and informed the fashionable and fastidious Walpole that he was but an attorney's apprentice, eager to devote himself to a literary life. He also forwarded more ancient manuscripts, in which three poets, unknown before, made their appearance. Matters had now become provoking and mysterious. Here was no gentleman after all, but an unknown attorney's apprentice claiming the protection and patronage of Strawberry Hill! But were the manuscripts really written by this strange Rowley? Walpole was puzzled, and called in the aid of his two poetic friends, Mason and Gray. They pronounced the poems to be clever forgeries, and Walpole wrote a cool note to Chatterton, advising him to attend to his business and become a thriving attorney. The proud spirit of the youth was stung. He soon after quarrelled with his master, who deemed him insane, and determined to go to London, where he declared fame and fortune would be found. Some friends subscribed a few guineas, he had received promises of engagements from London publishers, and the prospect was not in reality very dark. The youth, having reached the metropolis, lodged first in Shoreditch, and afterwards in Brooke Street, Holborn. His conduct was now extraordinary; he wrote home declaring himself to be on the high road to fame and fortune. In one letter he exultingly cries out, "Bravo, boys! up we go!" in another, written about a month before his death, he says, "My company is courted everywhere," and speaks of himself as the intimate associate of eminent persons. Yet during a great part of this time he was on the verge of absolute want. He had, indeed, obtained access to publishers, and his pocket-book contains various entries of sums paid for articles in magazines; but time was wanted to work his way, and starvation was gradually approaching. He lodged, during the last ten weeks of his life, at No. 4, Brooke Street, Holborn, in a "garret-room," where his landlady, "Mrs. Angel, sack-maker,"* gradually awoke to the conviction that her young and strange lodger was in a sad state of poverty. The weekly rent was indeed paid to the day, but the signs of want could not be mistaken. One loaf lasted him for a week, and a stale one was always bought. Two days before death came, the baker refused even the stale loaf, until three shillings and sixpence, then due, were paid. That money was found. A little more must have been obtained, as the next day the young man purchased from Mr. Cross, a neighbouring chemist, a little arsenic "for an experiment!" When about to go up to his room that evening, August 24th, Mrs. Angel was struck by a peculiar gentleness in his manner, and by his kissing her when he bade "good night." The next morning, the young Bristol poet, the author of Rowley's poems, was found dead, a suicide, in his eighteenth year. Alone, he had dreamed when a child, in Redcliffe Church; alone, he had toiled over his parchments in his little room in his mother's house; and alone, he died in the heart of London. The state of his room spoke plainly of the bitter and resentful feelings which agitated his spirit in his last mortal hour. His papers were torn into fragments and scattered about the room, and on one small piece were the words: "My curse to Bristol." Yet in that city his mother and sister were then rejoicing in his prosperity, and looking for the meeting at Christmas, which he had promised them. The people of his native place had often called him "mad," and the coroner's jury brought in a verdict of felo de se. The printed report of the inquest has been declared to be a forgery. Even the grave of the unfortunate poet has been matter for discussion. Where is he buried? In the workhouse burial-ground, Shoe Lane, say the greater number, and Mr. Godwin produces an entry from the burial-register, which seems decisive:—"August 28th, 1770, William Chatterton, Brooke Street." Some one has added the words "the poet." Every part of this entry agrees with the fact except the "William," instead of Thomas. But others assert that the body is really buried in Redcliffe churchyard, relying on a positive statement said to have been made by the mother of Chatterton—that the corpse was brought to Bristol by wagon, and buried at night by Phillips the sexton. The grave is said to have been made on the "right hand of the lime-tree standing in the middle of the paved walk." It would certainly be more pleasant to believe that the bones of "the marvellous boy" rests near the places which first moved his imaginative mind, than that the bones were scattered long ago, when the market was built on the Shoe Lane burial-ground.

After the death of Chatterton, a furious controversy arose. Had the remarkable poems been really written by the monk Rowley? This was maintained by Dean Miller, the antiquary Jacob Bryant, Dr. Glynn, Dr. Symons, and Dr. Sherwin, and by Mr. Catcott, Bristol, who had bought and sold them as originals. These gentlemen argued with force, that it was impossible for a Blue-coat boy of fifteen or sixteen years of age to have written such poems as the "Song of Ella," or "Canyng's Feast," and to have imitated so closely the old English of the fifteenth century. Dean Miller, in his enthusiasm, placed Rowley above Homer and on a level with Shakespeare, and published the poems in a rich quarto volume. But there were greater names on the other side. Dr. Johnson, the poets Mason, Gray, and Southey, Horace Walpole, the critics Tyrwhitt, Warton, Sir Herbert Croft, Malone, George Steevens, Pinkerton, Gough, and George Chalmers, stoutly asserted all the poems to be the works of Chatterton himself. The public agreed in this judgment; but then rose the cry, "What a genius was allowed to perish in a Holborn garret!" The language of Johnson, when his prejudices allowed him to read the poems of the uneducated student, was: "This is the most extraordinary young man that has encountered my knowledge."

* Dressmaker; sack was then the name for a lady's dress.

Are there any visible memorials of this boy-poet? The London house in which he so miserably perished has disappeared, now forming a part of Meeking's furnishing warehouse. Fourteen years after Chatterton's death, Philip Thicknesse, Esq., raised a monument to the poet at St. Catharine's Hermitage, near Bath. At length, after several refusals by the parish authorities, a monument was erected, close to Redcliffe Church, in the year 1840, by public subscription. The figure of Chatterton, in the dress of a Blue-coat boy, stands on the summit of the monument, holding the poem "Ella" in his hand. Seventy years before, the starving poet left his "curse to Bristol;" but the old city has done late honour to the name of her wayward but wonderful child. In 1853 a new stone was placed over the grave of Chatterton's father and mother.

Redcliffe Church will for many ages be associated with the strange story of Chatterton. Few will gaze on the monument of the merchant-prince, William Canynge, and not think of the wonderful child who once made a poem from the sculptured marble. The magnificent architecture of the church will recall the image of the Blue-coat boy whose imagination saw the men of bygone ages clustering round yon columns, or moving down the nave.

NO MORE NOVELTY IN ERROR THAN IN TRUTH.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JUDE'S, CHELSEA.

IT is easier to define the symptoms of a disease than to prescribe its remedy. Some have light enough to perceive the bad signs of the times, but too little to adopt the only hope of their amendment. The authoress of that shadowy, fantastic book, "The Night Side of Nature," in her more recent publication on Spiritualism, complains, so far truly, that "theology is more and more tending to formalism, and science to materialism. Men do not live by faith. They hold it: it does not hold them. How is religion to be made a living power, instead of a dead formula? Has God withdrawn himself from the world; or is it that the world is withdrawing itself from God?"

Did it never occur to this and kindred writers, that spiritualism itself is one of the worst of these "dead formulas" by which "the world withdraws itself from Divine teaching; like Saul, who, when he had fallen from God, and the Spirit of the Lord departed from him, made the matter worse by having recourse to witchcraft and familiar spirits? It was always so, as it is now, men realise the mischief in which their unbelief involves them, but not the unbelief which involves the mischief. Hence their cry for succour is, not, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief;" but, like the too superstitious Athenians, they "spend their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear some new thing."

I would to God his Holy Spirit vouchsafed me the grace and power to persuade you who read those lines that there are no new things, whether in truth or error. Every error is the counterfeit, or contradiction, of its counterpart truth. Thus the first temptation, based upon a falsity which man received for fact, implied both. The truth said, "Ye shall surely die;" the error affirmed,

"Ye shall not surely die." Truth pledged its own immortality to man on his primitive obedience; error promised even more—"Ye shall be as gods"—to man's disobedience. In the multiplied reproductions of that ancestral heresy, "ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," lies the germ of every falsification of truth in successive forms of error, every one of them alleging authority on a par with the Divine. Satan has no interest in error, apart from its demolition of the foundations of truth, hence naturally there is a constructive immutability in error analogous to the eternal unchangeableness of truth. Consequently it may be affirmed of both: "They are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Are you athirst for novelty? you will no more find it in the Dead Sea tides of "man's devices," than in the inspired verities of the sacred Pool of Siloam. The wise king said, "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there anything whereof it may be said, This is new?"

"Do you believe that?" said a sceptic to his fellow-traveller in a railway carriage.

"I do," was the reply; "there is nothing new."

"Is not the electric telegraph a new thing? and gas, magnetism, and the like?"

"No; they are simply new applications of old natural forces, like the powers of steam or pneumatics."

"Well, the rock-oil they call petroleum, is not that new?"

His companion paused, and I ventured to interpose the suggestion that "petroleum, or rock-oil, even as a discovery, was as old as the oldest book in the Bible."

"Petroleum in the Bible!" the sceptic sneered;

"that won't do for me, without chapter and verse."

"Here they are, sir," I replied, quoting Job (xxix. 6), who, recalling his sources of wealth in the days of his prosperity, said, "I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil." "There's your petroleum, sir; nor was its possession confined to an individual—the whole nation of Israel enjoyed it, as you may read in Deut. xxxii. 13: 'He made him suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock.'"

The unbeliever was surprised, and so far silenced.

Returning from this digression, we assert that there are no new errors, simply because there are no new truths. The novelty is invariably one of form, or of application, or of appearance; the substantial realities are old "as the everlasting hills." So of the pretentious novelties of our own times we repeat the challenge: "Is there anything whereof it may be said, This is new?"

Is ritualism new, when St. Paul condemned it, as "the old leaven" of the ancient church, by the declaration: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost?"

Is materialism new, when its general theory is typified in every detail of idolatry which deifies stocks and stones and all the host of heaven, eternalising creation with the attributes of its Creator?

Is rationalism new, which, in the language of one of its writers, "sets up the strong present tense against all the rumours of wrath, past or to come, and insists: No law can be sacred to man but that of his nature," when, in the same spirit, Pharaoh challenged Moses: "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?"

Is spiritualism new, which, in the tone of old apostasies, "turns from the faith to give heed to seducing spirits," consulting indifferently the sacred Urim and Thummim of the Temple, and the witches' séance at Endor; and, in its more refined and modern phase, places on the same footing of didactic reverence "the Indian, Assyrian, Egyptian, and classic mythologies with the Hebrew traditions," and dares to include in the same profane bracket of equality, as teachers of their race, Plato, Swedenborg, and Jacob Behmen with the Lord Jesus Christ?" It is the blasphemy of the Philistines, lodging the ark of the covenant in the house of Baal, or Pompey setting up his statue in the Temple of Jerusalem, or the blind toleration, if not contemptuous impartiality, of the Pantheon, which would have allotted a shrine, among the rest of its sculptures, to a material image of God.

Well may the only inspired revelation of the Divine will exhort us against "the wisdom of this world;" against "oppositions of science falsely so called;" against the treacherous comminglings of "Christ with Belial;" "the temple of God with idols;" or "he that believeth with an infidel." The peril is in their contact; the safety lies in coming out from among them, and being separate from all that is "earthly, sensual, and devilish," and cleaving, with singleness of eye and simplicity of faith, to "the wisdom from above, which is first pure and then peaceable," guaranteeing peace to the heart, mind, conscience, soul, and spirit, on the unassailable basis of "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the atonement."

We solemnly warn the readers of THE QUIVER against these "children of subtlety and enemies of all righteousness." Do not be misled by a pompous intellectuality of sentiment or phraseology. There is nothing new—nothing which has not been answered long ago, and again and again condemned, and left to the inexorable execution of time, which, like the fabled Saturn, devours its own offspring, each fresh form of error dying with its respective author, while "the word of God liveth and abideth for ever."

When Eli thought of his unworthy sons in charge of the ark, he trembled for its safety; but the type of the Divine presence survived alike the degeneracy of its priests and the hatred of the Philistines. Timid believers are still found apprehensive of preserving the soundness of religion, because of the defections of some of its ministers and professors; but "the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." Not long was the ark in captivity in Philistia, where it proved too strong for Dagon, even in its bonds. Madame de Staël said, "Error may prevail for a season, but ages celebrate the triumphs of truth."

It would not be difficult to take up seriatim every false doctrine in religion, and tabulate it side by side with the truth which it perverts or misrepresents. Nor would it be any harder task to trace the origin and the special antagonism of each secularist, spiritualist, or transcendental theory with the corresponding contradiction in inspired theology; but the profit would be doubtful. Better let them alone; they be blind leaders of the blind, and if both fall into the ditch together, it is because they wilfully close their eyes to the light which is come into the world, "loving their own darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." Sufficient for our side if we maintain that the object of every error is to neutralise some analogous truth, and leave to our adversaries the burthen of proof for the originality, independence, or novelty in any given error.

Truth is what the Spirit of God teacheth; error is what man's wisdom teacheth. Truth is the luminous half-moon with its light shining, whence it fell, upwards towards the skies; error is the other half, darkened by its earthly shadow, and destined to be swallowed up in the fair satellite's growing light. Were there no lunar orb, there would be no phases of obscurity, and where no conscious truth is, there are no conscious errors.

Heresies have multiplied in the Church, because she was the depositary of sound doctrine: seeing, "where the carcass is, there the eagles will be gathered together."

The series of heresies were the repeated blows on the Lord's stronghold; but "her bow abode in strength, and the arms of her hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob;" though "the archers have sorely grieved her, and shot at her, and hated her."

Let the truth as it is in Jesus fix itself in your hearts by faith, and you will never tire of "the old paths," nor of the old canonised words of "the voice behind you, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." The novelties, the confictions, the fluctuations of modern thought will present no attraction to your satisfied souls; for "no man having tasted old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is better."

Men become so accustomed to error as to mistake her for truth, so that when the latter is preached, she is denounced as a "new light," and her teachers for "setters up of strange doctrines." There is no greater mercy than the grace which inclines our hearts to "buy the truth, and sell it not;" on the contrary, would rather urge us, like the merchant who found the pearl of great price, to "sell all that we have, and buy it." An unbelieving Church bought and sold it for thirty pieces of silver; but the true disciple, like Paul, "counts all things but loss for the excellency of its knowledge." Nor be dismayed at the evil perseverance of Satan in sowing crop after crop of tares among the wheat. Both abide their reaping and ingathering. "They that sow to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; and they that sow to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

In the meantime, even errors pay their involuntary homage to truth, as devils reluctantly confessed the presence of the Son of God. They are often overruled to the effect of giving greater prominence to the very truths on which they take their disingenuous standing. Thus the anti-Trinitarian brings out into brighter relief the precious doctrine of the Divine unity, like the shadow of the Prince of darkness forming a background for the glorious light which shone upon the pinnacle of the Temple, illuminating the dictum: "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve!" Besides, St. Paul describes error as the sieve by which the wheat is sifted from the chaff. "There must needs be heresies among you, that they which be approved may be made manifest." Hence they become a practical test of "the unfeigned faith that is in you." Do you feel a drawing of sympathy towards these ever-recurring fresh forms of fallacy, whether in the gross rudiments of the world" or in "the traditions and commandments of men?"—as Elisha taxed Gehazi: "Went not thine heart after these men, with their talents of silver, and changes of raiment?" If so, take heed lest the leprosy of their sentiments infect and cling to thee, for "cursed is he whose trust is in man, and not in the law of the Lord his God."

Distrust your Christianity, if you detect it leading you in any shape apart from Christ, or if you detect yourself hankering after the multitude of successive theories and pretensions with the old cry, "Lo, Christ is here;" or "Lo, Christ is there." "Go ye not after them," if you would be "followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises."

"Hold fast the form of sound words, which you have received." If there be a danger of satisfying the soul with the words, without the doctrine, there is a temptation to initiate apostasy from the doctrine, by objecting to the sameness of the words. Guard against disrelish of evangelical phraseology; it not seldom proceeds to more ungodliness. St. Paul insists on orthodox reiterations. "To write the same things, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe:" and St. Peter lays equal stress on the important duty "of putting you in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth." Who is the Christian professor who ever felt he could do without "the line upon line, and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little?" like the feeding of children, little and often, and the simplest possible; like the daily repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, of which no devout man ever wearied, or would substitute another form.

If you would realise without abatement or interruption a believing sense of your adoption into the heavenly family, of your reconciliation with the Father by simple faith in the atoning blood, the justifying righteousness, and sanctifying Spirit of the Son of God, our one and only Saviour and Advocate, then do as he bids you: Take up your cross daily and follow him.

Pattern and patron, priest and victim, God and altar, Christ is your all in all! What more do you want? To seek more is to deny, or be insensible, to "the fulness of him who filleth all in all."

When the next allurements to some religious vanity, or superstitious variety, with its too natural charm of fictitious novelty, meets your "lust of the eye, or your pride of life," let the plaintive echo of the forsaken Saviour fall upon your ears as he sighed to his chosen ones in the days of his flesh, "Will ye also go away?" and may God's Holy Spirit touch and tune your hearts to adopt Peter's grateful, loving response: "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life."

Of every doctrine, precept, and promise St. John's predicament holds good: "Beloved, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning."

Astronomy has made her discoveries in the heavens, geology in the bowels of the earth, navigation in the seas; but the revelations of theology have been in all ages complete as the attributes of their Divine Author, and of all things, whether in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, or in the Church—which is equally his creation with the rest—the challenge holds its ground: "Is there anything whereof it may be said, This is new?"

ON RASH JUDGMENT.

"I said in my haste, All men are liars."

THIS confession is not the least valuable portion of David's religious experience. It exhibits in a startling, but true light, how prone even the best of men are to indulge in hasty and rash judgments upon the actions and motives of their fellow-men; and to such a pitch is this sometimes carried, that individual faults and failings are imputed to the whole race, and all are unjustly brought under condemnation, when only a section is in fault. Such is the great difference between man's judgment and God's.

We propose to devote this short paper to a consideration of some of the evils of rash judgment upon the actions and words of others, and to point out some of the evils resulting from this pernicious habit.

It must be guarded against, because such a temper of mind is injurious to our neighbours as well as to ourselves. It is injurious to our neighbours, because it frequently lessens them in the estimation of their friends, by concealing their good qualities, and exaggerating their bad ones; and not unfrequently is their good character entirely taken away, or at all events seriously damaged, by rash judgment.

It is injurious to ourselves, because the constant inroads of a habit of this kind make fearful havoc with an "honest and good heart;" like acid eating into a metal, be the former never so pure, the latter cannot come into contact with it with impunity. The soul is a very delicately-adjusted apparatus, and if not carefully guarded, will acquire that very habit it so harshly censures in others: an utter want of appreciation of the consistency and beauty of truth.

The great evil of rash judgment is, that in nine cases out of ten it is false. People fly at conclusions, who can never have the opportunity of knowing the truth. It may be that their feelings carry them away, and totally upset the sober balance of the mind, to say nothing of the grave duty of Christian charity. There is a great temptation in many minds of having something new and startling to communicate—something which shall take people by the ears; and, so long as this effect is produced, it is much to be feared that truth is a very secondary consideration.

It sometimes happens that everything seems to go wrong, and we are tempted to get out of sorts with everything and everybody. It is with this fretful and discontented spirit upon us that we may be tempted to say in our haste that "all men are liars." Can anything be more unjust? Others must suffer for our hasty tempers and expressions; so that in giving vent to the sentiment that "all men are liars," the greatest liar among that very large company is the person who asserts it.

But the sad phase of the case is, that when a man brings such a sweeping accusation against his fellows, he is apt to consider himself an exception to the general rule; and amid the surging mass of surrounding falsehood, to regard himself as a paragon of truth and goodness. The Christian rule is, of course, the exact reverse to this: "Love covereth all sins;" "above all things have fervent charity: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins."

Let us look at the same truth in a somewhat different light. The Psalmist makes use of the expression placed at the head of this paper, by way of confession. This is as much as asserting his sorrow, first, at using hasty words at all, and then the utter untruth of those words. Mature thought will prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that, as in the best there are some bad qualities, so in the worst there are some good ones; for it cannot be that the Almighty image is utterly defaced in any man. We know, alas! too well, the inroads sin has made and is making upon all of us; but God forbid that we should go so far as to say (in our haste) that any one is utterly and entirely bad. It very frequently happens that, as high lights have deep shadows, so those who seem, at first sight, one tissue of wickedness, possess good points and qualities, which would be worth worlds to their detractors.

"All last night she was restless and fretful, Father was trying to sleep in his chair."—p. 171.

The great mistake people make is this: instead of looking for good, they strive to ferret out evil, or what they conceive to be such. They have a peculiar pleasure in this. Good words and good deeds go for nothing, but as soon as their extreme sensitiveness scents out anything not quite up to their own ideas of propriety, immediately "they stretch forth their mouth unto heaven, and their tongue goeth through the world." It is a habit which grows wonderfully fast, and against which men and women need to be earnestly and affectionately cautioned. It behoves them to beware of indulging in the seductive and pernicious habit of rash judgment, lest by so doing they fall under the grave condemnation and sentence of the Psalmist: "Thou hast loved unrighteousness more than goodness: and to talk of lies more than righteousness. Thou hast loved to speak all words that may do hurt, O thou false tongue. Therefore shall God destroy thee for ever: he shall take thee, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling, and root thee out of the land of the living."

We have been considering the general falsehood of rash judgment. It remains to point out a duty connected with the subject. Suppose our neighbour has his faults and failings, as will most certainly be the case, our duty is to make certain allowances for human infirmity; to remember that all men's temptations are different; that the cross to be taken up and carried daily is not the same to all. For instance, how common is it to hear the liar condemning the sin of drunkenness; the scandalmonger, "whose tongue cutteth like a sharp razor," holding up her hands in pious horror at the enormities of the gambler and the thief; the habitual neglecter of the worship of God in his temple, declaiming against formalism and deceit, and exalting what he is pleased to term spiritual religion. But who ever heard the envious condemning "envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness?" the impure, in righteous indignation against "fornication and all other deadly sin?" the proud, hard upon selfishness, unbelief, ostentation, ambition, vanity and self-conceit? or the angry, upon violent language, spite, cruelty, or vindictiveness? As a rule, men and women are very easy with their own sins, and very hard upon those of others. What seems a very small fault in themselves, is a very large one in their neighbours; and such is the extraordinary extent to which this self-deception is sometimes carried, that it is not an uncommon occurrence to hear people enlarge upon their own virtues and their neighbours' vices with almost the same breath. "The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank thee, I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all I possess." Reader, do you recognise the portrait? a great many copies have been printed from this negative.

If, then, we would have our shortcomings overlooked, we must do the same with respect to those of others. It is only on this condition that we ask of God forgiveness, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Let us ever remember the hold that Christian charity ought to have over us, when tempted to sit in judgment upon the motives, the words, the actions of others. "Charity suffereth long, and is kind." What a contrast to that restless and unhealthy state of mind which is never content except in raking up something to the disparagement of another!

It generally happens, however, that sooner or later the tide turns; and then it is curious to watch how such people take the altered state of things. Those who are so industrious about the affairs of others, are, as a rule, wonderfully thin-skinned when anything touches them; one of two curious phenomena usually happens: they either consider themselves the most ill-used people upon the face of the earth, or else fly into a violent passion, and say in their haste that "all men are liars."

But, let us ask, what is our duty in this matter? Reason, experience, and Scripture all alike tell us that it is our business not to judge our neighbour, but ourselves. The wise, the safe course, is to transfer hard and harsh judgment from our neighbours to ourselves. It matters not how many faults and wrongs we see around us, if we will but "inquire within" we shall find them in still greater abundance. Till we are faultless and perfect—which will never be on this side the grave—let us suspend our judgment upon others, and turn our attention to a quarter where our vigilance is much more needed, and where it will not be labour in vain, or worse than in vain. "THREE-PAIR-BACK."

THREE-PAIR-BACK little Allie is lying,
Ill on her bed through the sunshiny day;
Hush ye, good people, our beauty is dying,
Dying this middle of May!

Up and down children pass with unceasing
Patter and clatter of feet on the stairs;
Never are still, and her fever's increasing,
Allie's,—and nobody cares!

Would we had never come to this city,
Leaving our cottage and neighbours the best;
Here neither man, maid, nor child knoweth pity,
Here there's none feels for the rest.

One close room for us, waking or sleeping,
High as the nests in the rookery farm;
Wages are good, but the rents are in keeping—
Little to bless, and much harm.

Here all steams of the cooking and washing,
Dusts, and the smells of the cleaning ascend;
Hither loud echoes of doors that go clashing—
Clashing with never an end.

One small fuchsia we brought of our flowers,
With it a bullfinch we caught in the lane;
These two, and this delicate darling of ours:
These, and not one will remain.

All last night she was restless and fretful,
Father was trying to sleep in his chair;

Trying in vain, for he's never forgetful
Share of our sorrow to bear.

Early to work, nor back till day closes,
Far must he speed, and toil hard for the bread;
Night's bit of ease, too, must snatch as he dozes,
Watching in turn by the bed.

Ah, dear me! a sick life at best of it,
This that we trail from the day to the morn;
Once like a joy, till sorrowful test of it Showed all its ways were forlorn.

Doctor says plain, she will not recover;
Poor little heart that is beating so fast!
Soon, very soon, will her struggles be over;
Soon will her troubles be past!

Sweet, pretty bird, here caged in this prison,
Mother nor father could wish thee to stay!
Only we weep that our own wings uprisen
Bear us not with thee away.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

ROUND.

YOU are working too hard. You are looking pale. Come out into the wood a little way with me."

It was David Haldane who spoke, and, as he spoke, he looked tenderly at the fair face of Miss Oglivie, just then bent over a heap of drawings. His look had in it that intensity which always carries with it a touch of pain. But she did not see the look. She would have met many such if she had been in the habit of watching his face, as women watch the faces of those they love. But she heard and heeded the words, with their tone of half entreaty, half command. He had earned the right to assume such a tone—the right of a friend whom she had learned to trust and rely on with implicit confidence. So she looked up as he left off, and said, with a little sigh—

"Well, I will finish these beside grandfather this afternoon. I have done a good deal, with your help, this morning."

He had managed to give her a great deal of help during the past months—a little more, perhaps, than was absolutely necessary, in order to turn her exquisite natural taste into the tamer channel of designing.

She rose and put away the heap of drawings before her, and went to get bonnet and plaid and go out into the sunshine.

"I am losing all my healthy outdoor habits," she said, as she came back equipped for a walk; "but I sometimes get so restless with sitting still, especially when I am just finishing something which I want particularly to finish, that I run out into the garden, let the snow be ever so deep. Jean is more than ever convinced that I have 'a bee in my bonnet;' though, ever since you sent me that first five pounds, she has been much more tolerant toward my eccentricities."

It should have been spring, but it was winter still. The March winds, instead of breathing over violets, blew on drifts of feathery snow. But now, for the first time, the sun shone out with something more than a mere wintry gleam, and promised soon to efface that fairy world—so lovely, and white, and cold—and replace the honest brown earth with its sprinkling of spring flowers. Everything was flowered now with the beautiful snow-blooms. They had fallen freshly in the night. The snow was not deep, as it had been in the early part of the season, but it lay all about Delaube quite trackless and untrodden. The wind had been blowing in the direction taken by Peggy and her companion, so that each tree fronting them was sheeted in white from head to foot, while on the other side the dark trunk was left bare. The high light and the deep shadow threw the whole picture into exquisite relief.

"I am glad you brought me out before all this melted away," said Peggy, the colour rising in her cheeks, and the weight lifting from her spirits, as they moved on through the fairy scene. "What is it like?" she went on. "I am seeing a hundred resemblances in the fantastic shapes of the bushes and trees. This—(pointing to an old thorn, which in summer was nearly as thickly clad with blossom)—is like an immense piece of coral."

"It is like a huge bride's cake," her companion answered, with a smile for his own more homely illustration. "I mean the hill; look at that coating of white over the brown bank, crowned with its white trees for ornaments."

She laughed, and they went on, chatting almost gaily as they went. There is something to the healthy and hardy very exhilarating in being out in the snow. The dazzling purity of everything, the fresh, cold, sparkling quality of the air, from which every particle of earthy matter has been swept, refresh the spirit as well as the body, and give it power to cast off enervating influences. As they walked on, Peggy began to glow with pleasure. For the first time these many months, she felt a return of the old joyousness which had made her feet trip so lightly and her voice ring so blithely through the woods as she roamed with her boy companions. It was the triumph of youth and health over every heart-sickening, depressing influence. Quite unconsciously she had shut back the tide of thought and feeling that rose within, and opened her heart to the happy influx of natural beauty and delight, these great healers of the spirit.

In this mood she failed to perceive the silence which had fallen upon her companion. They were quite old friends now, with no need to make talk, and David Haldane had never assumed the character of lover. Instinctively he had felt that any nearer approach to her would but frighten her away. At first he had said to himself, in the words of the gallant, proud old ditty—

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his desert is small,
Who will not put it to the touch,
To win or lose it all."

But he had already won what was far too sweet to risk the loss of carelessly—her confiding, child-like trust. He must risk this gentle friendship, this pure, womanly regard, the first influence of the kind that had ever sweetened his life, in order to win her love. And he felt that he might easily lose it all by putting it to the test; and he did fear his fate. In the grave trouble and anxiety of these months he could not have tried to win her heart, and in contact with her sweet, unselfish nature his own love had gained unselfishness—a rarer quality in love than at first sight may appear. The desire to win was overruled by the desire to bless and benefit the beloved object.

And it was this feeling that now urged David Haldane forward to meet his fate. He knew, although as yet she did not, that Gilbert Oglivie was slowly but surely sinking into the grave. The friendly doctor had told him this, with sundry lamentations as to the desolate condition of Oglivie's granddaughter, and marvellings as to what was to become of her when he died. David Haldane knew very well what would have become of her, if the ordering of her fate had been in his hands. She would have stayed just where she was, in the dear old house on the hill, where a new day of gladness should have dawned for her in the sunshine of his protecting love. She never seemed to think of the future that awaited her; but he knew it was a cheerless, friendless one, which he had faith enough to feel that he might brighten. If a brighter had offered to her willing acceptance, it had come to this with him—his love had so purified itself from selfishness, he would have stood aside and prayed that her gain might be as great as his loss would be.

She had not noticed his silence, but he was not slow to notice hers. They had entered a part of the little wood which had been sheltered from the wind, and where the snow had fallen without drifting. Straight from the smooth, white floor rose the dark columns of the fir-trees in the form of an aisle, closed towards the west by a grand pointed arch, framing the pale blue sky in what now looked like fretted marble—the boughs of the snow-laden trees. Her silence was so sudden that her companion looked down at her in something like alarm, and asked if she felt ill, which, indeed, she looked, for the glow had faded from her face, and in its paleness her eyes looked almost sunken. The confinement was telling upon her, he thought.

"No, I am not ill," she answered, absently, and with a strong shiver; "but I will go home now. It is so cold, so deathlike here! Look at that mound under the tree! it is like a coffin under a white pall. It used to be my favourite seat."

"You are indeed ill," he said, anxiously. "Your life is too heavy, too sad for you."

"It is sadder than you think," she answered.

He offered her his arm, and she took it gladly, for her limbs were trembling. She felt his arm tremble too. But a great desire had come upon her to tell him all her sadness, and she looked up into the face which was bent above her. Then she encountered that look which there was no mistaking.

There was no manner of use in gentle approaches now. He saw that she had read his face. She was conscious of his knowledge that she had done so. It was time for him to speak. They stood still, and he spoke out hurriedly.

"I would give my life to make you happy; is it possible for us to be more than friends?"

She would fain have stopped the utterance; as it was, she could only murmur, "Oh, Mr. Haldane! I am so sorry! It cannot be."

She had quitted his arm, and he turned away his face to hide the pain that was contracting it; but, as he stood there, quite motionless, she laid her hand upon his sleeve with a look that was half-pitying, half-beseeching.

"Forgive me if I have been in any way to blame for this."

"You to blame!" he exclaimed, turning quickly. "No; it is no fault of yours. I have startled you by my suddenness; but why cannot it be? I will wait; I will work; only I will never change. As I want you now, I shall want you always. Say only that it is possible. You are free?"

"No, I am not free; I am bound—bound utterly!" and her voice had so sorrowful a sound in it, that he almost forgot his own pain in wondering pity for hers.

"To whom had she given her love, and who had dared to make it a sorrow to her?" he thought, almost fiercely. She had covered her face with her hands, and it was all that he could do to restrain himself from clasping her to his heart; but he forced himself to be calm, and to say, calmly, "Let us still be friends."

It is not often that a man seeks for friendship where love has been denied; but in most cases the woman is ready to grant it; and the pure-hearted girl to whom David Haldane had offered his love was grateful for his friendship. So he took her passive little hand, and rested it once more on his arm, and led her home almost without a word.

David Haldane was honest with himself, and he knew that he had not quite given up hope—knew that he would "wait and see;" and if hope had to be given up, there was work, he told himself grimly, work enough to keep a man from—despair. "One of these boys," he thought, bitterly, "who might have had their choice any time these next ten years, has gained the one prize I coveted;" and he regarded the Grants at that moment with a mixture of feelings in which there was not much of charity. But why was she so sad—so almost hopeless? Was there hope for him in this? There was something he could not explain, turning over in his mind the possibilities of the case; he only knew that in all of them there was torture for him—the torture of doubt and of suspense. "She will sacrifice herself in some way or other, if she has the opportunity," was the only conclusion he arrived at; and it was a perfectly correct one, as regarded Peggy Oglivie.

As for her, she did not love David Haldane; but she thought of him higher things than she had been able to think of Captain Oglivie. No obstacle would have prevented him (David Haldane) from loving her openly and claiming her fearlessly. No penalty that could have fallen upon him would have caused him to give her a moment's needless pain. Yet it might not be "needless." It might be for both their sakes that she suffered from what seemed very like desertion on Captain Oglivie's part, she argued; for she was a little sophist, and could always find more reasons for everything than could anybody else. One thing had happened to her; she had become more fully alive to the nature of the promise she had made, and to all that it involved. In the light of David Haldane's love, she felt that it had been too lightly made; she felt that she had parted with a precious thing without knowing its true value; but she had no thought of blame for him who had taken it at less than its price. "No one ever loved me before," she said to herself, and her sweet loving-kindness, for it was nothing more, went out to her kinsman more strongly than before.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE INHERITANCE.

THE Forest House was far less dismal than in summer. When the leaves had fallen the sunshine came streaming in. Through the lovely tracery of forest boughs, the late sunrise and the early sunset shone and glowed, and were reflected from the windows and the walls. There was light in the cheerless rooms in those brief winter days, which was shut out when summer was in a blaze above the woods.

There was light in the house, for the bare boughs were laden with snow, which had fallen lightly and softly in the night. An utter stillness reigned all round it; not a print was on the white walks, except that left by the little brown birds who pecked about the windows where they had been wont to find crumbs scattered day by day, by one who loved them and every living thing. There was something very deathlike in the silence and the whiteness, and in the breathless stillness of the skeleton trees.

And within there was whiteness and stillness too. In that room into which the morning sun was entering, through the close drawn blinds, Janet Oglivie lay dead. She had died as she had lived, very gently. The doctor was astonished at her death. It had seemed to him that the disease was hardly active enough to kill. It did not occur to him to think that many would die of less than it sometimes takes to kill them, if they came to care as little about living as she did. People hold on to life by love, and hope, and joy, many and many a time when doctors have given them over in despair. And when she drew near the end, the timidity that had overwhelmed her, hiding all that was individual in her, passed away, and she began to speak what was in her mind to Margery, in a way she had never done before. She who had always been led and guided into all her habits and opinions, seemed now to take the lead. Was she not about to take the lead in the greatest and most solemn step of life—that of leaving it? She often said strange things to her sister then. Strange things to say Margery, thought them, and stranger still that she should say them. One day she said, "I think we might have been happier, Margery, if we had tried; and I think we ought to have tried."

Margery only shook her head.

"We had no right to shut ourselves up with our grief. If we had not done that, happiness might have come to us. We shut it out."

"But happiness is not a thing for sinful creatures to seek after," said her sister, in perfect faith, and yet with a sickening heart—a feeling that it might be so, and that life might have been a better and brighter thing for her too.

"I don't mean," said the dying woman, staggered in her assertion, not in her truth, "that we should seek for happiness, but we ought not to refuse it. We should be ready to take all of it God puts within our reach; instead of shutting out the sunshine"—it was streaming in upon them—"we should let in all we can. It's God's sunshine, and there's plenty of God's happiness in the world to warm and light us, even when our hearts are heavy with the sorrows he has sent us. We might even go a bit out o' our way to catch some o't," she added, with a smile, "as I've gone round by the village to see the bairnies play. No out o' the way o' duty. I dinna mean that, Margery: you know I dinna mean that; but it may be in the way o' more."

She said many things in the same strain, for her loving nature was asserting itself in a deeper faith in the love of God. And this deeper experience was leading her to expect tenderer treatment from him than she had been allowed to hope for, tenderer treatment for herself and for all. And when she felt that the expectation purified more than all the fears of torment, and made earthly things heavenly and human things divine, she could not and would not let it go. And so love made her bold.

"Margery," she said, when it was very near the end, "I would like to shake hands with Gilbert Oglivie; but he's on his deathbed, and I'm on mine. Will you go and see him, and tell him my wish? And there's that bit lassie o' Louis's—she'll be sore forsaken when Gilbert's gone. I wish you would look after her."

And now that she—Janet Oglivie herself—was gone, and missed out of that mournful house, as few of the brightest and the best are missed, her words had a weight they had never had in her lifetime, and her sister set about fulfilling them to the letter.

In the course of carrying out her purpose, she made inquiry of the doctor as to the condition of her kinsman. It surprised him not a little, for the utter estrangement of the families was a thing of such long standing that it had almost ceased from memory. But it proved an inlet through which he poured the praises of Gilbert Oglivie's grandchild; and he was not checked in his enthusiasm when he told the story of her devotion.

"She saved his life, and nothing less, that night," he said, winding up. "A man might be content to be ill who has a nurse like her!—a treasure, I assure you—a perfect treasure!"

Not only had the doctor received no check, but his story had been listened to with greedy ears. Margery Oglivie was coveting the treasure with all her heart. But it was not for herself that she did so, though she confessed that she was sorely shaken by her sister's death.

Shaken indeed she was, both in mind and body. She and her sister had been so closely united, that the severance seemed to cost Margery half of her life. The roots of their lives were so entwined, that when the one fell the other seemed to totter. Margery began to feel that she too might die; and then what was to become of him, whom they had hitherto sheltered from every ill that could reach his blighted existence? The contingency was one which had never presented itself to her mind—which could hardly have presented itself to any one's. Year by year, from his infancy upwards, it had been expected that Alexander Oglivie would die. It had been considered impossible that he should live. The sisters had even spoken of, and laid plans for, the time when their sad task should have ended, while they husbanded every spark of the vital flame that flickered so feebly in the poor child's breast. As he grew towards manhood he had gained in strength; but his hold on life had never been such as to make it in the least likely that he would survive the two vigorous women who nursed and tended him.

But now it seemed otherwise to the survivor of the two. He might outlive them both—the idiot heir; and the inheritance, which passed to the sisters on his death, to be disposed of at their will and pleasure, must go to the nearest kin. For so long as he lived it was his, and no one could dispose of it for him, and his great calamity had rendered him unable to dispose of it for himself.

In the case of his surviving his sisters, he being incompetent to will it otherwise, all that he possessed—and he had been rapidly enriching during his long minority—would pass to Gilbert Oglivie.

Louis Oglivie was believed to be dead, because years had elapsed since any one had heard of him; and he had been in the habit of allowing himself to be heard of, from time to time, when he was in straits for money. Unknown to his father, he had even appealed to the generosity of the sisters, and had not appealed in vain.

Failing her father, the inheritance would descend to Peggy Oglivie, provided that she could prove herself Louis Oglivie's daughter, of which Margery had had her doubts.

The sisters had agreed together as to the disposal of the property when it came into their hands, as they had every reason to think it would come. They had agreed that it should go to the only other Oglivie extant, as far as they knew—to him who would bear the title in the event of the extinction of Gilbert's line. Therefore they had been glad to welcome Captain Oglivie, and to find him such as he was. Margery had her doubts as to the qualities of the young man's heart; but then, she might be mistaken. Desertion, profligacy, cruelty, ran in the Oglivie blood. She forgot she was an Oglivie herself; but he might be an exception to the rule. This disposal was rendered null and void if, as Margery now feared, the property never came to her at all.

So much thought she gave to Alexander Oglivie's inheritance; but it was far more of himself she pondered, as the possibility of his surviving came home to her. Who would befriend the helpless idiot when she was gone? All his riches would not avail to purchase for him more than the cold services of careless strangers. They to whom his accumulated wealth would go could hardly be expected to care for him, for they were strangers too. And by whose will had they been estranged? As she thought of this she felt humbled. She felt ready to go to Gilbert Oglivie and entreat his favour, ready to propitiate this girl, who was said to be so gentle and so good—who might be the heiress after all, and who might befriend her helpless kinsman, and keep back the curse from following the inheritance.

THE CELANDINE.

AM so fond of these lovely wild flowers!" exclaimed Emily, as her cousin Charles handed her a bunch of primroses.

"I do not care much for flowers," he answered. "It is good fun to gather them, particularly when they grow in difficult places. I had to climb a high bank, and hold on by a branch, to reach these large primroses for you. If you wish to hear interesting stories about wild flowers, you ought to ask my sister Mary to take you to walk with her; she knows a great deal about plants, and tells it so pleasantly, that I like to listen. Aunt Ellen says we ought to learn botany. She has a large book full of dreadfully long names, which, I am sure, no one could be expected to pronounce, much less remember."

"Indeed, Charles, I do not think I could love flowers better, if I knew ever so much about botany."

"Here comes Mary," exclaimed Charles; and both children ran towards that young lady, who was advancing to meet them.

"Cousin Mary," said little Emily, "Charles says you know such nice interesting stories about wild flowers. Look at this beautiful bunch we have gathered; but they are so common; I dare say you will not be able to tell us anything very wonderful about them."

"Do you know all their names, Emily, common as they are?"

"Oh! yes, of course, I do," replied the little girl. "Every one knows primroses, and violets, and starry buttercups. I do not much like the buttercups—they are too bright; they spoil my other flowers, and make them look pale and faded."

"That flower you call starry buttercup, Emily, is the celandine."

"What a pretty-sounding name, Mary!"

"If Charles had not such an objection to long words, I should tell you its botanical name; but I do not expect either of you would remember it, and celandine is quite enough for you at present."

"Oh, Mary! please do not tell us to what class it belongs, and all that kind of thing," said Charles; "it would put me in mind of Aunt Ellen, and her tiresome book."

"Well, children, I will not, although this golden star of spring is a great favourite of mine, for many reasons; and I am afraid you will think I have bad taste, Emily, when I tell you I prefer it to your pale primroses and violets."

"Is it possible, Mary! Why do you like it so much?"

"I should have to tell you a long story to explain that. When I was a little girl——"

"Oh, Mary! go on; I do so like to hear you begin in that way."

"Well, when I was a little girl, I lost my way in that wood which you see to the right."

"And how did that happen?"

"I will tell you. My father and mother were obliged to leave home early one morning, to visit a friend who was ill. During their absence, some companions of mine came to see me, and persuaded me to walk part of the way home with them, saying I could easily find my way back by a path through the wood, which would shorten the distance considerably. I consented, although I was fully aware my parents would not have permitted me to walk so far alone. It was a very strong temptation to me, for I dearly loved to play with my friends. So I yielded at once—for I was very wilful, and easily led to do wrong. The morning passed agreeably. I ran about with my friends until we were tired; and, after we had refreshed ourselves, I fulfilled my promise, and walked part of the way towards their home. We loitered along—sometimes chasing the butterflies; again stooping to gather wild flowers; or sitting on some bank to talk—while hour after hour flew rapidly past. At length we came to the turn in the path which led towards the wood, and I proposed returning home, as I feared my parents might have already arrived. I begged of some of my companions to accompany me for a short distance; but, while I was speaking, a dark cloud appeared in the sky, and, fearing a shower, they advised me to hasten home; and we parted. I made all possible speed to gain the corner of the wood, from which I knew the path opened. Even in my haste I observed that the banks—so gay a little while before with the blossoms of the celandine—were now dark and sombre. The golden flowers were closed, and all things around partook of the gloom of the sky. There was no sunshine now, and the clouds were becoming each moment more dense. A feeling of terror took possession of my mind. I had never been alone before under such circumstances, and most heartily I wished myself safe at home. In a few moments large drops of rain began to descend. I hastened onward, in the hope of finding shelter; but before I could reach any place of refuge I was thoroughly wet. Upon entering the wood, I was startled by the extreme darkness. Even on bright days, few rays of light can penetrate the branches of the trees, so thickly interwoven overhead; and the dim obscurity which reigns around never fails to impress me with a feeling of solemn awe."

"Oh, yes, Mary, I have often felt just as you describe, when passing through that wood," interrupted Charles; "I do not know what came over me, but I could not laugh or talk as usual."

"Then, Charles, you can understand what I felt, when the sky was covered with threatening clouds, and all Nature dark and gloomy. My only comfort was, that I had but a small corner of the wood to cross, when I hoped to regain the open fields. I ran onward for a long way, expecting each moment to find the opening I sought, and emerge again into the light of day. I redoubled my efforts, but all in vain; darker and darker became the gloom around. Overpowered by fear and fatigue, I stood still and gazed around, hoping to find some clue to guide me through the labyrinth in which I was enclosed. At this moment a brilliant light illuminated the wood. It was a vivid flash of lightning, and was immediately succeeded by a loud peal of thunder. I threw myself on the ground in an agony of terror. No words can describe my sensations; alone, lost in the dark wood, in the midst of so fearful a storm. Another and another flash followed; and louder and louder crashed the thunder overhead. I tried to pray, but could not.

"I lay on the ground crying bitterly, until the flashes of lightning ceased, and the roll of thunder became more distant. Then I rose, feeling that I must make some effort to find my way home. I tried to retrace my steps, in order to discover the well-known path through the wood; but without success. Several times I sat down to rest, and consider my position, and rose each time with fresh hope to continue the search. But, after many disappointments, I began to fear I must remain where I was all night, and perhaps perish with cold and hunger. Again I rose in a kind of desperation, and determined to go straight forward in the path I had chosen, feeling sure that if I was able steadily to persevere I must in time reach some opening. Often I was obliged to rest, and many times my feelings fluctuated between hope and despair; until, with joy inexpressible, I beheld the light gleaming through the stems of the trees; and knew I must be approaching the border of the wood.

I hurried on, as well as my fatigue would permit, and soon approached the green bank which bordered the wood on that side. As I drew near, I perceived a profusion of the celandine blossoms; their petals expanded in the light of the evening sun, as if the bank were studded with golden stars: a hopeful sight for me, in my forlorn condition. As I stood gazing, I heard distinctly a voice pronounce my name. I climbed the bank; the sun was again shining brightly; all the angry clouds had passed away, and there stood my father; for it was he who had called me. My heart was filled with joy at the sight, yet I felt weak and ill; I shivered from cold and excitement, and was ready to sink. My kind father did not ask me where I had been, or why I had acted in so disobedient a manner; he did not utter one reproach, but folded me in his arms, saying, 'My poor child! Thank God, I have found you! How weary you must be! Come, I will carry you home.'

"It was very ill for a long time after this adventure, and it was during this illness that I began to think how I had been, all my previous life, wandering away from my God and my heavenly home, going astray like a lost sheep.

"And now, children, you will understand why I love the celandine well enough to prefer it even to your primroses and violets; not only is it connected with that first gleam of light which broke upon me in that hour of childish sorrow, but, like the star that guided the wise men to Bethlehem, it appears to rest over the place where I first saw my Saviour."

"It wouldn't be to my interest, ma'am, to give up the free trade."—p. 179.

"ONE TRIP MORE."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY FOWELL."

"MRS. AYMER'S husband has come home," said Sophia; "he returned last night."
 "What is he like?" said Agnes, looking up from her drawing, with some interest.

"Such a good-looking, honest-looking young sailor! just a match for his pretty young wife—and so domestic! He is now sitting by the kitchen-fire, basting our goose."

"Home just in time to keep Michaelmas Day," said Mrs. Monkton. "I must have a talk with him by-and-by, I think."

Mrs. Monkton and her daughters were lodging for a few weeks in a cottage so small that they had had no idea, at first, of remaining there for more than a day or two to look out for better quarters. But better quarters were not to be had, and in the meanwhile, the exceeding kindness and simplicity of their landlady so won on them, and the neighbourhood of the little fishing village seemed so worth exploring, that they were continuing where they were without any fixed plan when to go. Mrs. Aymer "did for them," as the saying is; and she was as neat-handed a Phillis as even an invalid could desire. There was hardly an idle moment in her life, yet she made no bustle; and whatever she might be about, there was a look of smiling content on her fair, child-like face, as if she were thinking of something pleasant.

The women and girls of the place were better dressed than persons of their class can usually afford to be; and on Sundays it was astonishing what gay turn-outs there would be from very poor cottages. To a superficial observer, this gave an appearance of thriving prosperity.

During the first few days, it did not transpire whether Mrs. Aymer were widow or wife. A respectable-looking mother occasionally dropped in on her, but there was no man about the house. On the Sunday, however, she casually observed that she stayed at home to take care of the house when her husband was away. When he was at home, they took it in turns to attend morning service, and went together in the evening.

"Mrs. Aymer, what is your husband?"
"A smuggler, ma'am."

Mrs. Monkton stopped short. Her daughters looked petrified. Mrs. Monkton said, "Oh, but I'm sorry to hear that," quietly, but very gravely.

"Are you, ma'am?" said Mrs. Aymer, with her pretty, innocent look; "why, I think I do things worse than that every day."

Her daily life was apparently so blameless, that the mother and daughters wondered what she could be thinking of. She evidently meant to imply that, in her view, smuggling was no fault at all.

"I see it in a very different light from what you do," said Mrs. Monkton. "I am the daughter of a Government officer, and, of course, have always been accustomed to hear smuggling spoken of very strongly. It is defrauding the revenue; and you know the revenue is as much property as the possessions of a private individual. It is as dishonest to defraud the Queen as a private person."

Mrs. Aymer looked as if this were too difficult a question for her to answer. She said it had never been considered so among her people. Every man in the place was a smuggler, except her husband's brother. Their wives encouraged them in it, because it brought them so much money.

So here was the secret of the gay dressing!

Mrs. Monkton argued the point a little more with her, using the simplest words and illustrations she could think of; but it was almost like talking to a baby: comprehension was wanting. The grand idea seemed to be that "Charley" could do no wrong.

And here was Charley back, slipping into his own house like a culprit on Michaelmas Eve, and sitting by his fire, basting the goose, on Michaelmas Day, like an honest man that had no load on his conscience.

The Monktons were endued with that knack of entering into the interests of others, and conciliating their regard, which seems born in some people. Before the day was out they were on sociable terms with Charley; and towards gloaming, when his wife had stepped out to her mother, and he was sitting in the window, looking out on his little garden, Mrs. Monkton, seeing him through the open door, stepped in and commenced a colloquy.

"This is a nice little place of yours, Mr. Aymer."

"Well, ma'am, it is" (rather sheepishly). "I'm afraid you can't be very comfortable, ma'am."

"We are very comfortable indeed, thank you. Your good little wife lets us want for nothing. We are quite pleased with her."

He looked almost as much embarrassed at her being praised, as if he had been praised himself.

"I'm sure she'd do her best," said he. Then, after a pause, "I'm glad, for my part, she should have ladies along with her when I'm away, for it keeps her thoughts off me, and prevents her being lonesome like."

"She must be often lonesome by herself," said Mrs. Monkton. "Every sailor's wife must have anxious thoughts when he's at sea; more especially when he is concerned, as I am sorry to find you are, in what you call the free trade."

"Ah," said he, smiling, and beginning to pull a flower to pieces, "Mary told me you'd been speaking to her about that."

"I did, indeed, but I did not say much, for it is your affair, not hers; but I do wish I could get you to see it in the right light."

"Well, ma'am, we all think our own the right light, I believe; or, at any rate, we don't like to see a thing in any other light when it's against our interest."

"Interest is one thing, duty is another; but yet I believe, Mr. Aymer (and I have lived a good deal longer than you have), in the end, we find that in following duty we have followed interest too."

"It wouldn't be to my interest, ma'am, to give up the free trade. I've a third share in a boat; my partners are both of 'em great hands at bringing over brandy. Our trade would be quite done up if we didn't."

"Has this been a good trip?"

"Why, no"—(very reluctantly)—"we saw the Custom-house cutter rounding the point, so we'd nothing for it but to sink our tubs and leave a buoy."

"It does not always answer your interest, then."

"Oh, we shall fish 'em up again, you know, when the preventives are not on the look out."

"The preventives and you are not very good friends, I suppose."

"They can't expect us to be their friends."

"And yet they are only acting in the way of duty."

"An exciseman might say that."

"He might, and with truth. You look a true Englishman, Aymer—it is written all over you. It is a fine thing to belong to this free, happy land."

"Tis so, sure-ly."

"And her sailors are her glory,—always have been. It seems a pity that any of them should injure their mother-country, that they love and are proud of, and would fight for and die for, if need were, by setting her laws at naught, even in the smallest instance, and defrauding her of her substance—be it ever so little."

"Well, ma'am, all things go by comparison—they will have it that our boat hinders Government of about three thousand a year."

"Three thousand! you shock me! And do you three partners each get a thousand?"

"No, indeed, ma'am!" and he laughed heartily; very little of it indeed."

"Not much more perhaps than you could get in lawful trade—and with all the risk and opprobrium besides. Oh, do be persuaded by me, Mr. Aymer, to give up free-trading! Think of your good little wife."

"She is a good little thing, that's a fact."

"And your calling is a very precarious one, and, you know, is unlawful."

"Well, I do know that—better than she does, poor little myrtle."

"Ill-gotten gains never prosper. A little that the righteous hath is better than great riches of the ungodly. I'm sure she would love you quite as well, if you had only your honest earnings to bring home."

"Yes, she would; but— Well, I'll tell ye this, ma'am: you've not been talking altogether in vain. You might have talked all your breath away to Grimes and Briggs, and they wouldn't have minded you a bit; but I'm not of their sort. I'm minded to leave the free trade after the next trip."

"Oh, don't go once more; give it up now."

"No, ma'am—no, I can't. It couldn't be managed without hurting my partners; but I'll only take one trip more." And with this Mrs. Monkton was obliged to be content: indeed, she thought it was a great concession to have obtained, and her daughters were quite surprised at it.

It was a bright, sparkling autumnal morning when the wicked little Spitfire sailed on her "one trip more." Many a glass was pointed towards her, as she danced out of harbour, throwing showers of sparkling spray from her sides as she cut through the waves, now and then almost heeling over in the fresh sea-breeze. Everybody, friend and foe, knew what she was going for: the friends wished her good speed, and trusted in her good luck. The foes had never been able to catch her in flagranti delicto yet; but they felt sure of doing so, soon or late, and of seeing her sawn in two. Mrs. Aymer, with her fair curls blowing in the wind, and screening her blue eyes from the sun with her hand, watched her husband's vessel out of sight, and then turned into her cottage—doubtless, feeling

"The village seems asleep or dead,
Now Lubin is away."

And so things resumed their regular course.

One evening when she came in to remove the tea-tray, Mrs. Monkton observed she had very red eyes, and asked if anything were the matter.

Then the tears burst forth. "Oh, ma'am! don't you know? The Spitfire is seized, with her cargo on board, and the men put in the county gaol!"

Here was a thunderstroke! it was no use, now, to say, "If Aymer would but have been persuaded by me, not to have one trip more." Mrs. Aymer regretted as bitterly as it could be that he had not been persuaded, now that it was too late. All her friends could do now was to pity, condole, and try to console; but there was little consolation within reach.

"They'll be tried at the assizes, and we must club our money together and sell a few things to pay for a lawyer. Mother and I are going over to see Charley to-morrow—it's a long way to walk, and will take us all day, to be home before dark, even if we start very early. You won't mind Mrs. James doing for you, ma'am?"

"Oh, no—tell your husband I'm very sorry for him, and wish I could help him; but you see, Mrs. Aymer, the laws must be observed, and those who break them must be punished, or where should we all be? You would be in much harder case, and so would everybody, if there were no law in the land."

"Yes, ma'am, I dare say,"—and tears rolled down.

She returned late the next night, worn out and comfortless; almost too dejected to take the cup of nice tea they made for her. Charley was very cast down, he wished he'd taken the lady's advice; he was sure he and his partners would not be let off, because there was such a spite against them.

Because there was such a just fear of their returning to their old courses, would have been the better word; but the unreasoning always attribute distrust and disapproval to spite.

The fatiguing walk was repeated when the trial came on. The men lost it, and nobody was surprised. The vessel was condemned, and the owners sentenced to imprisonment till they could pay a fine of £600.

"Which we never can," said Mrs. Aymer, through her tears. "Grimes and Briggs may pay their share, maybe, but they won't help Charley, they're so selfish. He's been their tool all along."

On investigating the matter very closely, this so plainly appeared to be the case, that the Monktons' pity for the misguided young man greatly increased. For his young wife, now near her confinement, they had deep compassion. There seemed every probability that the men would pass the winter in gaol; "And serve 'em right," said many.

Mrs. Monkton's sympathy was never barren, when she could help people. The weather was bitterly cold when Mrs. Aymer undertook her next visit to her husband—perhaps the last she would pay him before she was confined.

"Tell him," said Mrs. Monkton, "that he knows what strong objections there are to the course which has brought him into this sad trouble; and that I hope to hear from him, through you, that he now firmly resolves never to have anything to do, directly or indirectly, with smuggling again, whatever may be his temptations."

When Mrs. Aymer returned from her sorrowful journey, she brought Mrs. Monkton a little note from Charley, which she said he had written on his knees, and in tears. It began with the emphatic word "Friend," and was to this effect:—"I regret I did not take your advice; and I now promise, on my knees before God, that whatever may be my temptations, I will never have anything to do, directly or indirectly, with smuggling again. So help me, God. Amen."

And God did help him, through the instrumentality of his kind friend. "Vows made in pain are violent and void"—at least, so some say; but Mrs. Monkton had seen enough of life to know something of the expression of genuine contrition. She thought the young man's word was to be trusted, and she acted on that conviction, and addressed a memorial to the Queen. That memorial spoke of Aymer's offence, his temptations, his inability to pay the fine, the good character borne by him and his wife (save in this one bad course), his sacred promise to abandon it, and the reasonable security there was that he would keep his word.

After strict inquiry being made on the spot, through the preventive officer of the station, the Queen, then very young, remitted her half of the fine; which was, indeed, all she could do, as the other half went to the excise. Was it not a merciful and womanly deed?

At dead of night, when the Monktons were in bed and asleep, the wakeful Mrs. Aymer heard a pebble thrown against her window. On opening it, her heart leaped to find Charley standing below. He had walked all those miles, directly he was liberated, to his home and his wife. How joyful their meeting was, they only knew. His first care on his return was to raise money on his little property to pay off the remaining half of the fine.

What became of his partners, I do not remember. Charley kept his word: he never had anything to do, directly or indirectly, with smuggling again. He spent the winter quietly and thankfully at home, and before long might be seen with a nice little girl in his arms. In the spring he was engaged, for good wages, as cook on board a gentleman's yacht.

THE MANNER OF CHRIST'S LOVE.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

"As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you."—John xv. 9.

THESE words are enough to strike awe and wonder into the heart of the most faithful Christian. It is much to know that Christ loves us at all. Wonderful, when we think of it, that his benefits have not been bestowed from a lofty sense of duty, or from desire to do the Father's will, unmingled with a warmer and more human feeling. He did not merely compassionate our wretchedness, and so stoop and save us, as men of finely strung sensibilities might stoop to rescue a reptile from the ploughshare or the wheel: in his heart there was real love, warm, ardent, individualising, self-crucifying love—love in its kind as genuine, but how much greater in degree, than that which burns in the heart of husband and of mother, suffering for wife and child. Such is the love of a Christian to his Lord; and we know that if we love him, it is because he first loved us. And hence, if we were left alone, we might infer that Christ, who so loved the world as to die for it, must feel a very peculiar tenderness for those whom the Father hath given him out of the world. In them he beholds the fruit of his labour, the travail of his soul, the reward—which he deems sufficient—of all his sorrows, humiliation, and blood. Very dear they must be to him, and very comforting their love, amid the ingratitude of the mass of mankind. But there are many kinds of love, all genuine, yet various. The lower creatures have often a very beautiful and striking love for their young offspring, which nevertheless entirely disappears when the strength of their brood has ripened into maturity. The affection of various men is so widely different as to seem unlike the same emotion; and no person will pretend that his love for sister or parent, at six years old, was that enlightened, and calm, and deep affection that he would fain hope it is now. And the love of a Christian for his God is, or ought to be, something quite above and beyond the purest and strongest pulsation of his heart for any fellow-creature whatsoever. While even this is, doubtless, overtopped in stature and out-reached in extent by the love of those blessed and sinless creatures who kept their first estate, and eternally behold him as he is.

Now, considering our degradation when Christ espoused our cause, our long resistance to his gracious invitations, and our many rebellions since we bent our necks beneath his yoke, would it not have been much if he had gone to the love felt by the highest of these to him for a picture of his love to his own people here? If he had told us that no creature ever loved God more than he loved the Church? And would we not have been astonished if he added yet this also, that God's own infinite heart cherished for no creature a love which might not fairly be used to illustrate his love to us? But our Lord Jesus went further yet. He fixed not upon God's love for those ministers of his who do his pleasure—for them who fall down before him with veiled faces—for Gabriel who in the presence of God stands erect; nor yet for that whole vast creation of which they are the crowning point, and which through all its parts abounds in wisdom, smiles in loveliness, or blazes in splendour; but he chose a grander image still. The love of the Father for himself, for the one Son, his well-beloved, who was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him, is set forth as a not presumptuous parallel for the love of Christ for his own people. Not, of course, that the degrees are, equal or the intensity alike; but the manner and the nature are the same.

1. The Son owes his Divine existence to the Father. It is true that he was not created, but he was begotten. It is true that each Person in the glorious Trinity came down through all the past eternity, but that is because the Son was "begotten of the Father before all worlds (or ages); God begotten of God, light begotten of light, very God begotten of very God." He said, "I live by the Father." "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." And when God looks upon Christ he sees there the express image of his own person, and loves it when he sees.

But can we not see that a kindred pleasure (like, though not the same) is felt by the Son when he looks upon his people whom he has redeemed? Has he not said, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, even so he that eateth me, the same shall live by me?" Every act of faith and love—every victory which a loving child gains over its worst passions for Jesus' sake—every taunt endured by a Christian schoolboy, because Christ reviled not again—every temptation to dishonest gains resisted by a careworn man, to secure Living Bread amid the dearth of the meat that perisheth, flows from him as its author, and tends to him as its goal. Ay, more. Whatsoever things are really true and honest, just and pure, lovely and of good report, where there is any genuine virtue and any worthy praise, in them we trace the features of Him who is the father of true honour and deeprooted chivalry, as well as the Head of the Church, the author and finisher of the faith. And in his heart also the mysterious joy of authorship glows and deepens, as more and more he sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied.

2. The power and energy of the Son are derived from his Father; as he said, "The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do. The Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth." Here the latter clause, and, indeed, the whole context, proves that he speaks of more than his human nature; and the infinite love of the Father for his Son is proved by giving his own Spirit and his power not by measure unto him. The power that woke Nature from the sleep of chaos—the power that sustains the universe in order, and prosperity, and loveliness—the power that shall yet shake that universe to its base, and call the forgotten dead from long-levelled graves, where their very bones have crumbled back into dust, all this committed freely to the Son, is a noble standard by which to estimate the love that shines eternally upon him.

We cannot tell how much of Christ's judicial splendour it is "his to give" his people; but we know that the apostles shall sit with him upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and the saints shall judge the world, and to him that overcometh he will give to sit with him on his throne. He says, "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed me." This truly is to love us as the Father hath loved him.

Not only in the future, but now also, Christ proves his affection by giving us power and energy. How does the Christian overcome what his neighbour cannot? How does the converted man resist those allurements which once led him captive at their will? By the enjoyment of a sacred vigour not their own, by a revelation from Christ of his lovely character, and of the beauty of holiness, giving to his followers something of what the Father has given him, making them to be partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world.

3. And as God beholds in Christ his own offspring, and his own power, so does he recognise his own image and likeness too, "the outshining of his glory, and the stamp of his personality."*

Doubtless the joy of creating the universe was that of showing out and expressing God's own power. And not power alone, but love, and order, and beauty were written upon the face of all the worlds, and enjoyed most of all by him who could best appreciate the merits of his own work. In his eyes they were "very good." But never was there such an utterance of what lay deep within the Godhead as in Christ, who is therefore called the Word of God. The Father's nature conveyed itself into him complete and undiminished, and, even shrouded in his veil of flesh, none could see the Son without seeing the Father also. Surely this union of character was a strong bond of love.

But in like manner the character of Christ is seen in his obedient people. Just as truly as the taint of Adam is felt in the world's blood, so surely does the righteousness of Christ reveal itself in his own elect. Christ is formed in them; in his death they die to sin, and in his new life they live again to God.

A true Christian may sin, but sin is not the expression of his true self—not what he may best be understood by—not that in him by which a stranger would get a fair idea of the man. His seed remaineth in him, and (taking the whole man together, reason, and conscience, and affection, heart and head, as well as impulsive hand) he cannot sin.

Where, then, shall we turn for the true character of a man of God? Have you ever thought how little a man's deeds tell about his real self, how often some commonplace, unnoticed person risks to sudden heroism, and another, respectable and blameless hitherto, sinks to the level of a scoundrel and a rogue? None could tell, by their previous lives, which was the villain or which the nobleman. But if you could have looked into their minds, and seen what people they admired or envied, then you could have predicted which would burn like dross in the fire of temptation, and which would shine out true gold. A man most truly is, not what he does, but what he copies and desires to be. Therefore a Christian is best understood and most faithfully represented by Christ, his great exemplar, his model, and his chosen leader. God acts upon this principle, and accepts for ours that perfect righteousness towards which we so imperfectly aspire. And when Christ looks upon the weakest of his people, he sees there at least an infant resemblance to himself—"Christ born"—and expects the time when the likeness shall be perfect—"Christ all in all." And thus he can love us, as the Father loves him, with the love of resemblance.

Such is the privilege, the honour, and the dignity which the worldly man casts behind his back. Is it, then, so much better to be praised and flattered by a crowd than to be loved by the King of kings? Are the pleasures of sin for a season so far superior to the solid, the deep, the un-failing conviction that He has set his love upon us, in whose favour is eternal life? Is the prospect so far more desirable, of waking up to see treasures wasted, hope dead, heaven closed, and the infinite eternity stretching out above our unsheltered heads, without a star to cheer it, than the prospect of going where our treasures are laid up, and our hopes hid with Christ, and of looking down the shining vistas of a boundless future, without finding one moment of separation from the truest and most faithful Friend that ever cheered the journey of life or the bed of death with the golden light of love?

Is it not strange that Christ should have to warn the subjects of such love lest they should wander outside its range? Sooner, we might think, would a dweller in regions of Southern loveliness and warmth turn for pleasure to the frozen zone; sooner would some winged creature, that had freely bathed in the blue of morning, fix his desires upon a cage and a master, than a Christian, who had received Christ's love, be tempted away from its warmth and its largeness to the poor, and selfish, and lonely pleasures of a Christ-forgetting world. But experience does not tell us so. How often have we allowed ourselves to wander far away from the joy and confidence, from the safety and the fellowship, which continuance in his love bestows! What little idea was that which caught our fancy, or tempted our desire, or enraged our self-esteem, or smoothed down our vanity?—and, behold! we have forsaken in heart the fountain of living waters, to drink the stagnant drops which remained in broken cisterns. How very few there are that can claim the calm and settled faith, the bright hope of heaven, and the tranquil contentment in time, which are given to us all while we faithfully continue in the love of Christ.

Therefore we need to be warned and exhorted, lest our own hearts, and the pressure of care, and the flutter of hope destroy us. Therefore each day should have a time, at its commencement, when holy thoughts and fervent prayers may give a tone to the succeeding hours; when earthly wishes may be calmed down to moderation, and the presence of the Master be consciously enjoyed. Therefore there should be a season also at its close, when we may question our own hearts, and force them to confess if they have been faithless and cold, and call our Lord back to the abode which has admitted other occupants. And lest we be lured away by the world, we should think (until we feel) how short a time it has to last, so that if we did not leave it, there is no doubt that it would presently fail us. And also let us fortify ourselves by the hope of those enduring and pure delights with which Christ's love will crown his followers when all other delights have faded.

THE SKY.

“Look unto the heavens, and see; and behold the clouds which are higher than thou.”—Job. xxxv. 5.

HOW many hundreds will elbow, and fight, and pant, and push to see a royal personage or an unusually atrocious criminal, but of these same gasping, eager hundreds, how few will take the trouble to lift their eyes above the carriage of royalty, or the gallows of the criminal, and gaze for a moment on the ineffable beauty and wonder of the sky! “Say, why is this, wherefore, whence can it be?” Does it not seem marvellous that God should be almost daily preparing for our careless eyes sights which man’s utmost dexterity can but feebly imitate, and that nine-tenths of us should be so utterly forgetful of, and thankless for, their glorious spectacles, compared with which royal pageants are but a gaudy mockery? Is it due to carelessness of observation, lack of sympathy with the natural world, or selfish hard-heartedness? We think that it has a mixed origin. Some of us are at best but careless, superficial observers; others, again, hold but in slight estimation the beauties of inanimate Nature; and, thirdly, too many are so utterly consumed with the business of getting together gold, that we actually grudge the time to watch the rolling of a cloud. It is an unhealthy mind that cannot, or will not, cease from grovelling on the earth, to rise for a few moments into the purer, loftier beauties and interests of the sky. A mind thus set in this changeless, iron mould, must be of the earth, earthy.

Depend upon it, if we were to become more of sky-gazers, we should not on that account become worse men of business, worse lawyers, worse physicians, worse ministers; the very sympathy shown with this most glorious and most intelligible of God’s revelations would of itself tend very much to raise and purify our minds, both morally and intellectually. Let but the merchant look upon the fair, open countenance of the sky, and fraud must be exorcised from his mind like some foul spirit; let but the minister glance up to the wide canopy of heaven, and he will forget the clashing of the creeds, and only remember that, “as the blue sky bends over all,” so there is one God, the Lord and Father of us all.

We should acquire the physical habit more of looking up, and not, as so many of us do, walk with downcast eyes, as if the pavements had some magic spell to bind us with, or as though the areas were caves of beauty. The pavements are mostly interesting from the amount of mud they can develop, and the areas are dark, cheerless recesses, railed off from the whirl and hurry of the street. By looking up, we gain light, colour, beauty; by looking down, we find darkness, muddiness, ugliness. Do we lose by merely exercising a different set of the muscles of the eye? Most distinctly, no: we gain. We ought, as human beings, to hold sympathy with the sky, for it has so many features of identity with our own human hearts. The clear and tranquil blue of midsummer is but the image of a heart at peace with itself and the world beside; the dark and lowering gloom of the thunder-cloud is but the shadow of the dark heart at war with itself, and threatening to the world around. The joyous roll of the fleecy cumulus echoes back its music into our joyous hearts, and when the morn rises, “dim, and sad, and wet with early tears,” our hearts are troubled and our eyes are dim. So that it would be but a part of our human dispositions to rejoice with the gladness of the white cloud, or to sorrow with the tearful mists of morning. Artists and poets have hitherto monopolised this sky sympathy; why should it not be extended to all mankind who have eyes to see?

One poet makes use of the wild element of the sky when, in that marvellous description of a storm, in his "In Memoriam," he puts the finishing touch by saying—

"And wildly dashed on tower and tree,
The sunbeam strikes along the world."

The wildly-dashed sunbeam striking along the tempest-stricken world is the keynote to the whole picture.

In Shelley's poem, called "The Recollection," we see how powerfully the character of the sky influenced his mind when he wrote these lines:—

"The whispering waves were half asleep,
The clouds were gone to play,
And on the bosom of the deep
The smile of heaven lay;
It seemed as if the hour were one
Sent from beyond the skies,
Which scattered from above the sun
A light of paradise."

The perfect purity and tranquillity of the sky instilled into the restless heart of Shelley a sacred calm, which is all the more remarkable for the rarity of its occurrence, as this poet sang best and strongest when his heart was filled with wild unrest.

Wordsworth shows in many parts of his works the importance of the sky, and its great influence on the human mind. The feeling of association that is awakened by the sky is well instanced in his poem of "The Two April Mornings," where Matthew replies—

"Yon cloud, with that long purple cleft,
Brings fresh into my mind
Full thirty years behind.

And just above yon slope of corn,
Such colours and no other,
Were in the sky that April morn,
Of this the very brother."

That the mind should have gone back thirty years into the past, merely from seeing an April cloud with its purple cleft, seems at first sight strange, nay, passing strange, to those who care not for the sky, and are heedless of its beauties; but to any one who is a sky-gazer in even a small degree, this link between a cloud and an incident will at once appear most natural, and the very suggestion of such a link in the chain of our ideas shows Wordsworth to have been a great observer as well as a great poet. And indeed, I think that, after all, most of us can remember some pre-eminently bright day, full of sunshine and gladness, which has been associated with happy memories, "one of those heavenly days that never die," and one which owed its charm to the glorious sky that hung smiling over the happy landscape.

As another instance of sky influence on the mind, another quotation from Wordsworth would, I think, be scarcely foreign to the subject; it is from "The Affliction of Margaret," and runs thus:—

"My apprehensions come in crowds;
I dread the rustling of the grass;
The very shadows of the clouds
Have power to shake me as they pass."

Who does not feel the power of melancholy when the last rays of the sun grow dim, and only a faint, tremulous glow is left brooding over the drowsy earth? What is it that lends poetry to those distant elms, but the pale yellow gleam that plays between the branches, making their stems more sombre, and their boughs more weird in outline? Yon pool with its reedy bank is now a mirror of gold, thanks to the golden sky. As the moor-fowl skims with hasty wing along its surface, she leaves a track of fire. To-morrow the mirror of gold will be a dull, grey pond, where ducks do mostly congregate: so great is the power of transformation possessed by evening skies.

The sky, again, gives one a greater idea of vastness, nay, of infinity itself, than any other of God's creations: for who hath "meted out heaven with the span?" Look for a moment up to the blue region overhead, and try to fix a sky-mark by which you may measure this unfathomable, palpitating sea of colour. The mind fails, and from our finite ideas we have a suggestion of the Infinite; and so are we led, by the greatness of God's works, to appreciate the greatness of Him who fashioned them so gloriously, "who made the outgoing of the morning and evening to praise him;" and when led to thank that God for having made the sky so exceeding beautiful, that, should we but raise our eyes above, the very wonder of its beauty could not fail to make our hearts overflow with gratitude and praise.

In Job we have a fine allusion to the sky. It begins as follows:—"Hearken unto this, O Job: stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God. Dost thou know when God disposed them, and caused the light of his cloud to shine? Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge?" And again, "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?"

To show how the absence of all sky, and consequently light, brings suggestions of death and annihilation, I would quote again from Job one verse in the third chapter, where, in the utter misery and desolation of his soul, he curses the day of his birth: "Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day." On the other hand, we could, from the very force of antithesis, have imagined that Job, in the days of his prosperity, when the dark cloud of trial had passed away, would rather have exclaimed with the preacher, "Truly, the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun!"

Could we but for a moment conceive such a creation as a world without a sky, or rather, we would say, without an illuminated sky—a sunless, moonless, starless existence—and have but a grey, pale mist enshrouding the earth, how completely would our ideas be changed. Then, indeed, should we of necessity cling to the earth, and cease to aspire to higher things; nay, the very word heaven, meaning originally the sky regions, would find no place in our language; light would be such a feeble emanation that we could scarcely have shadow, and day and night would cease to alternate; but one perpetual twilight would reign in cold, unyielding order. As colour owes so much of its beauty to light, we should have sombre greys and dull browns; instead of the bluebell, would spring up a pale, ghostly flower devoid of hue; the rose would forget its blushes, and the laburnum its fires; the emerald and purple of the sunlit sea would be exchanged for a dull and uniform grey; heathery mountains would no longer glow with the sunset, nor daisied meadows shimmer joyous in the morning; the flash of the breaking wave, the gleam on the wild bird's wing, the dazzle on snowy peaks, and the lightning of love's eyes, would be unthought of as unknown. We should live a set-grey life, with no sunshine to cheer us, no colour to refine; our thoughts would be lifeless, and our aspirations would be limited. We should grope through existence, as men who dream that they are half-blind, and even feel with blunted faculties. Life, with its glorious alternations of light and shade, would be a cheerless monotony, without light, or hope, or love, or gladness. Grey children of the mist, sprung from grey sires, without a blush in the cheek to suggest either modesty or health, without light or colour in the eye to speak of sorrow or of love, we should totter with uncertain steps from this earthly twilight to the uncertain twilight of the grave.

"NE FRUSTRA VIXISSE VIDEAR."

[Immediately before the death of the great astronomer, Tycho Brahe, he and Kepler were engaged in the composition of tables from the Oranienberg Observatory, built for him by Frederick II. He was suddenly seized with an acute disease, which, after a few days of intense suffering, terminated in mortification. During his delirium, he constantly uttered the words, "Ne frustra vixisse videar:" their double meaning cannot be rendered in English.]

MIGHTY sage lay at the point of death,
Tossing, delirious, in his feverish pain,
And, mid the gasping of his difficult breath,

Muttered this sentence, ever and again—

"That I may seem not to have lived in vain!"

A mighty sage—to him the boundless stores
Of Nature lay disclosed: her subtlest ways
He traced observant. Heaven's empyreal doors
Rolled backwards at his will, and to his gaze Showed all the wealth of stars wherewith her regions blaze.

Princes and kings had vied in noble strife
To win the wizard. In a peaceful isle
One built him up a palace, where his life Might pass in converse with the stars the while—
"The City of the Heavens"—"Oranienberg" the pile.

The wise, the great, the noble, from afar
Made pilgrimage to see him, and commune
Upon the glory of each separate star—
The orbits of the planets, sun, and moon,
Sweeping the heavens with glass at midnight's noon.

And now beside him, at the supremest hour,
Stands, sad and mute, a fellow-sage, who came
To labour with him 'mongst the stars—whose power
Revealed the planets' laws—a glorious name
Three centuries embalm in deathless fame.

And as he sought to soothe the dying man,
Whose wild eye knew him not, he heard again
The same strange murmuring, ever as it ran,
Between the pauses of the sufferer's pain—
"That I might seem not to have lived in vain!"

What meant he by these words? 'Twere hard to tell.

Perchance he uttered them in conscious pride
That in the hearts of men his name should dwell
A living power, spreading far and wide,
Long as the heavens should last, the earth abide.

Perchance, in trembling fear, as in the face
Of the tremendous future, all unknown,
His spirit hovered, and could find no place
Within its gloom to rest in hope upon,
That all he did in life had not been vainly done.

What! though he knew all mysteries, and read
Heaven as a scroll—what were to him the gain?
To take his science down unto the dead,
Giving the worms for food his wondrous brain!—
Ah! if 'twere so, then had he lived in vain.

Perchance he spoke in hope, as one who knew Life's nobler use—to count all things as dross,
No knowledge excellent, no science true,
Save that which showed him Christ upon the cross—
Teaching to die was gain, to live was loss.

And Kepler stood by Brahe till the spasm
Of anguish passed away, and that great brain
Ceased to throb wildly. Over the dark chasm
'Twixt earth and heaven the spirit of the Dane Passed! Who shall say that he had lived in vain?

Who?—Not the student, who, at dead of night,
Watches the welkin from his tower on high,
Telling by name each several orb of light—
Planet or star—that studs the luminous sky,
And scans the glories of the galaxy.

Who?—Not the seaman, when, from land afar,
His course upon the trackless deep he steers;
Fixing his eye upon some well-known star,
His heart is tranquil, for he knows no fears
While in the heavens that guiding light appears.

Oh! not the Christian—for he trusts that God,
Who formed that mighty intellect and brain,
Will raise him up, through Christ's atoning blood,
Amid his own redeemed saints to reign—
A servant good, who did not live in vain.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE EAST WIND.

HEY'RE moving off at last, mother!" said Captain Oglivie, from his sofa, looking up from the letter he had been reading.

"Who are moving off?" said the lady addressed, in a rather querulous tone.

"These old Oglivies," her son replied, tossing the letter into her lap. And silence followed while she read.

Captain Oglivie's regiment was quartered in Edinburgh Castle; and Captain Oglivie had apartments there, apartments which were dull enough, notwithstanding that the Castle commands one of the finest views in the kingdom. They simply looked upon a paved courtyard, in which the only movement that was ever to be seen was a company at drill, or a parcel of staring strangers making a pilgrimage to the rooms which Mary Queen of Scots had graced with her presence.

The captain might walk on the batteries, however, and they might well have atoned to him for the dull outlook of his chambers. There was the deep green valley at his feet; and beyond that, the fair and regular streets of the New Town, sloping to the green fields beyond; these in their turn running down to the silver firth, with its islands and its sails; and beyond the firth, if the mists were propitious, there were picturesque shores; and still further to the north and west, hints of cloud-capped mountains. To the east, among the hills that stand round about the city, there was the bold crest of the Salisbury Craggs, and the rugged head and smooth, green flanks of the lion couchant of Arthur's Seat.

But of these, and of all the other "beauties of Edinburgh," Captain Oglivie got tired before he had been many months in the place: as also of the beauties of another sort whom he met at the endless evening parties which he, as part of his duty, was expected to attend: as also of promenading up and down Prince's Street, the fashionable afternoon's lounge, and bowing perpetually to the hundred and one acquaintances who already claimed that honour in the head-quarters of Scottish hospitality. His mother was with him in the town, and he was tired of her too. Not that he was a particularly undutiful son. He was fond of his mother, with the fondness people have for those who devote themselves exclusively to their, the said people's, interests. But she bored him nevertheless, insisting on accompanying him always and everywhere. She contrived to get herself asked out with her son continually, and Captain Oglivie knew that she was always on the look out for a suitable wife for him, and he lived in dread of her finding one.

His mother's taste and his own did not exactly correspond in that particular. The captain was fastidious in his taste. He could not make himself agreeable to a plain woman, and he could not tolerate a stupid one, and he scarcely dared so much as to look at or speak to a poor one, let her be ever so pretty or ever so witty, or even both at once. He was reduced to living on his pay, and a wife could not be maintained on expectations which had failed adequately to support himself. Besides, he did not want to get married. He did not think marriage, on the best of terms, compatible with making the most of himself.

Poor, with a taste for riches, idle, and yet having in him both the will and the power to exert himself with energy, given something which he considered worth the working for, Captain Oglivie was not a happy man. Moreover, he was a man deteriorating—a process which, happily, cannot go on without creating some discomfort. What was good in him was being overgrown by what was bad—by rank selfishness and self-indulgence.

His mother's apartments were in Prince's Street; he could see the windows from the ramparts above, and he lounged into them every day for luncheon. She was by no means luxuriously lodged—for the houses are comparatively mean—in "the finest street in Europe;" neither was she a luxurious liver. In truth, she had barely enough to live upon.

She was sitting bolt upright in her chair (the backs of the last generation must have been stronger than those of the present), after a frugal meal, at which she drank water, while her son drank wine. He lay stretched at full length on the sofa, when the servant entered with a letter brought by the midday post. It was for him, and, with his mother's eyes upon him, he took it lazily, and proceeded to break the seal. First, however, he looked at the post-mark, having noted the mourning edge, and when he had read it, he manifested a little more interest, by bringing his feet to the floor.

"What is it?" asked his mother, eagerly.

But he took his time to answer, and then he vouchsafed the exclamation and explanation recorded above.

And there was silence in the room until she had read the letter, in which Margery Oglivie announced her sister's death. She had not written immediately—that is, not till after the funeral, as she did not expect Captain Oglivie to come so far to attend it, at such a season.

"What a mercy!" exclaimed his mother, when she had finished her perusal.

"Well, I can't say I see any particular good in it," rejoined the son. "There's the other old lady, a great deal tougher than the one that's gone; but, for all that, the present Sir Alexander may live longer."

"I did not mean that the death was a mercy, Horace," said his mother, reproachfully; "but it is a mercy for a man who has suffered so long as Gilbert Oglivie to be taken away."

"He's not dead!"

"No; but don't you see what she says at the end of her letter? he's not expected to last much longer."

"I didn't notice that," said Captain Oglivie, taking back the letter out of his mother's hands. "It is strange that she should mention him," he muttered, as he re-perused the concluding portion, which, to say truth, he had skipped, as containing only "suitable reflections." "I shouldn't wonder if they trumped up a reconciliation at the last. It would be all up with me in that case."

"How?" said his mother, sharply.

"I don't think Mistress Margery is specially fond of me, that's all. But I don't see that it matters much: she is like enough to see me out. As for Gilbert Oglivie, it seems to me, since he has lived so long, there's nothing to hinder him from living for ever. I wish," he added, bitterly—"I wish I had learned to work like a man, instead of hanging on, waiting for others to die. But there isn't a chance in this wretched profession!"

"You're going to the ball to-night?" said his mother.

"I suppose I must," he answered, sulkily; "are you?"

It was rather an abrupt turn which the old lady had given to the conversation; but it followed quite naturally the association of ideas in her mind, the connecting link being the future fortune of her son. She replied in the affirmative. "Do you think you could settle it to-night?" she went on, after a pause.

"Oh, bother!"

The settlement thus politely shelved, was that of no less important a matter than the securing of the hand of a very plain young lady, who had been recently left an orphan, and was entirely her own mistress, to whom, in a fit of desperation, the captain had contemplated sacrificing himself.

"Well, there's Miss Jessie Barclay," persisted his mother; "she's pretty enough, and I'm sure she's only waiting to be asked."

"Stupid as an owl!" he answered. "I took her down to supper the other night, but I could get nothing out of her but 'yes' or 'no.' She could not take up the simplest subject—dropped them all—till I could think of nothing more to say. I could only feed her, and it wasn't an easy task, mother, I assure you: trifle, and tartlets, and creams, disappeared like magic. She would eat up her fortune in the course of a year, I'm certain."

"How very ill-natured you are, Horace," cried his mother. "She's a sweet young lady."

"Very," he answered, wickedly, and added, "my dear mamma, your society is infinitely preferable to hers;" a statement which restored the old lady to good humour and pertinacity at once.

"Then there's the father, you know," he replied, after listening to a statement of the advantages of marriage in general and of this marriage in particular; "he is sure to insist on settlements. I don't want to be thrown over again, as I was by that old soapboiler only three months ago. It's most likely this Mr. Barclay would do just the same—ask me how I meant to provide for my wife, and tell me to table an equal sum in case of my death." It's always the way with these traders; they must make a bargain about everything; and they never think of dying. There! I hate the whole thing," he exclaimed, his pale face flushing with anger, mostly at circumstances, but partly also at himself for being the slave of these, and he flung himself back on the sofa in no very amiable frame of mind.

Being in an uncomfortable mood, his thoughts reverted to Peggy Oglivie. His thoughts did not turn to her very often,—indeed, only when he could not help himself. He was vexed with himself about her, and that did not make the thought of her particularly pleasant to him. He wished that he had denied himself the gratification of making love to her, and of finding out if she would return it. But he was not in the habit of denying himself any gratification. "She was both pretty and clever," he thought; "no, not clever: she might be quite dull at an evening party perhaps; but refreshing, somehow." He had not felt so like himself—his best self—with any woman since. "Poor little thing! I hope she has forgotten all about me by this time," was his reflection with regard to her. Then he said, aloud, "I wish Miss Margery had asked me to go down, I think I should have gone; indeed, I shouldn't much mind going yet."

"The wind is in the east, my dear Horace," said his mother; "and you know you cannot bear the east wind."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DEATH AND CHANGE.

DURING the winter, Delaube had not been left so entirely to itself as formerly. Peggy's name and fame were being spread abroad by her friend the doctor, and one or two ladies of the neighbourhood had ventured to call upon her, half in kindness, half in curiosity. Their verdict was strictly favourable, for they had found her "nothing particular,"—who ever does find anybody anything in particular in the course of a morning call? And so their kindness had increased as their curiosity diminished. Doctor and Mrs. Grant had come whenever open weather permitted them, bringing news of Archie and Sandie at their studies. And Mr. Keith had also come, accompanied by his wife, a quick-eyed, merry little woman, who could almost have persuaded any one that there was no such thing as care and sorrow in the world.

It was not, therefore, an unprecedented occurrence that of Peggy being summoned from her grandfather's side to receive a visitor. But she left him, and went into the long-disused drawing-room, which Jean had lately insisted on furbishing up, expecting to see one or other of the above-mentioned ladies. It appeared to be a stranger, however, who stood with her back toward the door, looking out of the window. She faced suddenly round as Peggy entered, saying, abruptly, "You won't know me, I dare say."

"Now I know you," answered Peggy, at once recognising the voice, though she had failed to recognise the face—which was in shadow—or the figure, draped in deep mourning.

The sensitive blood was rising in Peggy's cheeks. She was at a loss how to receive her visitor, who still remained standing, and whose embarrassment was so visibly painful. To put an end to it was her immediate impulse. She therefore drew near and offered her hand, and Margery Oglvie found herself seated, and speaking as freely as it was her nature to speak, before she knew how it had come about. After the exchange of a few sentences, "How is he?" she jerked out, uneasily.

"My grandfather is rather better to day," Peggy answered.

"I have come to see him," said Margery, in the same uneasy tone.

"I must ask him whether he is able first. It might agitate him to see you without warning. Shall I go to him now and tell him you are here?"

Margery assented, and Peggy, more than half afraid of the consequences, went to prepare her grandfather for the visit.

It was certainly a great change that had come upon Gilbert Oglvie. He no longer desired to hide himself, like a wounded beast, from the sight of his kind, and though he trembled visibly at Peggy's communication, he only said, "I am glad she has come; tell her I am glad she has come. I had thoughts of sending for her, for your sake, little one."

"For my sake, grandfather!" but the questioning

"why," was interrupted by the eagerness with which the dying man repeated, "Send her to me as quickly as you can, child."

Peggy returned with her message, and speedily ushered Margery Oglvie into her grandfather's presence. She seemed to divine that the two should be left alone, for she prepared to leave the room at once, saying, "I will come to you when you ring for me, grandfather."

"Ay, that will be the best," he answered; and as she left the room she saw a thin hand held out to Margery Oglvie from the bed.

A long time elapsed, so long a time that Peggy became quite uneasy, and still the interview had not come to a close. More than once she thought of interrupting it, lest it should prove hurtful to her patient. But at length the visitor came out, looking not paler—she could not well look paler than she was—but, more gentle and subdued, with that abstracted, concentrated look which long-continued or strong emotion gives.

"He does not want you just yet," she said, softening her harsh tones till her voice sounded strangely humble. "I have given him some wine. He will ring for you in a little;" and with a promise to come again, she took her leave.

An hour after, Peggy went into her grandfather's room, and found him asleep, and came away again softly.

And again she sat patiently waiting, and working also, till the light waxed dimmer and dimmer, and she could no longer see to draw the delicate pattern she was elaborating. The day was closing, and Jean came in to say it was time for tea.

Then she thought it would be best to waken the sleeper, and she went in to him once more. She called to him softly, but he did not stir. Then she went and drew aside the heavy curtain, and let in the last light of day, and, looking in his face, he was dead! And a great cry rang through the quiet house.

Gilbert Oglvie lay dead at last; and, instead of looking like a man who has suffered sore defeat, he looked like a king reposing in his triumph. And he had triumphed. On the battle-ground of his soul he had routed and put to flight the demons of wrath and pride, and won the sum of all victory—peace.

It was after the funeral, and Peggy was left alone with Margery Oglvie.

"What will you do now?" said the latter, in her sudden way.

"I will stay here," was the answer, very gently spoken.

"You will come home with me," was the somewhat peremptory rejoinder.

"I cannot."

"But it is not fit that one so young as you should live alone," said the older woman.

"I am not afraid of being alone."

"You will be the wonder of the whole countryside," said Margery.

Peggy, in her sorrow, felt utterly indifferent to their wonder. The argument did not move her. She only repeated, "I cannot come."

"Think better of it," said the harsh-seeming woman, with tears in her eyes. "I'm a poor lonely creature, and I would do what I could to make you happy. If you knew what it was to wish you had been kinder, when those you might have been kind to will never need it more, you would come. My life has been very hard. It's harder now than I'm able to bear almost," and she fairly gave way, and wept.

She had fallen upon the right sort of argument at last, for Peggy softened at once at the sight of her suffering, and hastened to offer, as a sort of a compromise, to go and stay with her for a time at least.

And thus it was settled. It was the first spring morning of the year, counting, not by the calendar, but by the bursting of buds, the singing of birds, and the warmth of sunshine, when Peggy set out on her visit.

She was conscious of a chill falling upon body and spirit as she was driven into the neglected domain of the Forest House, through the open gateway of the principal entrance. The last year's leaves muffled the sound of the wheels, so thickly were they strewn upon the drive. The sunshine seemed to be less warm within the enclosure, the very birds seemed to sing less gaily. She was glad that the gate stood open behind her; it seemed like a way of escape. Had it closed, she would have felt as if a prison had received and shut her in.

There was a chill also in the welcome which was awarded to her, not on the threshold, but within the room which she remembered so well. Margery Oglivie had relapsed into her customary rigidity, and stood, as stiffly as one of her high-backed, uncomfortable chairs, holding out her hand with scanty greeting.

Peggy forgot, or rather she did not know, how impossible it is to throw off the habit of a lifetime. And to her, to whom expression was so easy and so natural, who could not help expressing herself as it were, the constraint of one in whom the power was wanting was difficult to understand. Margery Oglivie seemed cold and constrained, while in reality she was suffering from excess of emotion.

They spent a painful morning, these two women, with nothing in common but subjects that it was better to avoid, or at least that they thought had better be avoided. They went over the house, in which there was nothing to see, and they went over the grounds, from which there was nothing to be seen, the place being built almost in a hollow. They were returning to the house, when, at the end of the walk along which they were advancing, they saw two men coming toward them. One was the old gardener, and the other was poor witless Alexander Oglivie.

"You won't be frightened at my brother," said Margery, with an appealing look which softened her rigid features. "I wished him to keep out of the way for a day or two, but he is not always easy to manage. He may cry out, till he gets accustomed to you."

With a conscious shrinking Peggy replied that it was better to let him get accustomed to her at once; and so she advanced up the walk, feeling that she would gladly have taken hold of her companion's arm, but fearing that such a sign of timidity would give her pain.

But, instead of behaving wildly, as he sometimes would, Alexander Oglivie greeted Peggy with a reassuring smile. It was really only when he was frightened that he cried out, or when any one exhibited signs of fear, and she had put forth all her energies to repress any such signs. She had even ventured on giving him her hand, and he smoothed it between his own long, thin fingers as one smooths the coat of a pet animal. They were to be friends, it was evident, for Peggy's fear had given place to pity, and he seemed to accept her presence with signs that betokened pleasure. And they were friends from that hour.

After a day or two he began to seek her, and to follow her about, and to exhibit for her a kind of dumb animal affection, which was very touching. Margery saw it, and was glad, and yet there mingled with her gladness a feeling that was very like jealousy. He had been worse to manage since Janet's death: perhaps it was that there had been two to bear the burden while she lived; but Margery, with all her devotion, had never been able to exert over him the soothing influence which her sister had exercised; and here was a stranger who already had more of that influence than she.

Peggy had taken out her drawing one afternoon, when the poor fellow came to the window, and demanded admittance in a noisy fashion. Under the impression that he might disturb her at her task, Margery had risen, and was endeavouring by signs to send him away. But he would not be sent.

"Please don't," said Peggy, divining the motive; "let him come and sit beside me: he will not disturb me in the least."

"He will be certain to disturb you," replied his sister. "He will take away some of your papers. We cannot keep a bit of written paper for him."

"Oh, never mind," Peggy answered; "let him come."

And he came, and manifested an immediate desire to take possession of her whole stock. But she restrained him. She always spoke to him as if he could hear and understand. And while he watched her movements, he did somehow seem to understand. Then she took her pencil, and made a rapid sketch for him, a rude representation of a tree and a cow. After that he was content to sit beside her while she drew, till it became quite an occupation for her to amuse him in this way.

The painfulness and restraint were wearing off between Margery and her guest, greatly helped by the good understanding established between the latter and poor Sir Alexander; but the awful monotony began to make itself felt; Margery felt it for another, though she had never felt it for herself, and strove in some measure to break it up. She went beyond the grounds in their daily walk; she got the chaise and drove to Delaube, that Peggy might see how Jean got on in her absence. Still, she was conscious how very dull the life must be to a mere girl, and she could think of nothing to enliven it. When they sat together, there were great blanks in their talk,

"like the spaces between these awful chairs," Peggy thought. And then the prison-feeling would come over her, and she would look sad, and pale, till the rigid woman who sat opposite regarded her with keen, cold eyes, that ought to have been soft with pity if they had only been lighted from within.

At last she had thought of something. Sitting together one evening, she said, suddenly, "I have written to Captain Oglivie, a relation of ours, asking him to come and stay for a week or two while you are here!"

MRS. O'HALLORAN'S HOSPITALITY.

ABOUT twelve years ago I paid a visit to London, and during my stay there took charge of a Sunday class. The school was held in a long, dingy room, over stabling; and the high, small windows admitted but a scanty portion of light or air. The place was situate in the heart of a squalid, crowded neighbourhood, and the children were of a sadly neglected type. My heart ached as I glanced at the pale, sharp faces which gathered round me.

"Are all this class here?" I inquired of the eldest girl.

"No, teacher, there's little Mike O'Halloran; and sure, here he comes."

The opening door admitted a lad about eight years old—a striking contrast to every other child in the room. His hair was auburn, his cheeks were red, his eyes were blue, he had on a green tie, in short, he gave one the idea of something particularly fresh and smart. He came forward smiling: the other children made way, and Mike gave me a bashful obeisance as he took his seat at the top of the class.

When school was over, I proceeded to take down the names and addresses of my scholars. It was not a very easy task. Many seemed almost unconscious of the possession of a surname; and in lieu of "numbers," I was instructed "to go down the court, and ring the top bell three times at the rag-shop." Puzzled and anxious, I waded through the duty, until one by one my poor pupils left, and only little Mike O'Halloran remained.

"I know your name," I said, smiling, as he stood before me, and pulled his radiant forelock. "And where do you live?"

"At No. 3, Elm Court," he answered, promptly; "push open the front door, and walk straight up till you see a door with 'O'Halloran' on it—that's ours: and, please, mother says, when may she expect you to see us?"

I looked up astonished. He seemed to think I needed an explanation, and went on, "We knowed there was to be a new teacher, miss, and mother telled me to say that, with her reverence and respect."

"I shall try to come in the course of the week, Mike," I answered, getting greatly interested in the boy.

"But, please, miss," and he spoke in a confidential tone, "won't you make me able to go home and tell mother when you'll come, or haply she'll be out, and she's mighty sorry to miss a wisitor, cause we has so few!"

"Then I will come to-morrow," I promised; "but what is that at the door?" for Mike and I were left alone in the dingy room, and there was a mighty scratching outside.

"It's only Smut—that's Mr. Smith's, the butcher's dog. He always comes to fetch me; good arternoon, miss;" and the little fellow hurried off, and I heard him receive a very noisy canine greeting.

Now, during this conversation, I had time to observe the boy, and saw that, despite his bright appearance, he was very poorly clad. The green tie was only a bit of worsted braid, and his clean collar was quite embroidered with darns. I concluded there must be active hands and a brave heart in little Mike's home, and I was quite glad when Monday evening came.

Elm Court was a dirty noisy place, with great old houses which had once seen better days, and were adorned with quaint wood carvings, whose shattered remnants still remained, only serving to harbour dirt. "Number 3" was no better than the others. The front door stood open, and I groped up the wide, dark staircase, till the name "O'Halloran" stared in my face. Now this was not on a plate, nor yet painted on the door, nor yet written on a card; the name was composed of single letters, of various colours, apparently cut from play-bills or placards, and pasted on a piece of thin wood, nailed over the door. "These are clever people," I thought, as I knocked.

Mike let me in. The room was at the top of the house, a low, wide chamber, with sloping, whitewashed walls. There were two beds on the floor, each covered with gaudy patchwork quilts. Close to the fireplace, was a small deal table with a white cloth over it, and some stools and chairs about it. Mrs. O'Halloran came forward from this corner.

"I'm right proud to see you, miss," she said, "and the 'tay will be ready in a minute, if you'll do us the favour of taking a cup."

I could not refuse, for Mike's smiling face told that he regarded the affair as a grand entertainment; so I took off my bonnet and sat down.

"There's only us three," said Mrs. O'Halloran, as she set out two cups and a mug. "I'm a widow, miss, dear, or the place would be better worth coming to."

"But Smut's coming," put in Mike.

"Well, go and fetch him," said his mother. "Mr. Smith lets us have Smut, whenever we like, miss; and that's a great favour, for he's a famous play-fellow for the boy, and we couldn't afford a dog for ourselves."

"Mike will soon be a great help to you, I remarked."

"Mike's a help now, miss," she answered, "for he earns a little money, let alone keeping the place clean, and giving me heart to work. Sure, miss, I've heard people pity widows for having children to maintain; but says I, God help the widows that has none! It's mighty hard to be work, work, working, with no one to work for. And then the ones that has the care and 'sponsibility can't well keep things nice; they begins to think it'll do to eat dinner in the street, and it'll do to lay down on the bed without making it; and they loses all comfort in life, and perhaps takes to the public."

We were a very merry party, Mrs. O'Halloran and I, Mike and Smut, who held up his black nose with an expression that said plainly, "The smallest contributions thankfully received." Gradually, the mother and I fell into graver conversation.

"I can't read myself," she said, "and I always look forward to Sunday evening, when Mike tells me what he's heard in the school. He reads the Bible to me now—it's very little I knew about it before he could; but yet I knew just enough to get along with. My poor man and me both knew the Lord had died for us, and though we'd neither of us any learning, we'd been taught one or two texts that stuck to us all along, telling us that we must all love one another, as Jesus had loved us, and not be over-careful, but to always give thanks. And when poor Michael was a-dying—he was hurt by a fall, miss; but, thank God, they brought him home, and not to the hospital—he just put his arm round Mike and me, and said, 'Mary, I'm certain sure there's a text where God says, Leave the fatherless children and widows to me, and I will provide,—only it says it in beautiful words than I can remember. And Mary,' he says, 'you hold fast to that, and mind there's some one taking better care of you than poor Michael could.' And the Lord has provided," said Mrs. O'Halloran, with streaming eyes. "Mike and I have always been well and hearty, and if the meal has been sometimes scanty, better the good appetite without food, than food without appetite. Some folks said, 'Get the boy into some school, and go to service;' but I answered, 'Not I! leave the charity for orphans; Mike isn't an orphan while he's got his mother.' And now, miss, we're getting on better every day. I can get enough to keep us, and Mike manages to pay his own schooling and get his bits of clothes—the time'll come when he'll have better; and we can always pick up pleasures without paying for 'em. We're seldom without a flower in the room, Mike finds 'em among the rubbish in Farrington Market—a little faded, maybe, but fresh water sets 'em up, and their scent comes over me, with the memory of the times when Michael and I were courtin' in the bonny lanes of Bargo! Oh, the Lord has given us many blessings!"

"And none greater than your cheerful spirit," I said.

"That's just the young gentleman's words," interrupted Mike, pausing in his gambols with Smut.

"Who is the young gentleman?" I inquired.

Mrs. O'Halloran looked confused. "Just a poor boy I gave a night's lodging to, last week," she said.

"It was a mortal cold night, and he was lyin' on the doorstep," explained Mike; "and mother took him down a basin of porridge, and arterwards she let him sleep up here."

"I'm feared he was an impostor," said Mrs. O'Halloran, shaking her head, "for in the morning, instead of owning he was a honest lad, tramping the country for work, he said as he was a gentleman's son, who had run away from home, thinking he would like to go to sea. So I advised him in that case to make his way back, and I gave him a copper or two, but I was very stiff to him after that story, for I didn't believe it. But a little kindness couldn't hurt him, whatever he was."

Just then came a knock at the door. Mike went to open it, and exclaimed, joyfully, "Mother, it's the young gentleman himself! and some one else beside."

Then entered a tall, well-dressed youth, whom Mrs. O'Halloran evidently could hardly recognise, followed by a stout, farmer-like man, who shook the widow's hand with bluff heartiness.

"Where would yonder young fellow have been, but for your kindness, mistress?" he said. "I've made inquiries about you since, and find you're a well-spoken-of woman; and I like you none the less for not being over eager to believe that boy's romantic story. I think he'll take your advice for the future, and stop at home. But suppose you come and live in my lodge, and then you'll be able to keep the gates shut, if he wants to run away."

"Oh, miss, dear!" sobbed Mrs. O'Halloran, when her visitors were gone, after making arrangements to expect her and Mike (and Smut too, if Mr. Smith would part with him) at the lodge in the course of the week—"oh, miss, dear, isn't it altogether too wonderful?"

"Not too wonderful, Mrs. O'Halloran," I whispered; "Mike will show you a text which says, 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'"

Then I bade them both good-bye. Oh, their room was very humble, and yet it pained me to leave it for my own lonely lodging. But I comforted myself by looking in at Mr. Smith's, the butcher's, and completing Mike's delight by securing the pleasure of Smut's society in his pleasant country home.

But how I missed the boy's bright face next Sunday!

THE GILDED AGE

Saturday, December 14, 1867.

"And, finally, Mrs. Goldbag brought some grapes from under her shawl."—p. 196.

THE GOLDBAGS AND THE PENTURBYS.

IT was a strange sort of street; houses were jumbled together in it without any reference to appearances. I don't think there was more than one pair of houses in that street bearing any resemblance to one another. Why the whole street wasn't pulled down, and rebuilt with two rows of handsome, uniform houses, I can't conceive; and I wonder that the wealthy people who lived in their gorgeous gazabos could tolerate the shabby, dingy little tenements that clustered around them.

Two houses there were in that street, where the contrast between threadbare respectability and glossy extravagance was most remarkable. These houses stood facing one another. The first was a gigantic mansion—one of those huge stone fabrics, square and solid, which seem to be conscious that their dignity depends on their immobility. The inhabitants were supplied with provisions, I have no doubt, for there was a side-entrance for tradespeople; but the great front-door seldom swung on its hinges, and then only under the grasp of the majestic footman. I never saw a pedestrian enter or leave the house. Carriages rolled up to the steps occasionally, and satined dames passed the threshold, and repassed it after a conventional period. The family vehicle drove to the door once a day, in fine weather, and the delicately-kept, sleek horses ambled away for a short hour, and returned.

Throughout the house there diffuses itself a glow of stately comfort, which seems to defy the dark shades of sorrow; but in the faces of the master and mistress, Mr. and Mrs. Goldbag, you may trace hard, sharp lines and deep furrows; anxious, timid glances—unmistakable tokens of the skeleton which lodges in that firm mansion. The bright household is somewhat sick of its gloomy grandeur. Those long and majestic halls, those heavy and tapestried rooms, are never jocund with the peals of baby merriment. In the midst of the grim magnificence is a feeble, sickly, frail-looking child, silent and awed, prematurely well-bred—the sole stay, the melancholy representative of all that pomp. Often, too, have I seen a tearful woman's face and a regretful man's pressed against the smooth squares of plate-glass, looking with half-envious glances at the many happy, healthy children of the mouldy little habitation opposite—a straight, narrow, brick house, running up four storeys in all, each storey boasting its two small rooms, front and back. No lack of children to fill those eight little cells—to give them a room apiece would have filled them all—well-fed children, following one another with the regularity of steps, from Edward the eldest to Samuel the baby, who won't be the baby much longer.

Every morning at eight, and every evening at six, Mr. Penturby, the father of that goodly array of children, might be seen on the doorsteps of that dusty house. He was a mechanically punctual man. He had never been late at his office but once, and that day was marked with a black letter in Mr. Penturby's almanack; he felt himself degraded when he recalled that day. He had done nothing wrong—no; he had not been indulging in any spirits the night before, which made him oversleep himself—no; his being late that day was purely accidental; but poor Mr. Penturby felt himself degraded when he remembered it. He was shy and punctilious and nervous, and he couldn't bear being late, even though the cause was an honourable one, as it was on that solitary occasion. He had met a little child who had lost her way, and what could he do but take the poor crying thing home? as he said to Mrs. Penturby afterwards.

Mr. Penturby was a thin, tall man—unlike his opposite neighbour, who was short and stout; and unlike his opposite neighbour, Mr. Penturby had only one great coat. It was bright and new and fashionable when the nuptials of the happy pair were celebrated, and it had done duty every winter since—fifteen winters—a long, but not an impossible time for a great coat to last; “at least for such great coats as were made when I was young,” said the poor clerk, as he gazed with fond affection at the shabby relic.

“My dear,” said Mrs. Penturby, one day, to her husband, as that worthy gentleman returned home, “I think there must be somebody ill opposite, a carriage has stopped there twice to-day, and I am sure it was a doctor's, for the gentleman went in and out so fast, just as if he hadn't a moment to stay. Perhaps there's going to be another baby. How pleased they will be. Wouldn't it be kind just to step over and inquire?” added Mrs. Penturby, in whom curiosity and sympathy were both at work.

“My dear,” said Mr. Penturby, “I shouldn't presume to do such a thing.”

“But why not, my dear?” urged the partner of his bosom; “why not? There can be no presumption in making inquiries which couldn't be taken otherwise than kindly.”

“Well, my dear, I should be very pleased to show a kindly disposition towards my neighbours, whether they were rich or poor, but I am not at all sure that Mr. Goldbag would not think it great presumption.”

And so the conversation ended for the time. Later in the evening, however, Mr. Penturby said to his wife, “My dear, I see Mr. Goldbag's coachman standing at the corner. I have a sort of acquaintance with him—in fact, I did him a good turn once—so I think I shall just run over, and inquire.”

A minute afterwards, Mr. Penturby was seen slipping across the street, and addressing with timid deference the burly coachman. When he returned, a shade was on his brow, as he told his wife that there was no prospect of another baby over the way, but every prospect of losing the only one, for the doctor gave but little hope. “And my dear, Mr. Jenkinson—that's the coachman, my dear—has promised to tell us how the little fellow goes on."

For the next few days the whole Penturby household felt an all-absorbing interest in the little sick child over the way, and Mr. Jenkinson kept them constantly supplied with the most recent intelligence. One evening, the master of the stately mansion was looking gloomily out of the window, thinking of his trouble, more with the feeling of thwarted and impatient pride, than of fatherly affection, when he perceived the lean figure of Mr. Penturby in the attitude of deep conversation with the coachman. Mr. Penturby was listening eagerly to Mr. Jenkinson's somewhat pompous account of the doctor's last opinion. But Mr. Goldbag felt angry to see his coachman engaged in such close intercourse with a shabby-looking stranger. Perhaps the fact that a group of little eager faces were looking anxiously from the opposite window, may have contributed to Mr. Goldbag's displeasure. Be that as it may, he rang the bell somewhat violently, and sternly demanded of the footman who came to answer the summons, "Who Jenkinson was holding that long palaver with?"

"It be Mr. Penturby, sir," said the footman, "who have been so unremitting in his inquiries after young master, sir. He have been here many an evening just to ask."

"Who is Mr. Penturby?" asked the astonished parent.

"Mr. Penturby be the gentleman who have that extraordinary lot of children, as you may have noticed over the way."

"Oh!" growled Mr. Goldbag as John Thomas withdrew. "I should like to know what business he has in making inquiries; I never asked him." But notwithstanding that Mr. Goldbag grumbled, he could not help feeling pleased at the genuine and unobtrusive interest which the crowded house over the way took in the welfare of his heir.

A few evenings after, a man arrived at the big house, bringing with him a little coffin; and the next day a gorgeous but gloomy procession left the door; the black horses, tossing their long dark manes over their arched necks, were followed by sombre carriages, in one of which sat Mr. Goldbag, pale, stern, and unresigned. But he noticed one thing—the blinds at the little house opposite were all drawn down, and there were no little faces at the window that day.

Mr. Goldbag felt his great house cheerless indeed after that sad day. Mrs. Goldbag's tears aggravated him. He moved about listlessly; he had nothing to do, and the little purpose he had in life was ended with the death of his child. For a long time he hardly moved from his private sitting-room, and when he did, it was to steal into the great dining-room and take a look at the little house opposite, and the little crowd of faces which were sure to be gazing into the street. Yes, there they were, and they angered him; but though he was angry at the sight, day after day he came and gazed at them, especially about six o'clock, when the little faces grew wistful, watching for the pale, thin man returning home, and an eager clamour greeted the father at the door. Poor Mr. Goldbag! the tears stole into his eyes as he beheld the family ovation.

To watch this scene became Mr. Goldbag's sole employment, and it afforded him a melancholy pleasure. His mind was somewhat perturbed one night to find that the little faces were not to be seen at the window, and though six o'clock, and half-past six had chimed, no Mr. Penturby was to be seen. Perturbation grew into wonder and anxiety when the next evening came, and brought no Mr. Penturby and no happy greetings. Could the little family have left? He would ask John Thomas. But some days elapsed before Mr. Goldbag could summon up courage to ask his majestic footman; and when at length he managed it, I must confess it was very clumsily done—much more clumsily than was Mr. Goldbag's wont—and much more clumsy than the footman's grandiloquent reply, in which he informed his master that "Mr. Penturby were very ill; and he were always a poor creature, were that Mr. Penturby; and how they does live, at the best of times, is more nor I can conceive, much less now. Why, he have much less to live on, and support that prodigious family, than Jenkinson! he have—when you take into account as Jenkinson have a house and perquisites. The matter, sir? Why, he caught cold, and didn't take care of it; and went out to his business, when he best have been at home; and now he's right bad, he is."

Yes, poor Mr. Penturby was ill, but not so ill as the magnificent John Thomas asserted. He had taken cold and neglected it; and the doctor had been called in, after much remonstrance on Mr. Penturby's part. They couldn't afford it, he had said. But much less could they afford his being ill, replied his wife. And so the matter was settled, and the doctor came.

"Complete rest, liberal diet, plenty of port wine, change of air and scene. General debility has more to do with it than this nasty cold. We must get rid of that, and then you must go away and travel."

But the nasty cold did not yield to the doctor's injunctions; it still hung about its victim, who fretted and worried that his business was being neglected, and that they could not afford this terrible expense. Fretting and anxiety did not improve his condition, and the poor clerk became feverish, and his wife looked worn. It was on one of these days that Mrs. Penturby was looking out of the window, when her attention was attracted by the sight of the great door of the opposite mansion opening. There was no carriage at the door; but out of it emerged a little, stout, black-suited gentleman, followed by a somewhat ponderous, black-dressed woman—no others than Mr. and Mrs. Goldbag. They descended the steps and walked—yes, actually walked—across the street; they came upon the pavement, approached Mrs. Penturby's door, and knocked (Mr. Penturby would not believe it, till his wife and all his children severally affirmed it) at her door; inquired after the invalid; came into the little parlour, and talked to Mrs. Penturby (who was ready to drop) so sweetly, and noticed the children (the tear that quivered in Mr. Goldbag's eyes as he spoke to little Tommy was not unobserved by Mrs. Penturby); and, finally, Mrs. Goldbag brought some grapes from under her shawl. "Would Mrs. Penturby accept them?—they were so refreshing to the sick; hoped Mr. Penturby would like them—they grew in her own garden; trusted poor Mr. Penturby would soon be quite strong again;" and then they departed; but a train of light seemed to linger behind them.

In the evening, when the big family Bible was opened for prayers, there was a clean, beautiful ten-pound note lying on the very chapter they were going to read, and they all declared Mr. Goldbag must have done it; and little Rosy remembered seeing him fumbling about with the family Bible. After talking and wondering for a little, and looking with thankful eyes at the magic and mysterious piece of paper, they read the chapter; and the big tears rolled down Mrs. Penturby's cheeks as they read—"Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow."

Then the children went to bed, and Mrs. Penturby undressed little Jessie, who had been watching by her father while he slept, and told her to slip off and hear the good news from her brothers and sisters, and not to forget to thank God for it in her prayers.

Presently Mr. Penturby woke, calmed, and refreshed, and gently did his wife communicate to him the joyful intelligence, and told of the beautiful and appropriate words in the chapter at prayers.

Poor Mr. Penturby was quite overcome at first; but he soon recovered, and said so quietly, "To be sure, and I've been serving mammon all this time. I thought our poverty was enough to keep me from that; but now I see that my anxiety, and fretting, and worry about the morrow, was just serving mammon, and not trusting God. Absorbed in money-getting, and forgetting the kingdom of God and his righteousness—not that I meant it; but I see now what it is to serve the Lord Christ. How foolish we are! How kind of Mr. Goldbag! how thoughtful! how shall we thank him! Our heavenly Father knoweth that we have need of such things."

And then Mr. Penturby went to sleep again, and dreamt that he was worshipping a great golden image, and that an angel (which looked very much like Goldbag) came and pointed him to heaven, and told him to worship God and trust in him.

I need not tell you how Mr. Goldbag was thanked; nor how Mr. Penturby went down to Margate—and not alone—but with his wife and all the little Penturbys; nor who treated them to their two months' trip there; nor who interested himself and got Edward such a nice place in a merchant's office; nor how Mr. Penturby's services were recognised by his employers, and his salary greatly increased; nor how Mr. and Mrs. Goldbag stood as god-parents to the new little Penturby, when it arrived. I shall only tell you of the evening—it was Mr. Goldbag's birthday—when Mr. Penturby and his wife, and all the little Penturbys down to the baby, spent a few happy hours in the grim old mansion, which at first looked forbidding at the intrusion, and then seemed to relax its dignity, under the genial influence of merry faces and cheerful voices.

And when the last echo of childish delight had died away, and the great hall door had closed with a bang, there was a soft tender sadness on those two faces in the great drawing-room; they were thinking of their little one—their only one, who sleeps among the tombs. And the sad silence was broken by Mr. Goldbag: "I think, my dear, God took away our babe in mercy. Had we never known that sorrow, we should never have had our hearts drawn out as they have been by the poor Penturbys; they have been as much God's angels to us, as was the one which took our little one."

And in the little room over the way, just then, Mr. Penturby was saying, "I think the Goldbags are sent by God to be our guardian angels."

THE OLD PROPHET OF BETHEL.

IN a recent paper on the man of Judah who came to Bethel, I endeavoured to keep his story separate from that (which interweaves with it) of the old prophet of Samaria. From the former we learn that public services do not cover the neglect of private, personal obligations. The mission of Jehovah is performed, but the messenger is lost; the greatness of his public performance soothing him into forgetfulness, and making him listless as to the fulfilment of his own private obligation. We see how public courage and lofty discharge of duty may co-exist with disobedience, weakness, and folly in the conduct of our own lives. Such reflections form on our minds as we read the story of the mission and the fate of the prophet, whose name, as if in tenderness to his memory, has not been recorded. But the instrument of his ruin, the old prophet of Samaria, is even a more instructive type of character, interesting, as being exactly what we might expect of one of his order, living in the midst and bearing the marks of the corruption and schism, against which he did not struggle.

"There came a man of God out of Judah by the word of the Lord unto Bethel." "Now there dwelt an old prophet in Bethel." Here we have a prophet dwelling on the spot, and venerable by age, superseded by a stranger, brought at a risk through a hostile country, to deliver his message, and return. This seems to require an explanation; and it is afforded by the narrative that ensues. And first we learn, that his sons had been at the feast which Jeroboam was holding, for they came and told him of all that had happened at it. Like Hophni and Phinehas, they hearkened not to the voice of their father: and here we have already an indication of that remissness, and laxity, and submission to evil authority, on the part of the local prophet himself, which made it necessary to call in one from a distance, whose mind would not be overawed by the royalty of Jeroboam, or his prophetic zeal enfeebled by living in the midst of a corrupt people. They told their tale, and the old prophet said, "Saddle me the ass. So they saddled him: and he rode thereon."

In following the man of Judah, he acted on the impulse of a moment; but, probably, many, and some of them conflicting, feelings entered his mind simultaneously and produced the determination he adopted. As he rode quickly in pursuit of the stranger, these feelings developed themselves; some of them mean, and some kindly the former speaking from and hiding behind the latter. Why had it needed to bring a prophet out of Judah? Had the message been entrusted to him, the prophet of Bethel, perhaps he would have known as well the proper time and place to deliver it. He, indeed, had not been at this idolatrous feast; it would have ill-become him to be there; but he judged that his absence from it was a species of protest that could not be mistaken. It certainly was unaccountable that a stranger had been employed; for surely Israel would have been more ready to receive the message from him, than from the prophet of a hostile country.

It was natural that a prophet of Judah should be inclined to denounce the establishment of places of worship in Israel itself, as plainly diminishing the importance of Judean prophets. He himself from an opposite point of view, had been rather inclined to wink at it. Besides it was scarcely becoming that this man of Judah should hasten away, like another Lot, from the seat of the new worship, where he himself resided permanently. It implied that a man of God could not reside there for one hour without being contaminated thereby. He went, no doubt, believing that he left behind him no one as good as himself, and that he was relinquishing Bethel and its altars to the predicted destruction. Spiritual pride had always been the fault of the prophets, and this man of Judah had thought within himself: "I, even I only, am left." It needed to show him that there was still one in Bethel who had not so much distrust of his own faith as to be obliged to fly from the surrounding idolatry. But in passing, perhaps, it occurred to him indirectly that Aaron was as good a precedent as Moses. At all events, he could stand his ground, without taking harm. What, however, would the people of Bethel think if this new prophet out of Judah were not to recognise him as a prophetic brother, and were to go entirely away without acknowledging communion with him? Would they not contrast unfavourably the hasty withdrawal of the stranger prophet from the region presided over by the golden calf, and peopled by idolators, with his own long residence in their midst and tacit acquiescence in their practices?

Such were, probably, some of the feelings and reflections of the old prophet, as he rode after the man of Judah. But, no doubt, the motives which he acknowledged to himself—in some degree genuine motives—were good nature, admiration, a desire once more to hold converse with a brother prophet, and talk with him over what, if conversing together, they would probably call the sad alienation of Israel; added to all this a great desire to be connected with the prophesy and miracles of the man of Judah, even by lodging him in his house for a single night and publicly showing that they were fellow-servants.

There may also have been a wish to propitiate his wounded self-respect, by receiving one whom it was dangerous to harbour, as having defied the king, and denounced the idolatry of which he himself, at its first establishment, ought to have been the denunciator.

In estimating the part taken by the old prophet, we must remember that his sons cannot have forgotten to inform him of the stern refusal of the man of God to eat bread or drink water in that place, and the ground upon which he had put it, "Though thou shouldest give me the half of thine house, I will not go with thee, nor eat bread nor drink water in this place: for so it was charged me by the Lord, saying, Eat no bread and drink no water, nor turn again by the way that thou camest."

The prophet of Bethel knew, then, the objection he would have to encounter, and he thought of a means of overcoming it, and calculated on the condition in which he would find the stranger to render his task easy. He came up with him, sitting under an oak: the invitation was given, and the expected objection raised, almost in the same words as before; impressing on us the idea of something learned by rote, with which the inclination did not go; he repeated the words that were put into his mouth, but God's will evidently was not his.

And now the spectacle is presented to us of a prophet degenerated into a liar. To turn aside his brother from following God's command, the old prophet made use of a false pretence to that prophetic function which he had allowed to rust in its sheath, while Israel forsook Jehovah, and went after the golden calves. "I am a prophet also as thou art; and an angel spake unto me by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him back with thee into thine house, that he may eat bread and drink water." He thus exhibits the effect produced on him by long dwelling in the midst of idolatry, and the injury he had done to his conscience by neglecting the duty of denouncing it, which was peculiarly the office of a Jewish prophet. The mild, tolerant spirit of the Gospel, as heaven doing its work by an internal action, gradually, imperceptibly, and without violence, was utterly misplaced in a prophet of the old dispensation.

The future of the world depending on the deposit of the true faith being preserved in the Jewish nation, and the worldwide flood of idolatry being excluded from it, the utmost rigour of cursing and extermination of error was necessary to accomplish that end; and besides, indeed, the chief ground of tolerance—i. e., our fallibility—did not exist in men directly authorised by inspiration. But the office of the prophets ceased with their authority. At this time, however, it was in fullest force; and the prophet of Bethel, who was old enough to remember the tabernacle as standing near his own dwelling-place, where still Jacob's pillar marked the spot on which he dreamt the heavenly ladder had rested, and the descending angels had stepped on to the earth, was bound, at all risk, to oppose the desecration of this hallowed site, by the erection in it of Egyptian idolatry, and the impious representation of Jehovah as the calf-god. But instead of this, he truckled to the power of this new Egyptianised king, and possibly to a national feeling—a wish that Israel should not have to acknowledge the religious supremacy of Judah, and worship in and towards Solomon's Temple at Jerusalem. He wronged his conscience by silence; and at last, his moral sense being perverted by the long injury to it, he lied. He had learned to be dishonest; he had acquired that easy-going morality which values quietness and convenience above integrity and duty. As he has found excuses for his own indifference to what was going on about him in Israel, so he readily finds a good-natured falsehood to induce his brother prophet to return to his house to rest and refresh himself.

Perhaps it seemed what is termed an "innocent" falsehood, when employed in such a service—its being good natured seeming to diminish, if not to neutralise, the guilt of the deception. Good nature has often this strange illuding power; as, for instance, when the later Jew delivered himself from his moral obligation by the word "corban, it is a gift."

But good nature is generally two-edged. To gratify his own desire of conversing with so distinguished a servant of Jehovah—to enjoy an hour of the interchange of prophetic ideas, and invest himself with a portion of the awe and wonder which the stranger had produced at Bethel—gave an activity to his good nature, in which it might otherwise have been deficient. He prevails over the man of Judah, who gladly accepts the excuse that is thus provided him—a poor excuse, indeed, to believe on the testimony of a man, who professed to have derived it from an angel, that God had contradicted himself. But he longs to be seen again by the shouting multitude who almost transferred to him the adoration they had been paying to the idol. He longs for a draught of the wine of popular applause, and to hear the echoes of his deed still living in the place where it had been performed.

He draws near to Bethel; but all is dark and silent, like the reprobation of Jehovah. No eyes are upon him but the stars, those manifold eyes of God. To him he had resigned the glory of his deed, leaving no name behind him in Israel. He returns to seek for it; but instead of the voice of praise, he hears from the lips of his betrayer the startling cry, "Thus saith the Lord," with which the prophets commenced their awful communications, "Forasmuch as thou hast been disobedient to the mouth of the Lord . . . thy carcase shall not come to the sepulchre of thy fathers." Thus the same lips that had beguiled the man into disobedience, now involuntarily (but how often they are the first to do so voluntarily) pronounce his doom. With trembling haste he sends his brother prophet away, no longer craving for a share of his glory, but dreading lest he should share his fate. He gives the weary guest his own beast, to be rid of him the quicker; exhibiting in this, as in what precedes, the easy-going, good-natured, worldly character, which would tell an innocent falsehood to make us happy, but is too much bent on self-preservation to undergo any risk to shelter us. Our diminishing wonder ceases that the native prophet was not employed; that it needed to bring one out of Judah; and that this latter was forbidden to stay to eat or drink there, lest he too should be tainted by the prevailing corruption, or taken captive by the attractiveness of idolatry.

But when the awful fate of the stranger is reported to the old man, we see in his remorse and grief something remaining from the wreck of a nobler character. There are circumstances in which the most worldly man forgets himself. Where lately he found the man of Judea lingering in his flight, and giving the temptation time to overtake him, he now finds him overtaken by punishment. That prostrate figure shall never again arise to resume its journey; but by the same road he lately induced him to return to eat and drink in disobedience, he now brings him back to bury him. And still we see mingling with his sorrow, but chastened and purged of all baser feelings, the regretful admiration of his brother prophet, and the desire to be connected with his fame in sacred history. "When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried; lay my bones beside his bones: for the saying which he cried against the altar in Bethel . . . shall surely come to pass."

How sharp, but unavailing, was the remorse of that old prophet, as he stood by the torn body of him in whose ruin he had been instrumental, and raised over the fresh grave the mournful lament, "Alas, my brother!"

No misery can ever be so poignant as the knowledge, should it be the Almighty's will to reveal it to us, of the injury, and it may be ruin, in which we have been instrumental. It may often not be of a nature to be manifest to us in this life. No ghastly corpse may startle us on the highway; no fresh-made grave invite us to weep. But, whether apparent or not, it will be deeper and more ineffaceable than the stain of blood, this guilt of soul-destruction. Forgiven by God, we could not be forgiven by ourselves. The thought would penetrate heaven itself to find us out, that, by our means, other souls had been made joyless for ever. If, therefore, we are contented to cast our own lot in the land of secession, to dwell amongst a rebellious people, under the shadow of that golden idol to which men burn the incense of their strength and energies, and desires, let us not strive to tempt others from the strait road that leads to life; lest the companionship of an hour, as with these two men of God, should end in the eternal companionship of the tomb.*

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—III.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

THE whole subject was so entirely new to the mind and usual range of ideas of Captain Scott, that it took him some time to ruminate over and, as it were, digest in silence all that his friend had been telling him, for it must have been a good quarter of an hour before he again resumed the conversation.

"There is much that is very interesting and commendable in this work, no doubt," said the captain, at length; "and I can quite understand some fellows feeling just as deeply or highly enthusiastic as you seem to be in the matter;

but don't you think that one ought to feel sensible of some sort of regular call, or vocation? It might, perhaps, come in time, you know; but I cannot honestly say that I am, as yet, conscious of any particular sensation of that description within me. There are some men, who have naturally the right sort of long face, and serious manner, and solemnity of speech, which one ought to have when addressing poor people, and giving them good advice. But I am afraid that I should not be able to do that properly, or indeed, know exactly what to say to them at all, when I found myself amongst them—not that shyness is a foible of my nature, nor do I generally feel any nervousness on entering new or mixed company; yet I am sure that I should be awkward, and look like a fool, and a regular fish out of water, if I were to try to go about alone, knocking at strangers' doors, and poking my nose into their houses and rooms, without being asked."

"My dear friend," replied his Mentor, "I know exactly the feeling of natural hesitation which you describe, and had it myself, at starting, quite as much, probably more than yourself at this moment; but I very soon became interested and used to their ways, and then it all came easily and naturally. As to going in at them with a long-drawn face, and upon the strength of having given them a few shillings' worth, just to keep body and soul together through a pinch, taking upon myself to preach, and find fault, and lecture them, even if I were inclined, I do not see that I have any right to do so; many of them are quite as good, and much better than ourselves, considering the poor creatures' circumstances, and temptations; so, except sometimes in the way of a word of cheery encouragement, or friendly advice if they ask for it, I do not reprove and tell them of their faults and shortcomings. But, for my own part, I find that all that is required, is a little tact, and a scrupulous attention to one's own good breeding in little things. For instance, I am always very careful to take off my hat on entering their rooms; and never think of going in without knocking, and mentioning, as a sort of introduction, the name of the poor neighbour, or district visitor, or curate, or whoever it may be, through whom I may have happened to have heard of their distress. Then I never take a seat until invited, or at least specially asking permission to do so, for though a chair is almost always offered at once, sometimes that ceremony may be forgotten; but immediately upon the slightest hint, is invariably corrected, with an ample apology. It is wonderful what such trifling courtesies will do. Many a time have I seen a slatternly vixen suddenly drop her akimboed elbows, and loud, defiant tone, with which she has been, as if almost instinctively, prepared for the entrance of any stranger, and begin to wipe off the dust from her best though dirty chair with her dirtier apron; while the husband, slouching against the window, will draw his hands from the depths of his pockets, and lug his cap off his head (very often, it is true, as if almost in spite of himself, and on the half-pretence of only wishing to scratch his head, and not out of any servile respect); but somehow he will invariably do it, if you will only set him the example. Another rule I make is, never to ask any impertinent questions, or make reflections upon their furniture, or dress, or food, more than I should think of doing in the house of anybody of our own rank of life. Though

I often take a quiet notice of such particulars, as good criterions of character, as well as of the actual state of their circumstances, and act accordingly, without giving any reasons, or making insidious remarks; in short, I always try to be more particular while amongst my poor friends in doing credit to that extra twopence, which was traditionally charged in our youthful days for 'manners,' then I am in my own accustomed society—or at any rate, I think more about them, and as a rule I find myself, in return, treated with the greatest civility, and I may say friendly respect."

"But do you never," inquired Captain Scott, "find yourself brought into unpleasant contact with any rough characters? for that is where I should, I am afraid, find my temper fail me. Suppose some half-civilised navvy, or facetious costermonger, for instance, was to take it into his uneducated head, either to kick me out of his private apartments—which I do not say that he would be altogether wrong in doing, if he did not happen to appreciate my personal appearance, or exactly to see what business I had there—or was to indulge in some of that lively style of banter, vulgarly called 'chaff,' at which the latter class of gentry whom I have mentioned are sometimes supposed to be particularly accomplish adepts, I might, under such circumstances feel—as Dr. Watts, if I remember right, expresses it—'my angry passions rising,' and get into some awkward row, which would bring trouble upon myself and discredit upon your most respectable society."

"I can only repeat my assertion," answered Sydney, "that in my own experience, although I have sometimes found myself in some very queer places, where I have occasionally met some very queer characters—roughs, if you like to call them so, both male and female—I have never yet been implicated in any row, and hardly ever had an uncivil—that is, an intentionally offensive word from any of them. I do remember once, it was on the next day after Christmas Day, a year or two since—which might be taken as a sort of excuse, though, perhaps not a very good one, for the poor fellow's condition—that a half-tipsy vendor of cats' meat was certainly beginning to be rather rude, and slightly abusive, when the wife of his bosom fell upon him, and then and there corrected his bad manners, by battering him so unmercifully over his head and ears with an old tin saucepan, that I was actually obliged to interfere, though it seemed like ingratitude on my part to do so."

"And did the fellow beg your pardon, or thank you for the interference?" asked Archie.

"Well, I forget now; but you must bear in mind, by the way, that the familiar term of 'fellow' is not understood or admitted in that class of society in at all the same sense as with us, amongst whom it is used as an habitual term of familiarity and social good feeling.

And stood a people free and proud."—p. 202.

"'No more fellows than yourself, sir,' is a mild rebuke I have before now received, when having casually addressed any of them collectively as 'you fellows,' or called any one 'old fellow,' in a friendly way, as we so constantly do to one another. 'Fellow, indeed!' was a wife's rejoinder, taking me up very shortly; 'old, if you please, though that's no fault of his'n, and we knows we are poor enough, but I don't think he has done anything to have been called a fellow.' I of course apologised, and attempted an explanation; but I have been very careful not to give the same offence again.

"Indeed, I find that the very poorest classes, in their intercourse with one another, are much less familiar, and more punctilious in their manner and address, than those above them in society. When speaking to one another they almost always repeat their friend's name at full length, to which they seldom omit the prefix of Mr. or Mrs.; and two old washerwomen at their gossip, or even quarrelling, will ma'am each other at every sentence.

"I was asked, not long ago, to call in upon a gentleman, at the end of the court, who sold oysters and periwinkles, but was in great distress—down ill, and would have been without food, or even a bit of fire all that bitter cold weather, if it hadn't been for the good lady who keeps the coal-store, who let him have a little upon trust. And another poor old woman told me that her boy had got a job with a gentleman who swept chimneys and cleaned out drains.

"I have now become so accustomed to their really polite way of speaking of each other, that it scarcely strikes me as it did at first. Like all other grades in society, they have their own peculiarities and fashions, which any one who is a gentleman himself of course soon understands and falls into. The real main thing to be acquired by experience is, how to judge as to the reality and extent of their distress, and then as to the best and most advisable method of assistance or relief; for there are many other ways besides giving either food, fuel, or clothes, though these requisites of course must, and do, constitute the principal form of relief in most cases."

"I should have thought those three necessities of life fully comprehended all that one could do for them," interrupted Archie Scott; "especially as you don't pretend to go in for offering good advice, or finding fault with them. What more can one do to help them?"

"Oh, a great deal; such as giving them orders for the local dispensaries, letters of admission to the various great hospitals, of which, through our many influential subscribers, we have generally as many as we require to dispose of among those of our people who are suffering from any sickness or accident; then often by recommending them, or by using personal interest with some of the large firms, one is able to provide employment for poor fellows, who, perhaps, having been thrown out of work by illness, and, not finding it immediately upon their recovery in their own district, have never heard or thought of its being likely to be found in any other at the further side of London."

WISDOM.

WHENCE no one knew, and none could guess,
With slow and stately step he came,
And through the busy market press
Proclaimed in simple speech his name.

"T'was "Wisdom," and the word was caught,
And tossed from noisy tongue to tongue,
Whereat a tumult rose and wrought
The crowd to phrenzy, and they hung

With eager ears upon his voice,
Who said, "What would ye have of me?"
A thousand answers came, the choice
Of wealth, and toil, and penury.

Then fell a silence, such as when
The lightning glints upon the storm,
And winds are still, and hearts of men
Wait on that coming note of harm.

He spoke: "I may not sell for gold
The simple tale of star and sod;

My secret freely take and hold—
The fear of God, the fear of God."

Then, as a wind from out the west,
When red and wrathful sinks the day,
And burns upon the turbid breast
Of writhing wave and ghostly spray,

A sullen murmur rose, and grew
To thunder, from the shaken crowd;
And Wisdom then and there they slew,
And stood a people free and proud;

And bought and sold, and went their ways,
And Nature tamed, and spanned the skies,
And lived their lusty length of days,
And answered Death with happy lies.

But it is said that, far away,
Beyond their wealth, or waste, of years,
They seek that ancient man, and pray
His secret with unpitied tears. J. S. W.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

CAPTAIN OGLIVIE IS GENEROUS.

ON hearing the sentence recorded in the last chapter, Miss Oglivie's first impulse had been to fly. She would not meet Horace Oglivie thus. If he had a mind to forsake her, she would not have him recalled to her side by a favouring circumstance. She would go home to her own place, and await there till he sought her. She would have gone further away, if possible. She longed to put difficulties between herself and him—to set herself out of reach, as it were. But when, at length, she ventured to propose her plan, it was at once overruled. Margery Oglivie's will was the stronger of the two, and she received the proposal as one altogether out of the question. She made it appear to her a positive duty to remain—a positive unkindness to go away. Therefore Peggy had to make up her mind to stay.

Then it occurred to her how awkward their meeting must be. To meet as strangers would be to practise a deceit—to act a lie; to meet as friends, would be to reveal to Margery what had hitherto been concealed from her—their knowledge of each other. Not that she had any right to know their hearts; but their meeting involved a matter of fact which ought not to be misrepresented. She was very glad, therefore, when Margery proposed to drive over and meet Horace Oglivie herself. The coach would set him down, very unceremoniously, bag and baggage, in the middle of the road, where a by-way branched off to the house, and leave him there. The point where he was to be picked up was not more than a couple of miles distant, but it would leave him time to make any communication he liked to make. But, further and better, Margery fixed the day of his arrival for Peggy to visit Delaube. The elder woman treated the younger very much as she would have treated a child, in making arrangements for her; and she was to be sent for early in the evening, like a child who has been allowed to spend the day abroad.

Margery Oglivie had her own reasons for sending Peggy out of the way, and arranging for her on this occasion. She was anxious to have a word or two with the captain herself, in order to remove from his mind a certain misapprehension with regard to Peggy, which she desired above all things to clear away before they should meet, as she thought, for the first time.

At length the day arrived, and everything took effect as arranged. The coach was punctual, the captain was duly deposited, Margery was waiting to pick him up, and they were soon driving back to the Forest House together. Horace Oglivie was aware that, with regard to Peggy, he was on delicate ground, and required to move with caution; yet he wanted to make the most of the short time at his disposal to learn all that he could concerning her in her new position. During the drive, however, he learnt nothing more than he already knew—namely, that her grandfather was dead, and that she was staying at the Forest House for the present. Yes, there was one little circumstance which he learnt, just as they were alighting—a circumstance which had greatly relieved his mind—and that was that he should not be compelled to meet Peggy as a stranger in the presence of Margery Oglivie. That lady had detailed her little arrangement, and on it the quick-witted Horace had founded another of his own—viz., that, when the time arrived, he would volunteer for the service of bringing Miss Oglivie back, and thus secure an opportunity of seeing her alone.

Margery had wound up by saying, just as they entered the house, "When you have had your dinner, I have something to say to you."

She had spoken in her usual measured manner, and not in harsher tones than usual; but, as he took his way to his room, he wondered what it was she had to say to him, and whether it was possible that Peggy had told, after all.

And at last the dinner was over, and he ventured to remind her that she had the something to say.

She began at once. "You know," she said, "that Gilbert Oglivie and I haven't been on speaking terms for many years—for half a lifetime nearly." He bowed assent, and she proceeded: "You will understand, by what has happened, that I saw him before he died. What took place between us concerns nobody but ourselves, except that he begged me to take care of this girl—of Louis Oglivie's daughter and heiress." She laid an emphasis on the last word, and added, "Her mother's marriage-lines and her father's letters to his wife are now in my hands."

"What has become of her father?" said Captain Oglivie, not knowing very well what to say, but thinking how very much Peggy's position and prospects would be changed.

"Dead!" was the stern answer. "It's more than a dozen years since he was heard of. Louis Oglivie is dead."

"So much the better," thought the captain. "It is just as well, perhaps, for the girl," he said.

"Yes," she answered. "If I die before Alexander, everything will be hers. And if he dies first, I mean to make it hers, if she will now promise that in any case she will never leave him to strangers. I cannot make it conditional, you see. I shall have only her word and promise. But she has taken to Alexander, and he has taken to her. If she will stay with me, I can make her secure both ways. Do you understand?"

"Yes, I understand, perfectly; but I cannot see why I am called upon to do so," said the captain, who was thinking it was rather hard to be brought so far to hear only this.

"You have a right to know," she answered. "You may have had expectations; it was quite natural you should. Under other circumstances it would have been yours. My sister and I had settled it. But we have saved out of Alexander's allowance; and if you will let me, I can buy advancement for you. It is all I have really in my power," she added, "for I believe Alexander will outlive me. And now I have said all I had to say."

The conversation terminated as abruptly as it had begun. Horace Oglivie subdued his conflicting emotions, and politely took to the topics of the day. At last the sound of wheels was heard on the gravel. It was the chaise coming round before setting out to fetch Peggy back. Captain Oglivie was on his feet in a moment, offering to go and bring her safely home; and after some objection from his hostess, on the score of his recent travel, easily overruled, seeing that he had reposed no further off than Bleaktown on the previous evening, he was allowed to depart.

"He can introduce himself," she thought; and she smiled grimly as she saw him set out. He was very cool about it. "Perhaps he is only tired of my company," she said to herself.

It was rapidly getting dark as he drove along, and by the time he reached Delaube, it was dark altogether. The front gate was closed, and could not be opened from without, though it did not seem to be locked. The truth was, that a great stone was nightly rolled up against it. But Captain Oglivie remembered the little garden gate, and groped his way to it with slight effort. The same difficulty might have greeted him there, but that egress was still needed. As it was, he entered, and went straight on to the kitchen entrance, to which the path led. All was dark save one long, low window, through which he could not choose but see. An old man was smoking by the fire. An old woman sat at the wooden table, doing something which caused her head to nod in a measured fashion; and opposite, with the light shining full on her face, sat her he had come to seek, evidently quite at home with her surroundings, and holding something apart with her hands. It was a hank of blue worsted she was holding, while Jean wound it, when Captain Oglivie knocked at the door.

"That's for me," she said, crossing to open it herself, and expecting Margery Oglivie's ancient man-of-all-work, a relic of the past, like Tammas.

She was rendered dumb with amazement when she saw who it was, and her heart began to beat fast and her limbs to tremble. But to an observer she only seemed very quiet and pale. As for him, he was perfectly cool and collected, meeting her neither warmly nor coldly, and stating his mission simply and with all the grace in the world. As she went to get ready, Peggy recovered sufficiently to say, "Jean, this is Captain Oglivie;" and when she came back Jean herself lighted them down the garden-path, having in the meantime fallen a victim to the captain's blandishments.

They were soon rattling along in the darkness, and as yet they had hardly spoken, only a hand had clasped hers firmly and fondly. But, instead of meeting the clasp, she was shrinking from it. He was treating her as if he had parted with her yesterday, instead of well-nigh a year ago.

"You are not angry with me?" he whispered, reproachfully, as she attempted gently to withdraw her hand. "I have managed so well she will never know that we have met before."

"Then we must be as if we had never met," she answered—"as if there was nothing between us."

"That cannot be," he hastened to murmur in reply; "that cannot be, if we love each other still. It cannot be with me, at least."

And at that moment Captain Oglivie persuaded himself that he really had been true at heart, and that only adverse circumstances were to blame for his inconstancy. He persuaded himself at that moment that he loved the shrinking girl beside him as he never had loved any other; and perhaps he did.

Then he set himself to explain, very delicately, how impossible it was for him to involve her in a clandestine correspondence, and how wretchedly circumstanced they both had been.

She was sitting with her hands clasped before her, looking out into the darkness, through which they were swiftly passing.

"Now it is all different," he said; and in saying it he drew yet closer to her.

She felt his breath warm upon her cheek, and raised her hands to her face.

Then he threw his arm round her, and whispered her name; and for answer came almost a wail of entreaty:

"Oh! Horace, be generous, and set me free!"

He was here by her side, loving, and she did not love him; the same, and she was changed. Thus she reproached herself.

And he, suffering some slight pain beyond that of wounded self-love, withdrew the caressing arm, and, after a little, replied, "You are free; only let me be free also to win back the love I have lost." He never for moment doubted his ability to do so.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE LETTER IS LOST.

As in the old childish days, when she wanted everything in heaven and earth explained to her, Peggy Oglivie now sought an explanation of herself. But she found it as difficult to obtain, as it used to be to get at the meaning of the riddles which her oracle, Jean, had been wont to propound in order to be rid of her importunity. In vain she sat thinking, till her cheeks burned and her brow throbbed, asking herself, over and over again, how it had come to pass that her love for Horace Oglivie had, as it were, shivered at a touch. In vain she flung herself on her knees, and tried to read her heart, as it lay open to the Searcher of hearts. No true interpretation came. She had proved herself fickle and inconstant, for under no circumstances, she felt, ought love to change. The very idea that it could, was terrible—was deadly, and seemed to strike at the root of all faith, human and divine.

There are men, as well as women, of the feline order, and perhaps Captain Oglivie was one of these. He was, undoubtedly, very graceful and very agile, both in body and mind; but it might be possible for him to be very cruel. He was letting Miss Oglivie alone, but he was watching her every movement with the conviction that she was completely in his power; that she could no more resist him, or escape from him, than a mouse could from a cat. And the more he watched her, the more he liked her—loved her, in his passionless way. He liked the lovely face and the slight, perfect figure—light as a young birch-tree, and the quaint, tender expression of smile, and voice, and speech. He could marry this girl, and if he did, and she was devoted to him, he would, in all likelihood, go on loving her to the end of the chapter. But he was capable of marrying her whether she liked him or no; and in the latter case he might, nay, certainly would, cease to care for her. He could torture the heart that was not his own, and which he yet had power to torture.

It was Captain Oglivie's opinion, and one which he had not unsuccessfully put to the test, that he could conciliate whom he chose to conciliate, and win whom he chose to win. But there was one whom he could not conciliate in Margery Oglivie's house: poor witless Sir Alexander was proof against his blandishments. For one thing, he deprived the poor fellow, to a great extent, of his new companion. He had been suffered to sit beside Peggy, and watch her drawing, till the faculty of imitation had prompted him to seize a pencil, and try to follow the lines of the rude sketches which she made to please him. Then he would point to familiar objects, and show that he knew that the drawings represented them. Latterly he had succeeded, with the help of his teacher, in copying some of the simplest forms. Without knowing it, she was developing what little of mental power he possessed.

One morning, when Peggy was engaged in teaching him, Captain Oglivie came into the room where they sat together; it was a large, bare room, like a nursery, clean and uncarpeted.

"It is perfectly marvellous how you can take such pains with that idiot," he said, in a slightly impatient tone.

"Oh, Horace, see how well he is getting on. It is quite worth the pains I take."

"I don't see that it matters in the least."

"It makes him happier, I am sure," she answered; "and do you know I think it is making him wiser. I believe he feels more and knows more than we think. What if it should all belong to the body, this idiocy, and be a mere distortion of the power of expression, and the soul should be lying within, suffering a terrible imprisonment?"

The captain laughed. It was a pleasant enough laugh, with a slight ring of mockery, not for the thought, but for its truth; but Sir Alexander gave a low growl, like an angry dog.

"Just look at the creature," said the captain.

Peggy did look, and was startled by the expression of hate and malice in his face. "One would think he understood every word," she said. "You see he is capable of love and hate," she added; "he knows by some instinct that you do not love him."

Sir Alexander bent muttering over the paper.

"Do you believe in such instincts?" asked the captain.

"I'm not sure that I don't," she answered.

"It's all capable of explanation," he rejoined; "everything is."

"Well, I suppose it is," she replied, thoughtfully, almost thinking aloud. "Perhaps there are such delicate indications of character in every look and word and act, that they escape the conscious mind and yet impress the spirit."

At that moment Sir Alexander had looked up again, and met the eyes of Captain Oglivie. Neither maintained the gaze but for a moment, but in that moment their companion had glanced from the one to the other—from the man with the deformed body and the darkened mind, to the other with his graceful bearing and intellectual face, and there flashed upon her a likeness of expression which made her chill with horror.

"Come away," cried the captain, "and blow these Scotch metaphysics out of your little brain. I never saw you look so pale and ill."

That afternoon Horace Oglivie sat down to write to his mother. He had been more than a week in that bleak northern region, and his first care was to assure her of his bodily well-being. There was nothing to hinder him from surviving a winter in the trenches, and yet he could not bear to wet his feet. Then he went on to tell her the position in which he found affairs. He gave her an account of his conversation with Margery, and took the liberty of execrating that lady pretty freely. He paused before he mentioned Peggy. Any great frankness on that score might bring his mother down upon him in bodily presence. So all that he said was, "The heiress is rather nice. I wouldn't mind going in for her and her inheritance at once. She wouldn't be at all a heavy encumbrance, though I certainly prefer an unencumbered estate. I almost hope she may inherit direct, and cut out Miss Margery. As for that hideous creature, Sir Alexander, I dislike him worse than ever—dislike is not the word, I positively hate the sight of him. I could almost have put an end to him with my own hands this morning."

It was a hateful, heartless letter enough, though neither he who wrote it nor she who was to receive it would see how heartless and how hateful it was. The receiver would remain thoroughly well satisfied with the sender, and the sender was thoroughly well satisfied with himself.

But it was fated never to be sent. While he was writing there looked in upon him that white face of Sir Alexander's, and on it, deepening as he lingered, the scowl of malice—surely an aimless malice—at which the writer there could afford to laugh. He sat with his profile to the window, which was slightly in the rear of the table at which he wrote, so that he could look up without seeing the face, grotesque in its maliciousness, that was peering upon him.

At length the letter was finished, folded, and sealed. The captain had been warned not to leave letters about, but he intended to walk out and post this one himself; he also intended to have a companion in his walk to the village; therefore he put the letter behind the tomb-like structure on the mantelpiece, and went out of the room in search of Peggy.

No sooner had he done so than the window was lifted from the outside, and Sir Alexander crept in, went swiftly to the fireplace, and, with a look of concentrated cunning, took possession of the letter. Giving vent to a gurgle of satisfaction, he thrust it into his breast, and swiftly made his escape as he had entered, not having wit enough to close the window behind him. A minute or two later, Miss Margery herself came in, and shut it down unsuspectingly. So, when the captain entered with Peggy, no letter was to be found. There was, of course, but one conclusion as to who had taken it; but when, and how, was the question. The captain had met Miss Margery on her way to the room, and had detained her a minute or two, but she had been there ever since. It was well that she did not see the quick look of suspicion which he darted at her.

"Did you leave the window open?" she asked at length, when the bewilderment had reached its height.

"No."

"Then I know how it has gone," she said. "I have just shut it. He has come in and taken it, and gone out again by the window."

Horace Oglivie did not wait for more. In a moment he had opened the casement and flung himself out.

"If he finds him he will hurt him," cried Margery, almost wildly.

"He will never be so base, as well as cruel," said Peggy, soothingly; "but I will go after him, and, perhaps, if we find him, he will give it up more readily to me;" and, without further parley, she set off in pursuit.

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—V.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

DORA THE DAINTY.

DDARE say, deary," said grandmamma to little Edith Everley, one afternoon, "you are very much disappointed Emmy cannot come to tea."

"Yes, I am disappointed, granny dear, I must own; I should so like to have her! she is such a dear little girl."

"She is a very nice child, Edie dear, and I am quite sorry too, she cannot come. What do you think if, by way of consoling ourselves, we ask Sibby to put us tea out on the lawn, and I tell you the fifth story? There will be very few more such days as this, and only one more story to tell."

"Oh, granny, dear granny, I am so sorry! I wish you had twenty children to tell about."

"Thank you very much, Edie dear," said granny, laughing, "but I am glad you have not got the fairy wishing-cap, to make such a wish come true. Dearly as I loved my children, I found five quite plenty. But do you like my idea of tea on the lawn?"

"Very—very much, granny. Shall I run and tell Sibby?"

"Yes, please, love."

"And I will get your lounging-chair and my stool, and we will be cosy;" and away flew the child, quite consoled for her disappointment by this fresh idea. She helped Sibby eagerly to lay the tea, getting permission to gather fruit and flowers to decorate the table, and was delighted to hear her tasty arrangements admired by granny, and to be assured she had not enjoyed a meal so much a long while.

The tea cleared, granny thus commenced her story: "I don't think, Edith, you have ever seen your Aunt Dora. I am punished for loving her the best of all my children, I suppose, by her being separated from me. She has been in Australia for many years, and though she keeps telling me in every letter they talk of coming home soon, I dare not hope to be permitted to see her again."

Something very like tears glistened in poor granny's eyes; and little Edith, not knowing what to say to her, by way of consolation, kissed the thin, white hand which was resting on the table.

Mrs. Everley seemed to understand the action, for she smiled at the child, and said, "I have got you to love and keep me company, have I not darling? and what is more, you are very like Aunt Dora, exactly what she was at your age. Well," she continued, "this little loving pet, who was my constant companion, was rather delicate—the most delicate of all—which may account for my feeling rather more for her than the others, and as my nurse was the most indulgent of human beings, so my little Dora became humoured in every fancy, and was on the high road to being spoilt, like her brother Philip. At every meal some new whim was evidenced, till at last it became difficult, if not impossible, to order anything she would be sure to like. At one time she would eagerly eat rice, and the next shudder at it; some days an excellent dinner was made on cold meat, and sometimes, on hot; and I have known five or six different things brought up for her little ladyship at one meal, while dear nurse coaxed her with every inducement and bribe she could think of to eat something. I believe she was never more angry with me than when I insisted, one day, on the child having no dinner at all, if she would not at once eat what I had provided, and which only a few days before she had liked excessively. She cried, and assured me, when the child was dead I should be sorry for my cruelty; but I did not think so: I knew, Edie, I was doing what was right for the dear child, that I should never reproach myself if she was taken from me, and that she would thank me if she lived.

"At that time I had an old maiden aunt living—a dear, kind old body, who had a small income, and lived in a pretty little cottage in a quiet seaside village in Hampshire. A little gem of a place it was. I had passed many, many happy days there before I was married. The cottage, so homely, yet so clean and picturesque, was on a breezy, healthy common, on which you would have supposed yourself miles from the sea, but a steep, shady lane brought you suddenly on to a romantic beach, where for hours I had run races with the waves, whilst the dear old lady sat with her book beneath the shadow of a cliff. Well, she came to stay a few days with me, just at the time when this sad daintiness of Dora's was giving me so much trouble.

"I tell you what, my dear," she said, 'let her come back with me; my sweet pure air will make her feel strong, and I think I can promise to send her home cured of this tiresome fault. Barbara'—that was an old servant of hers—'delights in children, and will like nothing better than the charge of her. The memory of your own childish visits to me will render you easy as to her happiness.'

"Though to part from my little darling was a great trial, I would not for worlds have allowed any selfish feelings of my own to interfere with what was so much for her good.

"Through my glasses, Edie, I could see the mischief which would come of this fanciful daintiness, in after years, if not corrected now. Already the evil was spreading: she was getting as foolish and fussy about her clothes, her bed—in short, nothing was ever quite right for her. Her clothes were too tight or too loose for her, or they smelt of 'nasty soap,' or they were dirty; her bed was too hard or too soft, the blankets too heavy or too light; and she was beginning to tire the patience of those who loved her most. And so, though with a heavy feeling at my heart, and eyes dim with tears, I watched my little, fairy-like, fragile girl go off with Aunt Raymond.

"The child herself seemed delighted to go. It had been one of her favourite stories, as she called it, to listen to what I used to do at Stoneleigh; and she thought it something wonderful to be going to the same place, to sleep in the same little bed, to see the same old china and stuffed birds, and be waited on by the same old servants. She should fancy she was mamma when she was little, and do everything she did. Of course, it was a great consolation to me to see her so pleased to go; but I looked anxiously for the first letter.

"It came, with the information that they had arrived quite safely; that Dora was in an ecstasy of delight with everything, and had eaten an excellent tea without making any complaint. 'She had a tiny loaf all to herself,' wrote my aunt, 'and a bantam egg, and the little cup and saucer to drink out of that you used to have, and it would have done your heart good to see her thorough enjoyment.'

"I read this to nurse, but she only sighed, and said, 'Yes, that is as I always say, she is so very delicate. The change has done her good. After she's been there a day or two, she'll be just the same as she is at home, poor lamb; and if Miss Raymond goes to punish her to make her eat, she'll be sorry for it, as sure as she's alive, for she'll have the child to nurse.'

"'There is no fear of punishment there, nurse,' I answered; 'Miss Raymond is the kindest creature in the world.'

"My aunt had promised to write often to me, and so she did, and in all her letters she continued to say Dora was quite happy, but they had had one or two failures with the meals; but I was to make myself quite easy, as the child was looking very well, 'and is none the worse,' said the letter, 'for my strict discipline. Tell nurse so; and that I think the daintiness will be all mastered by the time she returns.'

"Dora was away three weeks, and I began to want my little bird home very much; but Aunt Raymond begged for one more week, and so I, somewhat unwillingly, yielded. At the end of the time I watched anxiously for her return. Her father was to run down for a day to fetch her, and bring her home on the following. Bright and rosy the little thing looked when she rushed into my arms, delighted to be once more with 'darling mamma,' but having enjoyed herself, as she expressed it, 'dreadfully.'

"She brought a little note from my aunt for me, in which she begged I would be particular in not asking Dora what she would like to have to eat at any meal, but simply give her what I thought right; to take no notice of her leaving her food, if she should do so, but not supply her with any other kind.

"The next morning, therefore, at breakfast, a basin of bread and milk was placed before her like the other children's; and without a word she eat it all. A plain dinner of roast meat and a fruit pudding was also quickly and uncomplainingly dispatched, and, in short, for a week after her return home she found no fault with anything, and was, therefore, the sweetest, brightest little thing imaginable, that having really appeared the only fault which marred the beauty of her character. One day, however, some unlucky boiled mutton appeared at table, and, as I helped her to it, I suddenly remembered her former great dislike to it, and expected a scene. She looked at it for a moment, whilst the colour mounted to her face, and then quietly eat it all without a word. I took no notice, only I did not ask her to have a second supply; and after dinner, whilst I was sitting at work, she came to me and said, 'Mamma dear, shall I tell you all I did at Aunt Raymond's? I haven't half told you yet.'

"Certainly, darling," I said, 'if you like.'

"And so, perching herself upon a chair beside me, she said: 'Well, you know, I told you I used to go, the moment after breakfast, down on the beach by myself, and when I had played ever such a long time, auntie used to come and take me into the village shopping, and to the schools, and sometimes to her poor people. Well, one day, mamma, I hadn't—I hadn't,' she said, very hesitatingly, 'eaten quite all my breakfast; I didn't think it was nice, you know; but auntie didn't give me anything else, and so, when I sat on the beach, I was hungry, and I began to cry, and wish I was at home; and I was crying when she came, and she asked what was the matter. I told her, but she didn't answer—only took my hand and led me to a little miserable—oh! such a miserable hut, under the cliff, and we knocked, and a woman with a thin, white face and ragged gown opened the door, and we went in, and there was no furniture in the room hardly, and two or three dirty, thin children sitting on the floor. And auntie talked to them some time, and then she said, "How long is it since these children tasted hot roast meat?" And, oh, mamma, what do you think the mother said? "Never." Then auntie asked how long since they have had bread and milk for breakfast; and then the poor woman said—oh! mamma, I shall never forget it—"Bless you, ma'am, they know only the taste of weak tea, field turnips, and bread. Now and then they have a taste of father's cheese, for a treat."

"Then, Edie, I could see," continued granny, "what the lesson was my child had learnt; and this letter, received from Australia after she had been married out there some months, will show you how she appreciated it." And granny read these words to Edith: "'I can never sufficiently thank you, dearest mother, for the perseverance with which you strove to break me of my childish faults, above all, that of daintiness. It was so wise of you to let Aunt Raymond effect my cure: for which I am eternally grateful to her, or out here, amidst the privations we have had to suffer, I should have starved.' And so, Edie, dear, I think my spectacles must ever be honoured for seeing so quickly and plainly these little childish errors, which, neglected, become the sins of our riper years. Now run and play, and look forward to the next of granny's stories."

A CHRIST-CHURCH SERMON.

PLEASANT life on the river? Yes, sir, so it is; I've been in the Indies, and almost all round the world, and I'm none the less content to be captain of a Gravesend boat. It's a quiet life, sir, and a regular one, and, sitting up here, I can see the passengers, and they are always a change, though the shores and the buildings are the same. And one might do worse service for one's fellow-creatures than take them out for a blow on the river, and bring 'em back all tight and tidy.

Ay, sir, there's the Dreadnought: I shall miss that when the Government people take it away. I was in her once, God bless her!

You see I was a London lad, born in a close off Watling Street. My father and mother both died when I was a little one, and I was got into Christ's Hospital. I'd only one sister, ten years older than me: she was a well-educated girl, and had a place in some West-end shop, so I had no home to go to except in her heart, and, bless her! I was always welcome there. She had not time to be with me on those days when they turned the boys into the streets to fend for themselves, but she always contrived to send me a shilling or two, so that I never wanted a dinner, as some did. And she used to plan where I should go telling me she would like to hear about some new curiosity in the British Museum or the picture galleries, or, in summer, she wished to know about the improvements in Kensington Gardens, and so on. And generally one or two of the others thought they might as well join me, and I shouldn't wonder it kept us out of mischief, and did us good as well. Then before I went in at night, she generally managed to meet me in Holborn or the Strand, and we went up and down quiet streets to have a talk, and she kissed me in the twilight, and very particular I was to be in a shady place, for I was ashamed of people seeing, though I wouldn't have gone without those kisses for the world. Bless you, I could feel them on my cheek for days after! Bessie came to Christ Church every Sunday morning when it did not rain. She used to sit in the side aisle, in the sideway seats, so that she could see the gallery. That was something to look forward to all the week. Boys' friends often came to Christ Church, some of them quite stylish people, who looked in the empty old place, like a fashion book on a dusty file. I often wished Bessie could have gay silks like theirs: once I told her so, but she said, quite flushing—

"Tom, if I could, you wouldn't be in a charity school." And I always remembered that, when any of the rest boasted of well-to-do fathers and fine houses.

It was soon settled I should go to sea. The doctors said I had the right constitution for it; and the masters knew I'd no particular head for learning. Bessie didn't make any fuss, as I feared she would. But after that, she came to Christ Church every Sunday, wet or dry. And I remember her face got curves the wrong way, though she didn't seem thinner. But I did not think anything of that then.

There was some one else who used to look out for her besides me. One of our Grecians at that time was Richard Whyte; and all the college was proud of him, he was such a clever chap. The other boys always wondered why he took notice of me, who was so different in every way. I wondered too. On holidays he would go with me to Greenwich, and sit all day on One-Tree Hill, and walk home along the Strand to Bouverie Street, where Bessie used to wait. At first he took no notice of her, and we could hear his heavy shoes clump off, as we went down into Whitefriars to make our talk a little longer. We used to turn up Bridge Street, cross Ludgate Hill, go up the little court by Stationers' Hall, where the trees are, along Paternoster Row, and through the passage leading into Newgate Street. There Bessie kissed me, and said her parting words; but she always came out into the street, and shook hands again; and there was Richard Whyte waiting for me, having come round by the thoroughfares.

At last, with hearing my talk, she grew to know him like, and smiled and nodded to him when she met us, which made him go off double quick, and very red. But one day, after hearing some story of how he had befriended me, she held out her hand, and thanked him. That wasn't in the Strand, but at Great Turnstile, Lincoln's Inn. Bless you, he walked home so fast, it nearly took my breath away. You see she was older than him, and being in business, and about in the world, and he shut up at school, she fancied him quite a boy, and never thought— Poor fellow!

He used to sit and look at her in church. We had a dull parson doing exchange duty at the time, and I often grumbled, and the first that ever made me notice about Richard and Bessie, was his saying, "At any rate there is always one good sermon preaching in Christ Church." And I said, I didn't know where. Said he, "In your sister's face, Tom. God's love exceeds all human love, and when one thinks of hers, it teaches us how vast is his."

I think Richard was a poet, sir. If so, perhaps it was as well he was taken away. It was settled he should go to college, so he took a little holiday before he went. And in that holiday he sickened and died. Rapid decline, they said it was. I missed him terribly—most of all when I went alone to meet Bessie, and during services. I'm only a rough sailor, but I have fancies of my own. When we miss the dead so sharply, that we feel almost like crying out after them, then I fancy they are present in the spirit, and calling to us with voices that our souls can hear through our veil of flesh. It may not be so, sir, but still it may.

Well, I was put to sea, and went abroad. I did not grieve very much to leave Bessie, for after Richard's death, I made friends with lads who did not improve me. The captain I sailed under was a hard man, and when I got to America, I ran away, I don't want to say much about the next ten years, sir. It's pleasing to remember hardship, they say, but it's bitter to remember sin. It seems strange, doesn't it, that some of those who've done most honour to the old school were forsaken by kith and kin? and here was I, with a good woman planning and praying for me, I turned out bad. There were others, of course, getting on, and wishing they had some one to rejoice in their prosperity, while I was only too glad my sister did not know where I was, and couldn't guess how bad things were. Somehow, it's often so. God seems determined that sinners shall always have a loving hand ready to call them back to him.

So time went on, sir, and when I was six-and-twenty I didn't look much younger than I do now. At times I fancied I'd like to die, and I've come down to the wharves about Bankside, and looked in these very waters. But I always came away. For one thing, I thought if she was alive, I needn't go and fling myself where my dead body might be washed up at her very feet. So I just went on, making short voyages, for I hadn't strength for long ones, until at last I was laid up on board the Dreadnought.

That was a weary time. I kept my bed for weeks, hearing scarce any sound but sick men's voices, and the splashing waves outside. At last I crawled on deck. It was a fine day in early autumn, and the river was quite gay with craft of all sorts and sizes. Presently there passed a steamer, filled with London folk out for a breath of fresh air, and among them was a little fair-haired Blue-coat boy, all alone. You don't know how I felt. They came up, things I'd quite forgotten, the very sunlight on Bessie's face, sitting in the sideway pews. I couldn't stay on deck, but went below and lay down, and cried—cried like a child. There were one or two fellows saw me, rough, swearing men as any on the seas; but in my misery I couldn't help telling them about it. Did they laugh, sir? Not they! One of them began to wonder if his old mother was alive, and the other stood stock still a bit, and then went to his chest and got out a book. Presently I smelt something sweet, and turning my head, found he had laid a little dried crimson flower on my pillow. "She gave it to me," he said, "the girl I was to have married; but the foul disgrace came to me, and it could not be." He gave two great, tearless sobs, took it up and put it away again.

In a week or two I left the Dreadnought. I had only a few shillings, and I went into a common lodging-house in Ratcliff. But the hunger after old times was strong within me, and the very first Sunday morning I crawled up to Newgate Street. It was much changed, made broader, and old houses replaced by new ones. But about the church porch it was exactly the same, and I entered softly, and went to the sideway pews. I did not know where Bessie was, I feared even to seek her, but it seemed a little comfort to sit in her old seat, and the great, strange chequered windows looked like familiar, friendly faces. Presently the boys came in, and I bowed my head and wished—I dared not pray, then, sir—that not one of them should ever come back such an outcast as myself. Then service began, and I stood up and looked round. On the back free seat of the middle aisle sat a lady, very quietly dressed, with a gleam of golden hair shining through her black lace veil. I knew her. It was Bessie.

For some minutes I stood still, like one struck. Then a sudden impulse seized me, and I stole out, re-entered the other door, and softly took a seat beside her.

She looked blankly at me for one moment, and then the old sweet smile burst out upon her face, and I knew she welcomed me! As in a dream I heard the clergyman read—

"Wherefore I pray and beseech you, as many as are here present, to accompany me with a pure heart, and humble voice, unto the throne of the heavenly grace, saying after me—"

And we kneeled down, hand-in-hand. And, sir, I felt as if Bessie had caught me at last, and was leading me up to my Father to receive his forgiveness.

We did not leave the church until the service was over; and then we went together to her quiet home, not very far away—a lonely home, sir. There was no one to blame her for killing the fatted calf for sake of the prodigal.

And, sir, the wonder of my story is this—when I asked Bessie how I chanced to find her at Christ Church the very Sunday I went there, she answered—

"Whatever Sunday you had come, Tom, you would have found me there. I have never missed one since you went away."

And since then I've found out the reason. It was the only place she could ever hope to meet me. She thought I might come there, for remembrance of old times. So there she came. Whenever I think of it—I—I—

You'll excuse me, sir, I always lose my voice over that. She's still alive, and I shall see her to-night, please God. If I'm not a credit to the Hospital, it's my own fault; and if I'm not quite a disgrace, it's due to her.

And now I understand what Richard meant when he said, "God's love exceeds all human love, and when one thinks of hers, it teaches us how vast is his."

And so, good day, sir, good day, a pleasant holiday to you, and I hope you'll soon come this way again.

I. F.

OUR BUTTERFLIES; OR, THE PLEASURE-SEEKERS OF SOCIETY.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, F.R.S.L.

WE were taught, in childhood, to believe that everything in the world was created by the Divine Artificer for some wise purpose; nor do we venture, now we have reached our riper years, to abandon that infantile belief. Nevertheless, it is exceedingly difficult to discern the final cause of some existing phenomena. There are objects, which, though not decidedly obnoxious, are of very little or no practical utility. What purpose is subserved by the butterflies which flutter around the flowers of the garden? Their varicoloured wings are beautiful to the eye; their lively motions in the fields of air are graceful; and they afford pleasant sport for eager, hopeful, nimble youth; but their positive profitableness to the great world-field we have yet to discover. On and on they fly, from flower to flower, from garden to garden, until their short day is ended, and the summer closes, and the nipping frosts smite down the last survivor of the annual tribe.

So is it in the social world. There is a race of persons living, who, humanly speaking, are of no service to their generation. They look around on Nature, ever exerting herself to the utmost to replenish and enrich her sons; they look out on a busy world, where good and bad men are untiringly at work; they know their lot is cast in an age eminently characterised by progress; they see that their season of life on earth, at the best, is brief, and yet, with lamentable indifference, oblivious to their own present improvement and future well-being, as well as to the advantage of others, they spend life in indolence and diversion. They say with Shakespeare's King Lear:—

"So we'll live,
And pray, and sing, and tell old tales, and laugh
At gilded butterflies, and hear poor rogues
Talk of court news; and we'll talk with them too—
Who loses, and who wins: who's in, who's out."

Thus sauntering in the intermediate realm between solid pleasure and scorching pain; now frivolously flitting from one gay scene to another, and then sluggishly reclining on the couch of sloth—their life is that of fools at large. The precious hours pass unimproved, the whole career is unprofitable, and when they drop into the tomb, their epitaph might well be that which John Foster suggested for an indolent man:—"Here lies a person who has lost nothing by being buried; for he is just as good a man under the ground as he was above it."

Perhaps you are acquainted with one or more of these social butterflies, in the quiet town or village in which you dwell; if not, you are most fortunate, and we offer you our congratulations. London is the place, and May, with its three succeeding months, the time, in which to find the largest number of specimens. Then, when Nature robes herself in her fairest and sweetest dress, and Flora chooses from her casket her most gorgeous jewels, you will see some of God's creatures, not only competing with Nature in the grandeur of their garb, but turning away from her inviting charms to artificial pleasures and unhealthy riots. Week after week is filled up with egregious dissipation. If curiosity led you across the threshold of one of the brilliant saloons, a bewildering scene would be open to your gaze—a gay, gaudy throng striving, by the aid of flashing lights, and sweet music, to forget, from sunset to sunrise, their pecuniary cares, or personal jealousies, or heartaching disappointments, or heaven-appportioned duties. Did you follow them to their homes at break of day, you would see them spend the hours in feverish slumber, and in anxious arrangement for the next night's folly. And then, when the season of fashion and finery terminates, the members of those vivacious companies are smitten with painful ennui; looking to the withered garlands and faded feathers with melancholy remembrances of the past, mingled with vain resolutions, and buoyant anticipations of the future. Alas! for what we have witnessed behind the scenes—the hours wasted in training pure-minded girlhood to be the slave of hypocrisy and the puppet of pleasure; to think supremely of appearances—to trust in tinsel to the neglect of mental and moral worth. It is sad to see mothers treating their daughters as though they were not rational beings—as though they had no important part to play in the solemn drama of life. It is grievous to find young women omitting to cultivate the intellect and emotions, but permitting thoughts of gay attire and giddy pastimes to become regnant in their minds. We would fain impress upon them, that there is something better than the restless, febrile excitement of social gatherings—that there is no ornament, however costly or chaste, equal to the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. We would urge upon the attention of our mothers, sisters, and daughters, the words of Tertullian:—"Let women paint their eyes with tints of chastity, insert into their ears the word of God, tie the yoke of Christ around their necks, and adorn their whole persons with the silk of sanctity and the damask of devotion; let them adopt that chaste and simple, that neat and elegant, style of dress, which so advantageously displays the charms of real beauty, instead of those preposterous fashions and fantastical draperies of dress, which, while they conceal some few defects of person, expose so many defects of mind, and sacrifice to ostentatious finery all those mild, amiable, and modest virtues by which the female character is so pleasingly adorned."

But it is not alone among the gentler sex that social butterflies are found. Manliness blushes to record that there are vain, conceited simpletons called men, whose lives correspond with the picture above drawn. Rising late, they

"Take a world of pains
To prove that bodies may exist sans brains."

Their morning is devoted to fashion's form. As Carlyle says, "Every faculty of the soul, spirit, purse, and person is heroically consecrated to this one object—the wearing of clothes wisely and well." When caparisoned and bejewelled, they saunter forth, with consequential air, to lisp away the afternoon in Pall Mall or the Row, and then spend the evening in frequenting varied tempting places of Bacchanalian amusement. Day after day the nauseous round is repeated, whilst the heart is unsatisfied and restless. Oh, it is a lamentable sight—a being made a little lower than the angels, in subjection to the world over which Heaven gave him dominion!—a God-breathed nature sold into captivity, the manhood quiescent, the majesty gone! The slave of Pompey's triumph whispered into the ear of his master, "Remember, thou art but a man." We could not address so much to the character we now describe. He is a thing, not a man; or, to employ the language of Young, "an immortal being, that has but two marks of a man about him—upright stature and the power of playing the fool, which a monkey has not."

By nothing thus advanced do we intend to depreciate legitimate rest and recreation. These nature claims, and often craves. The bow must now and then be unstrung, or it will soon be useless. The grand old Bible says, "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine;" but medicinal draughts are only now and then taken. So long, as our amusements are derived from pure sources, and not indulged in to excess, there is no prohibition that need trouble us. Perhaps we have made too little provision, in the past, for the lawful recreation of our young people; and this may, in part, account for many going wrong. "The Church has been so fearful of amusements that the devil has had the care of them. The chaplet of flowers has been snatched from the brow of Christ and given to mammon." But so long as we are not pursuing pleasure for its own sake, but with a view to preparation for mere efficient discharge of our God-allotted work, so long we may seek it with a calm conscience. The sea is not all ripple. Beneath the laughing, dancing waves are the pacific, silent deeps. So, if there be solidity of character, we see no reasonable objection to occasional liveliness. Our remarks, however, are condemnatory of those Epicureans who live wholly for pleasure and in pleasure—to whom worldly mirth and worldly show are the grand goal. We cannot but denounce those who, like the gaudy butterfly, "the child of the sun," dream of nought but sportive hours and then—death!

Moreover, we egregiously mistake if we conclude that the votaries of pleasure are happy. To be endowed with beauty, bedecked with fashion, and surrounded by fairy enchantments, is not to possess a calm conscience and a joyous heart. Burroughs quaintly remarks, "One may have a very fine new shoe, but nobody knows where it pinches but he who hath it on." Ay, men often miss happiness in their eager search after pleasure. They gulp down week upon week without extracting any true delight. They remind us of the alderman, who turned from his turtle soup to a talkative companion, and said, "You most unconscionable fellow, your remark made me swallow a large piece of green fat without tasting it!" Homer says, in the vicinity of the throne of Jupiter are two urns, one of pain, the other of pleasure, of both of which all mortals must drink. Ah! the transition from one to the other is quickly made. Indeed, some mortals seem to drink of both urns at once; like the witty Dean of St. Patrick's, who was known whilst living to be "the most unhappy man on earth;" like Charles Matthews, who endured great pain whilst moving hundreds with laughter; or like the profligate young man who, appearing very cheerful, was addressed by a friend in the words, "I long to be as happy as you," and replied, "Do you? I am so wretched that I wish myself the dog at my feet." It is possible—

"To carry smiles and sunshine in the face While discontent sits heavy at the heart."

The fact is, sin and sorrow are wedded—unholiness and unhappiness are counterparts of each other. Hence we are quite sure that the vain pleasure-mongers of society are strangers to substantial joy. They may be privileged with frequenting the sunny heights of learning, fame, wealth, and influence; but they cannot discover happiness there, so long as the unhallowed emotions of the heart are not allayed. With lawless appetites, and stormy passions in the breast, there cannot be peace. The pleasure attached to vice is but the ease with which the soul descends to the dark haunts of tribulation. The joy of any man who loves not Jesus is but like a ray of sunshine through the bars of a prisoner's cell. The shepherd in Eastern fable sighed for a brook that in winter should not overflow, and in summer should not dry up, imagining if he could find it he would secure satisfaction. Each social butterfly, ay, every man, has some place or thing which occupies, in his estimation and aspiration, the place allotted the brook in the mind of the shepherd. Would that it were understood that the religion of Christ alone can satisfy! The water Jesus gives is a well of water springing up to everlasting life. He who has it can look with tender compassion on his fellows, who roam among the flowers of life, or buzz round the brilliant luminaries of earth, and, raising the eye of gratitude to God can sing—

"From pole to pole let others roam,
And search in vain for bliss,
My soul is satisfied at home:
The Lord my portion is."

SONNET.—TO DEATH.

THOU soft-plumed, pitying angel, lovely Death, Clear-eyed with gazing on the Father's beams,
In zealous watch for that all-quickenng breath,
Which bids thee waken men from their dull dreams—
Knowest thou, gentle Death, how joyfully
Pent souls look outward from their narrow prison,

To hail thy signal, growing silently
Out of faint twilight as a star new risen?
Open thy golden gate into the light,
And o'er the sapphire floor plucked roses fling;
But spare each plant defiled and sick with blight—
If so forbearing thou obey the King—
Till it be washed with living waters bright,
And burgeon to its heavenly blossoming.

F. W.

CHRIST ASLEEP.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

"Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?"

NE does not see at a glance how the disciples merited so heavy a rebuke. The ship was covered with waves; it was filled with water, and they were in jeopardy. Is it wonderful that they were alarmed? They had watched and waited for the Saviour to arise and help them. Many a quail of natural fear had they suppressed, or he would long since have been aroused from a slumber so strange and dangerous; but now things have reached a crisis, and they break upon his repose with various cries. "Lord, save us: we perish," exclaims one; another cries, "Master, carest thou not that we perish?"—not meaning to imply heartless apathy, but merely want of attention; a third simply states the pressing danger, "Master, master, we perish." But in every case there is an appeal to him; amid raging winds and devouring waters they are not without hope from him who lay sleeping there; and instead of saying, as the shipmen to Jonah in similar peril, "Arise and call upon thy God," they are content to invoke his own power to deal with so tremendous and urgent a necessity. Perhaps if Christ had asked them, as he asked a suppliant once, "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" not one of the disciples would have denied his power.

Yet the Saviour complains of their weakness: in Mark he even says, "How is it that ye have no faith?" And the reason is, not that they roused him up, or that one at least had used intemperate language in his terror; it is simply that they were fearful. Amid scowling skies and yawning waters they should have been firm and calm; for had not Jesus gone before them into the ship, and they followed him? Therefore they were safe in the vessel that shook at every buffet of the wave—safe as if they stood upon some rock of ages, and saw the proudest billow shivered into foam beneath their feet.

Here there are lessons for the Christian at all times:—

1. We are not exempt from trials, even in our providential path; for the storm burst, although they followed Christ into the ship. Let us not imagine that any amount of faith or obedience will make our path to heaven smooth for the spirit, or this life untroubled for the earthly part of us. This is not our rest, for it is polluted. God has no intention of making the wilderness brighter than the land of promise—the tabernacle of witness than the temple. Life here is typified by the stormy lake rather than the rippling river, unless in the case of those unhappy wanderers who are gliding down the river to the cataract.

Abraham had the torture of binding down his own son upon the altar of burnt sacrifice. David was hunted like a partridge upon the mountains by Saul, and afterwards driven from his throne by his spoiled child, whose death made the woe of victory more bitter than that of flight. Christ himself had not where to lay his head. Paul was in deaths oft, and thought that God set forth the apostles as a theatrical exhibition to the world and to angels. Who are we, then, that we should think of our religion as exempting us from the common lot of men? The Christian is bereaved as well as the sinner; nor is his business secure against competition, his harvest against blight, his body against disease. The old covenant said, "Never saw I the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." The new covenant says, "Take up thy cross;" and its disciples often have to say, "For him I have suffered the loss of all things."

Religion itself is often the cause of trouble in life, just as the disciples were caught by the storm because they were sailing along with Jesus. Persecution—especially the small but dreadful persecution of one's own hearth—is not yet dead. The intolerance of sect and faction is abroad and rampant still. Men have to lose their popularity, to offend their customers, their clients, or perhaps their congregations, if they will not prophesy smooth things. How people pray to be kept from such trials, shuddering and shrinking from the cold shadow of poverty or the icy touch of misrepresentation, and wondering that God says, "When thou passest through the waters they shall not overflow thee," instead of leaving them quietly upon the shore!

I do not say that the Christian loses much in this respect, for the world has its own troubles also; I only say that he is wrong if he expects to escape the common lot, even as a child is wrong who thinks his father should always carry him, instead of making him exercise his limbs. It is by the trial of our faith that our patience is to be wrought.

Other boats were tossed upon the same storm as this one, but the sailors along with Christ may have dreamed that no danger could come where he was found. They were mistaken.

2. We learn, again, that the absence of help is no reason for clamour or disquietude. We can easily picture the disciples' feelings for a while before our Lord was aroused. They saw the gathering squall, and longed to beg permission to go back; but remembering how clear was the expression of his will, persuaded themselves that he knew best, and the danger would pass away. So does a Christian think, if I altered my course

I might escape sorrow, shame, privation; but no, Christ has plainly sent me forward, and he will save me from suffering in his cause. Yet the suffering comes. The storm did burst upon their open boat, and they rowed hard and long in vain. All this time they expected him to arise and help them. Another sleeper, they think, would have started up in alarm long since; can it be that his miraculous gifts only produce supernatural indifference to our need of him? Their fears increase. "Yes," they think "he is safe, and knows not what danger means; whatever happens the vessel, his Father, of whom he speaks so much, will deliver him; but we are common mortals, and must force our claim on his attention—he must be awakened, or we perish." They waited until the very last moment, until the ship was full, but then there arose that sharp, reproachful cry of anguish by which his repose was broken.

And thus, to all but the most faithful Christians, a moment comes in sharp afflictions when the prayer of submission becomes the prayer of dictation and demand; when, instead of trusting our Lord to work as he thinks best, we cry out to him to work some particular deed, and to do it at once, or we must perish. There are prayers which simply mean: "I cannot bear this any longer; take thy plagues away from me; I am even consumed by reason of thy heavy hand." There are prayers which refuse to endure the furnace heat—prayers which say, "Not thy will but mine be done—prayers which impeach the fidelity of God, unless God will change his course, and heal our wound, or cheer our sadness, or deliver us from the bereavement that we fear.

3. Our proper course is, like theirs, to have faith in Christ's sympathising love, even when his providence gives no sign. They are not blamed for speaking to him of their trouble, nor even for arousing him from the toil-demanded slumber that was being snatched, amid the most unfavourable surroundings, by a worn-out frame. They are only reproved for going to him in a state of panic. Had they come in faith he would have thought upon that coming day when he himself offered up prayers and supplications with strong cries and tears, and for the sake of his own care sympathised with theirs and helped them. But think how much grander still would have been their trust had they gathered around his pillow, and felt that even while he slept they were under his wing—he was their keeper and protector always—and so awaited the result. How happy then would they have been when he arose in his majesty and love, and the eye that overawed the tempest beamed its approval upon their faith!

And for us, also, the evidence of Christ's sympathy must not be sought in quick release from affliction. No, nor in any rapt and overwhelming sense of scorn for the sufferings of the body. There may be times when the Saviour gives no visible proof of his care for us, when there is no gleam breaking through the cloud to say that the sun still shines. If our Lord sees us trusting more in consolations than in him, he may take away the consolations, to show us the falseness of our confidence. Yet he does not really remove. When we ask where is he, that question is a proof that he is near. When we sigh for the Spirit to comfort us, the Spirit is working in that very sigh, whose sound is so forlorn and desolate.

Be content to know that he is always by, always sympathetic, always strong and wise, and having laid your desires before him with all earnestness, and yet with all submission, then be still, and see his salvation, and, though he tarry, wait for him.

To be delivered from the furnace is much; to glorify God in the fires is far, far more: and the richest promises are given to those who bear, and forbear, and do not tire. "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires," saith the Lord.

4. But there is one more lesson of personal interest in this narrative. There is a great difference between the absolutely best thing, and the best thing under certain circumstances. The absolutely best was, that Israel should have been saved by Christ; yet the best thing when Israel rebelled was, not to gather her children like chickens under his wing, but give her up to the Gentiles, till their time shall be fulfilled. Now Christ always does for his people the best thing he can do under the circumstances; but we may create circumstances that force him to treat us far worse than the absolutely best; and thus we may lose much, very much, by our own conduct to the Saviour.

For my part, I never read this story without longing to know what Christ meant to do if he had been undisturbed? Would he have slept on, and simply let the tempest die away? would he have arisen presently, unsummoned? would some voice from heaven have spoken? or would angels have ministered to his safety, as at other times to his strength? We do not know; we shall never know in this world. The impatience of the disciples made it cruel for him to delay longer, and their unbelief would have been confirmed if the storm had ceased of itself. They forced upon him a change of action, and perhaps they robbed the Church of a great lesson.

Let us learn the moral. Sorrow is sent us to discipline, to refine, to chasten our belief; and there is much that can only be done by a long exposure to the white heat of trial. Now, if we are not resigned, although we be not unbelieving, there may be too much hazard in the operation. We may pray so importunately for release that longer torture would shake down our faith to the foundation, and God may give us our heart's desire, and send leanness withal into our souls. We sometimes wonder why the great saints are almost always the most severely tried; and one reason is doubtless this, they alone will submit to the close and sweeping use of the pruning-knife by which to be made very fruitful.

5. Finally, there is teaching here for the whole body, as well as for each member—the Church, as well as individuals within its pale. People sometimes argue as if a Church were not sound unless it has peaceful and prosperous times. Dissenters sometimes point to the fierce commotions that are distracting the Church, and ask, Is that a Christian state of things? And churchmen sometimes watch the convulsions and distractions of dissent with a sad smile of very unreal superiority in that respect. The Romanist is sure to argue from the tranquillity of Rome, as if we never heard of Jansenists and Jesuits, or Dominican and Augustan brawls. In truth, the ark of Christ's Church is destined to be tossed upon stormy seas, which only his Divine voice, heard once more as across that Galilean tempest, can ever charm into repose.

And in our troublous and stormy times, when infidelity and superstition beat upon our bulwarks and over them; when the ship itself is once more filling with water and we are in jeopardy; when the arms of the rowers are very weary, and the lightning-flashes show us no sacred form treading upon the foam to save us, it well becomes us to remember that Christ may be with us in our little ark itself, although we behold him not, or he seem to us as one that slumbers: for a while—only for a while. Controversies shall not affright us; the floods of ungodly men shall not make us afraid; for we know that One is among us, and upon our side, who can quell the rage of this flood also with a word, and make its surges die down to the stillness of an infant's slumber: and he will do it by-and-by. In "the church of the future which all hearts forebode," there will not be fightings without and fears within, but the most serene tranquillity, the most unclouded safety, and no sterner sound than that of the cloven waters which hiss under a prosperous prow. For that time we wait, and work, and pray. At times it seems very near, and at times terribly remote, as the signs of awakening seem to be discernible, or the immovable Master gives no token.

But this we know, that troubles are no token of desertion to the Church, nor adversity of shipwreck; and that after a while He will arise in his calmness and his majesty, and there shall be a great hush upon the atmosphere and the lake, and the barque shall reach the haven where the over-wearied mariners would be. Let us not cry out nor be impatient, but in faith and submission remember that our times, and all times, are in his hands.

NEVER MIND A PINCH.

NEVER mind a pinch, boy,
 Never mind a pinch;
 Set the wedge the closer;
 Heroes never flinch!
 Mind it fits the cleft, boy,
 Firm, and tight, and strong;
 Ne'er to worthy labour
 Did indolence belong.

What if frequent effort
 Frequent failure seems?
 From narrowest mountain springlet
 The mountain torrent streams.

Then lift the mallet high, boy,
 Strike it like a man;
 Never mind your marbles,
 Labour while you can.

See, the rift grows wide, boy,
 Deeper sinks the wedge,
 There's your sturdy block, boy,
 Split from edge to edge!
 Then never mind a pinch, boy,
 Labour while you can,
 Fit your wedge the closer,
 And strike it like a man.

"JUILLET."

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.

GUILTY OR NOT GUILTY?

WHEN Captain Oglivie got clear of the house, he looked round in every direction to see if he could catch a glimpse of the fugitive. But though the leafage was yet but a cloud of tender green on each individual tree, he could see but a little way down the tortuous walks, for the closeness of the stems and the luxuriant growth of evergreens which rose every here and there to intercept the view. He took, however, the narrowest and most tortuous path, as the one most likely to conceal the thief of the letter, and was soon himself concealed among its towering shrubs. There he stood still for a little and listened; but he could hear nothing for the singing of the birds, whose gleeful little throats he would have stopped on the instant; and could Peggy have seen his face just then, with its expression of murderous rage towards these harmless creatures, because they seemed to conspire to baffle his pursuit, her heart would have known no relenting towards him for evermore. It was no use standing still to listen, so he soon went on again at a swinging pace.

"By this time he has either destroyed or secreted it," he said to himself. "If the former, it does not so much matter, and if the latter, it must be somewhere out of doors here, or about his person. Out of doors here, I dare say it would be safe enough; I can keep watch on him for a day or two, and perhaps discover it, and, if he has it, I'll make him give it up;" and he set his teeth as he strode along.

At length he caught a glimpse of the object of his search emerging from among the trees, and, with stealthy aspect, taking a nearly parallel path towards the house. It was easy work to cut off his retreat by crossing the ground, and this was what Captain Oglivie did, for the poor fellow was stealing along, in his shambling way, even more slowly than usual. But as soon as he saw his enemy, and the expression of the captain's face was not disguised for his benefit, he turned and fled. He was in the path that led to the gate, and he made directly for it, and into the unknown country beyond. There was the gleam of the river, and, with the captain following behind, he made straight towards it. But, with his shambling gait, and limbs unaccustomed to the exercise, he could not escape. His pursuer made up to him, caught him, and detained him with no gentle grasp.

There was a short but desperate struggle, and the weakling had the best of it. For one thing, his hideous outcries unnerved Horace Oglivie, who was endeavouring to find his letter by tearing open with one hand the poor creature's vest, within which he was in the habit of concealing his treasures, while he held him with the other.

Then Sir Alexander, as might have been expected, was not scrupulous, and began to use those natural weapons, his teeth, and his antagonist quitted his hold in horror, when he felt that they were about to close upon his hand.

Miss Oglivie, who had followed a wrong path at first, had, guided by the cries, come up in time to see the last of the painful scene.

Sir Alexander had set off again in the direction of the river, and Captain Oglivie was standing still. The river was full to the brim, for the sun had not yet drunk of it, and the snows had newly melted on the hills.

"He will fall in!" were the first words Peggy spoke, as she came up to the captain. "Oh, Horace! save him!"

"I could not hold him," he answered, hoarsely; and the thought flashed through his mind that it would not be his fault if he fell into the river and was drowned. "You saw that I could not hold him." At the same time he started off again.

As he did so, the hapless Sir Alexander turned and saw his pursuer, and faster than before hastened on to destruction.

"I am driving him to it!" thought Horace Oglivie, but still he went on, not any longer in wrath or passion, but driven himself, as it were, to be the instrument of death to him towards whom he had, but a moment before, felt the murderous intent. His heart seemed to stand still as he was borne along—to stand still at the bar of conscience, listening to the strange "guilty or not guilty?" The one emotion which he felt was suspense. But it was with a face of genuine horror that he stood on the river-bank, and saw the turbid water broken by the leap of his wretched relative, and the rapid current bearing him hopelessly out of reach. He looked the picture of despair. Peggy had never seen such a look on human face before, and her heart went out to him who could suffer thus. For there was no need to act. The catastrophe had had another witness, who was already acting, and to better purpose than was possible to either of them.

David Haldane was already in the middle of the stream. He had made a leap lower down almost as soon as Sir Alexander fell, for he had seen his wild intent, and was prepared for its consequences, though he had been too far off to prevent it. He had sprung upon one of the huge stones that strewn the stream, sometimes loose, sometimes shelving out from the bank. It was covered now; the amber water, coloured with the peat-mosses of the mountains from whence it came, was rushing over it more than a foot high; while on the further side a strong current, of drowning depth, was running doubly fast. It was into this depth that the stream was bearing the drowning man. Even over the great stone on which David Haldane knelt, the water, shallow as it was, was curving with a force which it took all his strength to resist. He had just time to secure his position there, and stretch out his arm, when the body, covered, but not sunk, was whirled past. He stretched out his arm, and caught it—a few inches farther out, and it would have been beyond his reach. As it was, he had a terrible struggle to stand his ground, and raise it sufficiently. Then Captain Oglivie, obeying his order, came to his assistance, and together they dragged it up the shelving rock, and through the shallow, and laid it on the bank.

It appeared that nothing worse than a wetting had happened to Sir Alexander. It had all been done so rapidly, that he was sitting up and beginning to stare about him by the time Miss Oglivie reached the group. Captain Oglivie had left her side when Haldane shouted to him for help, and she had stood with clasped hands and bated breath watching the rescue. Now she knelt down beside the poor creature, who began to tremble and to cry like a child. The two men stood over him ready to help, while Peggy tried to soothe him by holding his cold wet hands in hers.

But first she had thanked his deliverer. It was but by a look, but a look eloquent with grateful praise. She had recognised him at once: she could not fail to do so, for his brown locks were bare, their wonted covering, a Highland bonnet, like a miniature canoe, was dancing down to the sea, the sport of the brimming Strathie. But he had not recognised her till she came near, so intent had been his occupation with the object before him, and his recognition was eager and demonstrative. He named her, and held out, not one hand, but both. It was not that he meant her to take them, for the next moment he was thrusting them awkwardly through his hair, but the gesture was full of meaning: it spoke the man's whole heart going forth toward the supreme object of its desire.

He had been taken off his guard; and no wonder that it was so, for it was of her he had been thinking as he came up the bank of the river—of her who was further removed from him than ever—almost hopelessly beyond his reach, indeed. Then his head was swimming with intensity of effort, and the rush of the water was in his ears, as if he had still been looking down into its depths, to snatch from it its prey—the life of a fellow-creature. He was thoroughly off his guard, and what had become the ruling passion of his life was visible for a moment in look and act.

In kneeling down by Sir Alexander, Peggy had not noticed either look or gesture; but Captain Oglivie had noticed both, and a pang of jealousy was added to the other sensations, which he was that day doomed to feel. He looked from one to the other, and thought as he looked, "These two understand each other."

They did not understand each other according to his meaning; but the great charm which each might have found in the other—which David Haldane had found in Peggy Oglivie—was the possibility of understanding, and being understood. And it was to David Haldane that Peggy turned for help as she said, "Let us try and get him to go home, and it may do him no harm." Then she added, "It is no use thanking you, Mr. Haldane; you seem to be the good genius of the place: you are always at hand to help."

The words were gall and wormwood to her other listener; and just then Sir Alexander, looking round, caught sight of him, and gave utterance to one of his cries of alarm and rage. He suffered David Haldane, however, to assist him to his feet, and Peggy took hold of his hand to lead him away.

David was now on his guard again, and he said, quietly, "Are you sure it is quite safe?"

"Quite safe for me," she answered; "but he may try to escape. You had better follow me with Captain Oglivie."

A slight introduction, to which each responded rather stiffly, and the two men were following Peggy and her dripping companion toward the gate, both of them well drenched, and David Haldane hatless.

Once within the gate, Sir Alexander did make his escape, but to the relief of the whole party he made his way directly to the house, and following him quickly, but still at a distance, they saw him enter. Then David Haldane halted and announced his intention of turning back.

"But you are thoroughly wet," said Peggy. "Come up to the house and get dried."

He smiled. She was thoroughly ignoring the necessities of the case.

"Perhaps I can assist you," said the captain. "I can lend you a hat, at least."

"I have been in a worse plight than this," he said, carelessly. "I will turn back."

Peggy would have pleaded—had raised her eyes to his for the purpose—but he had become suddenly constrained and cold. He had been thrown off his guard, and now he was holding to it firmly, and looking thus in consequence. "Ah," she thought, "he will not come—he will not, willingly, come near me any more," and she held out her hand to him wistfully.

"Good-bye," was all he said, and with a second and still stiffer bow to the captain, he turned back to the gate.

"Boorish," muttered Horace Oglivie: but his companion neither heard nor heeded. She was walking on beside him, with trembling steps, and a sad, white face: and he, too, said nothing further, but marched up to the house in silence. It was no wonder he was silent, for his mind was occupied with two distinct trains of thought, or rather two distinct thoughts lying one over the other. That he was an injured individual was the uppermost—that he had been saved from a lifelong haunting horror, was the one he tried to keep under. And it was the former that rose to his lips, as they were about to enter the house.

"So you have thrown me over for that man," he said.

"Horace!"

He repeated the words that had stung her.

"It is all the other way," she answered, in a low, passionate tone.

"And you repent it?"

"It is possible that I may," she answered, deliberately lifting her eyes to his face.

CHAPTER XXXII.

GRATITUDE.

THE elder Haldane was evidently in a genial mood. When he was in a genial mood, he was not above a little mild jocoseness with the people about him; and in this humour he had gone about the place all day. He had ignored signs of remissness here and there, made light of difficulties, and praised praiseworthy efforts, in a way that spread good humour over the whole establishment: for of late the old man had been gloomy and irritable—more gloomy and irritable than his nephew had ever known him to be.

The death of his old enemy had strangely affected him. He could never triumph over this man now. He could never stand face to face with him again, and tell him, "Long ago—perhaps so long ago that you have forgotten all about it—you took advantage of your position to injure me; now our positions are reversed." This was what he had longed all his life to do—this had become a purpose tenaciously and secretly held: and now it could never be accomplished. But still he had desired to stand face to face with Gilbert Oglivie again, and that he had resolved to do.

It had been easy to accomplish his wish without observation. In that part of the country it is held almost an obligation of friendship to look upon the face of the dead, and up to the day of the funeral it is expected that all who have known the deceased will pay this mark of respect to the remains. There had been few to pay the tribute to Gilbert Oglivie, but among them, though not of them, was old Haldane. On the morning of the funeral he had carried out his intention. He knew that the women of the family would be in strict seclusion, according to Scotch custom, and, as it happened, no one had seen him but a hired mourner, who had admitted him to the house, and ushered him into the sacred presence. He was not a man who analysed his motives, but he repented him of the act as soon as it was done. The pure, passionless repose of the dead rebuked his enmity. He was forced, in spite of himself, to bow to the majesty before him, and to go forth from its presence feeling his own littleness. Not a pleasant sensation to a man who had been all his life feeling his own greatness, and the man who rises step by step, as old Haldane had risen, is ever feeling his relative greatness—his power to fill a higher position. It is the ensnaring temptation of such men to keep growing in their own esteem. So he had been very gloomy and morose for some time, and the black spot had burned at his heart. It was because of what was good in him that he felt it as a sore. A man devoid of generous feeling would have gone on hating, without so much as knowing that he did so. But this man was by no means devoid of generous feeling; therefore, his mood had been bitter to himself and others.

But just because his mood had brightened, his nephew held aloof from him that day, being himself, just then, rather averse to outward brightness. It was evening before they met—night indeed, considering the early hours the house usually kept—and the old man had had his tumbler, rendering him more jocose than ever. He began at once to rally his nephew, and, as is usually the case, he chose the most aggravating subject that there was to choose between them.

"Well, Daavid, what are ye thinkin' about—bringin' hame a young mistress?"

"Time enough," answered his nephew, smiling, and trying hard not to be annoyed. "Marry in haste and repent at leisure, you know."

"Ay, ay, that's well enough in a sense; but somebody may step in before ye. If ye've chosen a lass to ye're liking, be quick about it, man."

"You seem to have made up your mind that I must marry," said the young man; "it is by no means certain that I shall."

"The house will be ready," said his uncle; "I've bought it."

"What house?"

"I've bought Delaube," was the answer.

"Has Miss Oglivie sold it?"

"You mean the grandchild: it was never hers to sell."

"Whose was it then?" said the young man, eagerly.

"Her father's, and he parted with his interest in it long ago."

"But her father is supposed to be dead."

"Dead or no dead, it's mine," said old David, in a tone of exultation. "Gilbert Oglivie had signed the papers too, and on his death the property fell into the hands of the man who lent the money to his son. It's mine now, and I mean to live there. It's an easy ride to the works, and I would like a little grandeur in my old days."

His nephew regarded him with astonishment.

"I mean to set up a carriage. Why shouldn't I?" he said, seeing the look of astonishment growing at every word. "I'm rich enough for that now." He had risen in his energy, and was walking up and down the room. "You could easily ride over here every morning."

"What! leave the works altogether?" said the nephew.

"Yes, you don't think I'm going to live up there all by myself," said the uncle.

"I would greatly prefer remaining where I am," said the former, rather ungratefully. "You know I could look after things better on the spot," he added, unwilling to appear ungracious to the old man; "but for you, I think, sir, you have earned more of ease and comfort than you can find here."

"Things will go on here well enough without you," replied the old man, a little discontentedly. "I don't mean that there isn't plenty to do, but the main thing has been done for you, David; and," he added, coming up, and laying his hand kindly on the young man's shoulder, "I would jist like to see ye marry, lad. I dinna want ye to lead the mill-horse life I've led. I would like to see your bairns afore I dee yet."

The young man was profoundly touched. "Don't say any more about it, uncle," he said. "I'm not given to love-making, and my first trial has not been successful. It will most likely be my last."

His uncle walked up and down a little longer, regarding him with a queer expression. "I know who it is that has jilted you."

"Nobody has jilted me."

"I know who it is," he repeated, regardless of the interruption: "it's that girl o' Oglivie's. Her friends ha'e ta'en her in at last, and she thinks she'll be a great heiress; but she's mista'en there: she'll never ha'e a penny!"

"Stop, uncle!" cried the young man, rising; "I will not hear another word. You know nothing whatever about it!"

Perversely enough, old David Haldane, who was ready to vow that he would rather have seen his nephew marry a beggar from the streets than a daughter of the Oglivies, was very wrath at Peggy for tilting him, as he persisted in calling it.

"I'll say no more about it, David, my man," he said, overlooking the outburst of temper on his nephew's side, "after this night I'll say no more about it. Something o' the same happened to me in my young days, and a' through Gilbert Oglivie. It made me what I am. I never could look at anither, and I never could look at her again. But you'll be twice the man I am lad, and I advise you to look out for a wife. Anybody will be welcome to me except an Oglivie. I couldn't stomach that. I would rather leave my money to found a charity, than that it should go to ony wi' that had blood in their veins. I'm glad ye've gien up the idea o' her, at any rate."

"But I haven't given up the idea," said his nephew, who had allowed him to go on uninterrupted, for one reason, that the old man had never before alluded to his own misfortune, and his listener's sympathy and interest was roused.

"Not given up the idea! surely you would never ask a woman twice," said his uncle, sharply. Instead of an answer, his nephew put a question, but he put it gently.

"Uncle, in the matter of which you spoke, would you have allowed any one to interfere with you?"

"Certainly not," was the prompt reply.

"Then can't you see that it is not likely that I will let anybody interfere with me? I will never give up the idea as long as I can honestly keep it, any more than you would have done in my place, and though it seems a long way out of my reach at present—"

"There'll be as good as her within your reach. I tell you, David, you may marry the proudest lady in the land some day; and she has a good chance of being a beggar," said the old man, with the persistence of age.

"You seem to know more about her than I do."

"I ken more than most," was the answer; "but we'll say no more about that."

"Only remember, uncle," said the younger David, motioning to retire, "that I will act in this, as I believe you yourself would have acted, uninfluenced by anything you have said to-night."

"You mean you would break with me for the sake of this girl?" said the old man, fiercely—he was not of the whining order.

"No, I should leave that to you," answered his nephew, holding out his hand. "Good night."

"Good night."

"If he had only been my son, I might have forced him to obey me," thought the imperious fortune-maker; "as it is, he may go and leave me at the last, after all I have done for him;" and the old man's heart grew bitterer than ever, and he said to himself, "There is no such thing as gratitude on earth."

It was through the hands of his agent in Bleak-town that David Haldane had transacted the business of purchasing Delaube, and the said agent had long been watching for it, or any of the adjoining land, to come into the market, with instructions from his client to buy it up at any price. He had bought it, however, for no very extravagant sum, and his client was highly satisfied. It only remained to put him in possession, and the agent had had his instructions to warn out the present occupiers. He now had further instructions that it was to be done as quietly as possible, and without, for the present, allowing his client's name to appear.

The agent, accordingly, sent down a trustworthy individual, instructed to deal with the parties concerned about the effects of Gilbert Oglivie, to look after the transfer of the estate and the removal of the personal property; all of which he would have accomplished very quietly indeed, but that the guardian of the domain, who held the front entrance permanently barricaded in the absence of her young mistress, on learning the object of his mission, absolutely refused admittance.

TOM FELLOWES'S LARK.

A STORY FOR BOYS.

H, bother! there goes the bell. Never mind, though, there's five minutes' grace allowed us; and I think I could manage to tell you all about it in that time."

"Oh, yes, yes," exclaimed several voices together; "you really must tell us——"

"Like a good Fellowe," added another, to which persuasive sentiment came a universal echo.

"Ah, that wretched pun again," cried Tom. "I've a great mind now to keep you all in the dark till the evening, as a penance for it. Well, then, I won't," added he, as several modified yells of disappointment escaped his hearers; "I'll let you off this time, only pray don't make that awful row, or you'll make me feel quite nervous."

Tom Fellowes sat on the playground wall, dangling his legs backwards and forwards, his heels performing the part of puny battering-rams against the brick and mortar that enthroned him above the uplifted faces of his schoolfellows. Tom's exalted situation was not inappropriate to his position in the school. As truly as there was never yet a school without a hero, so truly was Tom Fellowes the paragon of St. Philip's. He was by no means a model for good conduct, or studious application, or, I regret to say, he would not have been so popular in the playground, but in all kinds of pranks and mischief, or, as the boys had it, "larks," Tom decidedly carried away the palm. We must do him the credit to say that he never wished to hurt the feelings of those against whom he transgressed. "The fun of the thing" was all he cared or thought about. Still this was a very grave fault, and did not lessen the ill effects of his larks one jot, for, as a namesake of Tom's says—

"Evil is wrought by want of thought
As well as by want of heart."

But we should not stay to quote the poets while so great and important a revelation is pending, and the boys are almost on tiptoe to catch the first syllable that will dissolve the mystery under which they are agonising.

"Well, as you are quiet again, here goes. I'll open fire with a solemn catechism. Who knows Cherrybob Orchard?"

Tom was immediately overwhelmed with an ocean of "I do," "So do I," "I should think I did," "Well, and what then?"

"Order, order! I'll tell you in good time. Has any one seen old Cherrybob these last few days?"

A general chorus of noes.

"Of course you haven't," pursued Tom. "And I know why. He's gone away for good: and left behind him the jolliest crop of apples and pears that ever grew in that orchard—such apples!—my eye!—and such pears, too! Wouldn't I like to have a go at them, if I could, this identical moment!" and here Tom went through a pantomime expressive of what he would do under those blissful circumstances. "Well, as I said before, old Cherrybob has gone for good; and the best of it is, nobody's come to take possession as yet; so I move that to-night we go and get a regular tuck-in, for we mayn't have such a chance again for many a day to come. And then, you know," added Tom, "it won't be like regular orchard-filching, because, you see, nobody's come yet to own the place; and there's not even a servant there to take care of it: and what's nobody's must be everybody's, and what's everybody's must be ours. And then," concluded our orator, in his most eloquent style—"and then, who is there will dare to prevent us from taking our own?—not even the Queen, nor the Lord Chancellor, nor the Lord Mayor of London, either!"

This wonderful little piece of sophistry had an amazing effect on the boys; and some of the most convinced were for taking the orchard by storm immediately after school. Then Tom, like a wise president, saw the necessity of checking the impetuosity of his council.

"Not so fast, my young friends, not so fast; there is no occasion for this terrific hurry. We must do our business discreetly, as becometh sage heroes. Suppose old Joe the constable were to take it into his head that we had no right to our share of the spoil, we might get into a jolly row, when there is no need for it. Now, I vote that we meet at the mill end of the common at seven o'clock sharp this evening. From there we will start for the orchard, and if we get back by eight o'clock, I think we shall have satisfied all reasonable stomachs."

Here the voice of one of the monitors was heard, calling them in under awful penalties, and Tom, descending from his throne, retreated into school and to his class, where he held a much less distinguished position.

I am sure that not one half of the boys could afterwards tell how they managed to scramble through their lessons. Metaphorically speaking, their heads were full of apples and pears, and consequently not over much room was left for the reception of Latin syntax or Greek verbs. But all things come to an end, even afternoon school, and mightier than usual were the shouts of joy that proclaimed to the world around St. Philip's that cramming and construing were over for one day at least.

Oh, happy Mr. Cherrybob! or rather Mr. Cherrybob, how happy you might feel, did you know how fervently the youthful hearts of St. Philip's blessed your departure! Already in the joy of anticipation have they voted you no end of "bricks," bricks enough—again metaphorically speaking—to build you as extensive a mansion as you would desire, in which to pass the rest of your years in peace! For now the school clock is banging out the hour of seven, and a knot of eager boys have assembled at the appointed spot on the common. Tom Fellowes is there, and during the last five minutes has been actively engaged in haranguing his tiny army.

"All right, then; as you've chosen me captain, I mean to have strict discipline, or I'll resign my commission. Now we must go quietly; not that we should sneak or skulk along though. Let's go four abreast: that's your style, comrades. Ready? Then—quick march!"

It was an unusual and lonely road down which they struck, and it was not the most direct way to Cherrybob Orchard. They did not anticipate meeting any one down there, and they were not a little surprised at seeing a tall figure come suddenly into view and then stop, as if waiting for them, close by the orchard. Tom called a halt; and they remained some moments in silence, peering at the unwelcome intruder. Then one of them exclaimed, "Ah, I know who it is; it's our football friend."

"So it is," echoed Tom. "Well, I don't believe he would harm us—he's much too jolly for that. Remember, how he begged leave to have a game with us, and what a splendid player he turned out too—sending the ball spinning leagues away at a touch. He's quite a stranger in the place, and I'm sure if we tell him all about it he won't be for spoiling our fun."

So Tom gave the word, and they marched on until they came up with the stranger, who greeted them with, "Good evening, gentlemen. Out on parade, I see; how do you style your regiment—'St. Philip's Own,' eh?"

"Oh, no, sir," replied Tom; "nothing of that kind. In fact—we don't mind telling you, sir—we're in for a jolly lark."

"A jolly lark, eh? And may I ask what kind of a bird this particular 'lark' is like?" inquired the stranger.

"Why, it's Cherrybob's orchard," answered Tom; "at least, you know, sir, it is not Cherrybob's orchard now, and that's just the fun, because," continued our young commander, in his most impressive style, "no one has come to live there at the house yet, and so, if it's nobody's in particular, it must be everybody's in general; and then, of course, no one has a right to say we fellows mayn't have a shy at it."

"In that case, certainly," said the stranger, "you have a perfect right to scour the whole orchard; but suppose that you are mistaken; suppose that some one does own the orchard, and has taken possession without your knowing it—what then, my boy?"

"Oh, I never thought of that," said thoughtless Tom. "Well, never mind, I don't care; we're not coming all the way here, and making all this great shine for nothing: in for a penny in for a pound!" concluded our dauntless sage, putting his hands in his pockets with an air of great determination. Then suddenly an idea struck him, and he asked, "What would you say, sir, to coming along with us?"

"Well, it is very kind of you to invite one whom you scarcely know; but I have no objection—besides, I may be of some service to you in your campaign, for I just happen to know the ins and outs of that particular orchard, stranger though I am. In fact, I don't mind confessing that I have taken some of the fruit myself, though under different circumstances. Now you must follow me wherever I go, and then you will have a better chance of safety."

"Very well, sir," answered all the boys, who were already beginning to feel alarmed, and had their doubts of the righteousness of their proceedings, but were determined not to be disappointed of their anticipated feast.

"You are all willing and determined to go," asked the stranger once more, "whoever owns the orchard?"

"Yes—yes, sir," was the hurried answer on all sides. "And we must be quick about it," added Tom, "or we shall not be back by eight o'clock."

"Stay," said one of the boys, "I for one will not go, for we don't know whose the orchard might be. I don't think it's quite right, after all."

"Oh, humbug!" was Tom's reply. "But if you do like to sneak away, I am sure you are quite welcome to do so. It's only a lark, after all."

"Lark or no lark, I think it's wrong to go, and I'll have none of it, and I'd advise you to think better of it."

"Your advice, Saint Jim," retorted Tom, "is worthy to be adopted only by your worthy self. If you are going, hook it, and lose your apples, that's all I have to say."

"Have the rest of you decided to go on?" the stranger asked, as Jim walked slowly up the road.

"Of course, we have," said the ready spokesman, and "of course" the echo came, though not very enthusiastically.

"Then follow me."

Easily said, but not so easily done. It appeared necessary to squeeze through a labyrinth of hedges of blackthorn, which pricked and scratched their hands and faces in most ruthless fashion, and made sad havoc with their jackets and trousers, and occasionally they found themselves almost hopelessly floundering in unlooked-for bogs; and many an "Oh!" and "Ah!" would have escaped the lips of the less plucky of the company, had it not been for the abject fear which was creeping over them, and a guilty consciousness that they had no right to complain. At last they were within the orchard, and were about to repay themselves handsomely for their toils and pains, when they espied coming towards them a man, evidently the gardener, who was bearing down upon them in such a manner (for they were all in a corner), that escape was all but impossible. Nevertheless, Tom made a scramble for it up the high wall, but missed his footing, and came heavily to the ground. Others were wildly following his example, when the stranger cried, in a voice of thunder, "Stop!"

They were at once transfixed to the spot, their eyes dilating upon their "football friend," who repeated the command, "Stop!" and nodded to the gardener to go away.

"Now, boys," said the stranger, "you are here at last, and very much you wish yourselves elsewhere, I have no doubt. I have not introduced myself to you before; however, I will do so now. I am the owner of this orchard."

All eyes opened very wide, and then dropped down to a study of sundry pairs of muddy boots.

"Now I hope you feel that if you got your deserts, you would all be soundly punished—there, don't be alarmed, I will not add anything to what you have already suffered in fear and scratches. And I also hope that in future you will not be afraid, when you want fruit, to ask for it, and not delude yourselves with convenient suppositions and arguments, which look very fair at a great distance, but which will not bear any close inspection. I trust this will be a lasting lesson to you; for, depend upon it, boys, the moment you get out of the right road, you can never know what bogs and thorns you may not get into and amongst. That is the way out; you may go now."

The crestfallen band needed no second bidding. Poor Tom, however, could scarcely move; he had sprained his ankle in the fall from the wall. He would not accept the invitation given him to rest in the house, but, leaning on the shoulder of one of them, limped off. It was an unpropitious thing for him, that failure, and that leaning and limping. The boys thought he was not such a hero, after all. From that time his sovereignty departed for ever, and was transferred to "Saint Jim," who the next day received the jolliest hamper-full of apples and pears, which he generously divided out to his schoolmates, amidst cheers for their "football friend." Jim forgave, but did not forget, poor Tom, who was confined within doors on account of his sprained ankle: he gave him a fair share of the fruit. Poor Tom! he was fairly overcome, and would on no account have been seen as he munched those apples, for the tears were rolling down his cheeks all the time—not because of the pain of his ankle; but because of the repentance of his heart.

THE WOLF

"Young Felix Guèroult was suddenly missing."—p. 227.

WOLF LEGRANGE.

BY WILLIAM DUTHIE, AUTHOR OF "A TRAMP'S WALLET," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"THE wolves, say you?" demanded Pierre Guèroult of his son Felix.

"I saw their track in the snow, father," answered Felix; "a pack of fifty, at least. They were making for the plain."

Pierre Guèroult took down his gun from its staples on the wall, and handled the lock mechanically. "Lucky that the cattle and sheep are well housed," said he. "We shall have to scare these marauding brutes away. Our neighbours would help us."

"Yes, father," answered Felix, cheerfully. "I met Mr. Atkinson on my road home, and he is only anxious to be on the hunt."

"Mr. Atkinson, eh—the new English settler?" queried the old farmer. "Was he alone?"

The young man hesitated a moment in his reply. "Yes—no, his daughter was with him."

"Ay, ay," assented the father. "Jessie, isn't that her name?"

Felix made no direct answer. "I think, father," he said, "it would be well to call our neighbours together to destroy these creatures before they do much mischief. Shall I saddle Cartouche, and be off at once?"

"Not alone, Felix. They are cunning thieves, and bold too, when they are hungry. I will go with you."

With these words the elder Guèroult made his way towards the stable, followed by his son.

It was bitterly cold. The winter of 1866 in Lower Canada, where our story takes us, was almost unexampled in its severity. The storms of snow had been like mountain avalanches in weight and bulk, but, unlike them, had been continuous. Vast sheets of water were frozen into apparently solid masses, and even the running streams were fringed by ridges of thick ice.

Père Guèroult, as the Sieur Guèroult was commonly called, was a descendant of the early French settlers, and owned a large tract of land in the district of Three Rivers. He had a faithful partner in his wife Annette. Sons and daughters had been born to them, of whom Felix was the eldest. The lands of the Sieur Pierre Guèroult lay close upon the frontiers of Lower and Upper Canada, where a tributary of the St. Lawrence, the Utawas, flowed from the mountains into the great river.

From the proximity of the division line between the two Canadas, the population was of mixed race; the French predominating on the Lower side. But there were many sturdy English settlers among the neighbours of Sieur Pierre Guèroult, and among them John Atkinson stood conspicuous. The French Canadian farmer called him the "new settler;" and, comparing John Atkinson's tenure of his land with that of the Guèroults, the term was sufficiently correct; but the Englishman had been in possession of his broad acres quite long enough to set an example of farming to the whole French community.

Any other man than John Atkinson, taking such a stand among foreign neighbours, would have created jealousy and dislike; but his manners were so genial, he was so ready to give help or information to others, that, so far from being regarded as an intruder and a troublesome teacher of new-fangled notions, he was welcomed on all hands as a valuable acquisition to the community. John Atkinson had a bustling, thrifty wife, two stalwart sons, and a daughter who was as much distinguished for her beauty as her father was noted for his sound knowledge and experience.

Père Guèroult and his son Felix were soon mounted. Wrapped in their loose, ample cloaks, they were well protected from the weather, and yet had their hands at liberty for action. They were both well armed. Felix whistled two wiry-haired dogs to accompany them, and father and son sallied forth, taking the direction of John Atkinson's farmhouse.

For a time the dull thud of their own horses' hoofs was the only sound which broke upon the dead stillness of the scene. The dazzling whiteness of the landscape almost blinded them. Presently, they heard shouts on their right, but at a considerable distance. Following the sound, and hallooing in reply, they soon came upon a party of three riders—John Atkinson, one of his sons, and a neighbour named Linwood.

"The wolves are out, Mr. Guèroult!" shouted Atkinson. "They have come upon us like a scourge from heaven."

"A scourge, indeed!" was the grave reply. "Have you tracked them?"

"We are close upon their trail. Look!" The Englishman pointed with his whip to a broad strip in the snow, where there were marks of many feet. With one accord the horsemen made this their path. They might have ridden for half an hour, during which time the most complete silence prevailed amongst them, when they were startled by the loud report of a rifle. The ground rose in front of them, forming a ridge, and the shot seemed to come from the other side. With a bound they dashed to the summit, just as a second report rang with a sharp, reverberating burst through the air.

A strange conflict met their sight. A single horseman stood battling with a score of wolves, who leaped, and yelled, and snapped their lean, hungry jaws around him, and already threatened to drag him from his seat.

"It is Antoine Legrange!" shouted Pierre Guèroult. "Forward!"

For an instant, the hungry herd of wolves hung upon their anticipated prey, biting and rending his garments to get at the flesh. Already one huge brute had his teeth in the neck of the rider. A blow from the hatchet of Felix Guèroult sent the creature howling on the ground; and the next moment the rest of the pack were scattered in every direction.

"You have had a narrow escape," cried John

Atkinson, riding up to the side of the rescued man. "Are you hurt?"

"Nothing to talk of," answered the other, panting nevertheless, and gathering his torn cloak about him. "The brutes were almost too many for me."

Pierre Guérout was right. It was Antoine Legrange, a French Canadian, and a neighbour: not one, however, whose acquaintance was courted. Legrange was of a reserved, churlish disposition; and even now, although he owed his life to the small band who had come so opportunely to his aid, he did not return their expressions of solicitude with a word of thanks. From the peculiar character of this man's face, and his sullen, boorish manners, it was not uncommon to call him "Wolf Legrange."

"You are bleeding, man!" exclaimed Atkinson. "Come with me; my house is the nearest."

Legrange, from whose neck there trickled a thin stream of blood, signified his assent by turning his horse's head in the direction of New Haven. This was the fanciful name given to his homestead by the English settler.

The arrival of a troop of six horsemen at the door of New Haven startled its inmates; but this was only a momentary surprise.

The occurrences of the last half hour were related in a few minutes, and the wounded man was under gentle treatment before the story was half told.

"That's right, Mary," Atkinson cheerfully exclaimed to his wife; "lint and ointment for the wound. Jessie, my lass, our friend has been in mortal peril to-day, and needs refreshment. We may thank God he is no worse."

Even the sour temper of Antoine Legrange softened under this hospitality, and he submitted himself to the management of his kind nurses with a few blunt words of gratitude. He must have been morose indeed if he could have remained insensible to the soft, pitying looks and gentle services of Jessie Atkinson; for Jessie was the type of a beautiful English girl—of middle height, well grown, fair as a lily, with a bright, sensitive flush on her cheeks, and eyes of a deep bluish grey.

"We must call our neighbours together, Mr. Atkinson," said Pierre Guérout, "and make a clean sweep of these wolves."

"More easily said than done, I fear; but I am one with you to try."

"They have scented blood already, and nothing will satisfy them but its taste."

"You are right, Mr. Guérout," Atkinson rejoined. "Yet even these brutes have some purpose on the earth: They are God's creatures, and must be dealt with accordingly."

Young Atkinson, a stalwart but awkward youth, here ventured to speak.

"Whatever we do, father, must be done at once—before Christmas."

"That we may eat our beef and pudding in peace—eh, lad!" laughed his father. "Not a bad idea."

Then turning to his daughter, "Jessie," he asked, "when's Christmas Day?"

Jessie turned a bright, merry face towards the group, as she answered, "Don't you know, father? To-morrow is Christmas Eve."

"That is true," added the Sieur Guérout, gravely; "to-morrow is the veille de Noël."

"Then we must have our wolf-hunt in the morning," said Atkinson, in a decisive tone. "The best thing we can do will be to ride round, and summon all friends to the work."

With one accord the men prepared to depart on this errand.

"Remember," interposed Legrange, "I am one with you in the hunt."

"Better stay at home," said Atkinson, kindly. "You need rest and care, neighbour. You have escaped a great danger."

"Not I," answered Legrange, making an effort to rise. "I must have my revenge on these brutes. They have not set their fangs in me for nothing."

John Atkinson shrugged his shoulders. "Perhaps it was meant as a warning, neighbour. One should not tempt God's providence."

Legrange, with an oath, reiterated his determination.

The men were soon mounted, and ready for their errand. Strangely enough, young Felix Guérout was suddenly missing. His small, rough-haired, but sturdy pony stood waiting by the door; but where was the rider?

Jessie Atkinson could tell that best. Felix and Jessie stood side by side, hand clasped in hand, whispering tender farewells in the ante-room. They had long felt secretly drawn towards each other, but something had happened that day which had set the seal upon their love, and made its utterance irresistible.

A little while, and with a flushed face Felix appeared at the outer door, and lightly vaulted into the saddle.

(To be concluded in our next.)

USING THE WORLD.

"Use this world, as not abusing it."—1 Cor. vii. 31.

THE children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." The profession of the children of light is good, but the practice is often bad, as the above sentiment shows; and the case stands very much in need of a radical reform, before their walk and conversation will have much effect for good on the children of the world. The worldly man's treasure is in the things of earth, and he shows his wisdom in making the most of it while he can. But too many of those who profess to have their treasure in heaven, to all appearance neglect it, and follow as keenly after the world as the other. I wonder if the reason is, that they consider their treasure so secure that they need not trouble themselves further about it, but, with the burden off their minds, can pursue, with all their energy, and without distraction, the things of the world, and with all the greater zest that, if these fail, or their time come to a close, they have the other to fall back upon? Such, however unnatural, may be the reason; but the heart is generally where the treasure is, and it is to be feared that the indifference bred by worldliness is the reason.

But although we are to take no thought for the morrow, or what we shall eat and drink, and wherewithal we shall be clothed, there is an abuse of the principle by those who think they ought to be so fervent in spirit that they are in danger of being slothful in business. They are fain to look on the things of this world as so utterly worthless, that not to enjoy them is a duty, ay, that it is almost a sin not to despise them. They think of the birds of the air and the flowers of the field, which God feeds and clothes without any care of their own, and literally overlearn the lesson, till they reach the extreme opposite of the man who said to his soul—"Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry; thou hast much goods laid up for many years," when that same night his soul was to be required of him.

In one place the Word of God enjoins us not to be concerned about the future, and in another eloquently speaks the praise of forethought and industry, and the consequent blessings of prosperity. Passages of both kinds taken together seem to ask the question—"Is it possible to make the most of both worlds?" and reason and revelation both tell us that most assuredly it is at least possible to make the best of them. Man is furnished with capacities for enjoying both. He is both body and spirit, and the animal or earthly part must find its enjoyment in, and be filled with, earthly things—nothing else will fill it.

There are desires in our nature to which the things of earth give sustenance, delight, and satisfaction. The philosopher must come down from his soaring flights of soul and take his dinner, and very likely enjoys the one as much as the other. And why not? "Every creature of God is good, and to be received with thanksgiving." All are the gifts of a kind Father; let us take them thankfully, and seek his blessing on the rich abundance and variety of creature comforts he has given us.

I once heard a lecture, part of which was to the effect that Christians ought to strive after such fervour of spirit, and communion with things above, that they would go about their worldly business as a hard necessity, feeling it distasteful, and long to get back again to devotion and holy contemplation. Now, if it was meant as a figure of speech, to give an idea of the supreme importance of spiritual things, in comparison with which the earthly are as nothing, it was quite right; but, taken literally, that would not be the best or most useful Christian for any world that was not altogether inhabited by saints. In our world, as things go at present, such a character would not do very well for practical purposes; for worldly wisdom is needed as much as any other: the wisdom of the serpent is as necessary as the harmlessness of the dove.

Our daily business in the world, whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, is part of the religious life, if done heartily as unto the Lord. These things, our earthly concerns, if pursued in a proper spirit, are not adverse but helpful to the life of the soul, for they are then one continued service of God. They are not hurtful, unless we let them degenerate into what the apostle calls "earthly, sensual, devilish." We cannot, as a matter of fact, walk with our eyes always fixed on the heavens, without stumbling and falling over the stones and clods of earth—we must look around as well as upward: and "diligence in business," if kept in its proper place, strengthens and intensifies the vigour of body and mind, and helps and fits us to follow the higher aim of existence with increased relish; for the habit is imported into whatever service we are engaged in, and whatever our hand finds to do, we do it with our might.

Diligence in business is altogether distinct from the mania of business which one sometimes sees eating up the body and soul of its victim. Industry is a great virtue, but when it goes over the cords, and becomes what is commonly called "keenness," it is a vice, and is fairly started on the highway to avarice. Business is not kept in its proper place if it is made the sole end of life. As a very pleasant writer says, to be done properly it must be done, "not as an end, but as a means." The following extract is so true and so beautiful that I make no apology for quoting it: "Business is too often regarded as the hindrance to the spiritual life. I regard it as amongst the finest means the world affords for strengthening and causing to grow this inner real life. For every deed may be done according to the fashion of the outward, perishing life; or it may be done after the fashion of the inward, endless life—done righteously, done nobly, done, upon occasion, magnificently—ever regarded as something to be put under the feet of a spiritual man to lift him to the height of his high calling. Making business a means to such an end, it will help us to remember that this world and the fashion of it passeth away; but that every deed done as Jesus would have done it, lifts the man who so does it up towards the bosom of Him who created business and all its complications, as well as our brains and hands that have to deal with them."

I have known men who were as forward and farseeing in professional enterprise, as skilful and clear-headed in their various avocations, as most men, and who found enjoyment and satisfaction in thus exercising their talents; who were yet humble, earnest, and useful God-fearing men; watching, waiting, and working, sharply, patiently, and energetically; none the worse or inferior, but rather the better and superior type of Christians for their tussle with the world. Along with the light and guidance of God's Word, to those who are not hearers only, but doers, contact with varieties of character met with in our daily occupations, together with the rubbing and furbishing of the strife of ideas, and theories, and speculations, and clashing of opinions, with differences of practice and diversity of wants among our fellows—these widen our sympathies, and give a practical wisdom, and readiness, and tact which must help more or less in strong and useful development of the inner life.

Some of the foregoing remarks may appear as if the writer feared, or at least half believed, that people in general were too apt to neglect the world for the pursuit of heavenly things; but, God help us poor muckworms, it is all too much the other way. The great desideratum is, not the absence of such neglect, but of a converse eagerness after more substantial and enduring good. Men are more ready to abuse the world than to use it only. Like children, they do not well know how much to take of it. They try to get out of it what is not in it—to satisfy their nature with it. Then the hunger of the soul breeds discontent; for the thousand blessings which Providence gives to fill earthly want leave the soul utterly empty; and discontent, instead of leading the man to seek another source of supply, generally drives him to cram heavier doses of the world, its wealth, or fame, or pleasure. The devil is the great quack doctor of the soul, and his pills and potions are always such as the man's heart likes, sugar-coated, and good for keeping a fair skin on the outside, and making believe that there is no dangerous disease in the blood. The too, too common practice is to stifle as much as possible the spirit's aspirations, or, if that cannot easily be done, to feed it on garbage, which, however unsatisfying, gives it a distaste for anything better; and the devil's trio, "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," give ample scope for such exercise, but not one jot of satisfaction in the end.

Then, if we are to "use the world, as not abusing it," we must enter it with firm and intelligent Christian principle; with a living belief in the excellence of the life that now is, and the momentous bearing it has on that which is to come—such a belief as will enable us, in the sight of the Omniscient, to do all with an eye to his glory, and prepare us for the hereafter, by conforming our lives to that of our perfect Example, by looking to him for righteousness, and putting on "the whole armour of God," that we may be able to stand. The transfusion of his living Spirit into ours, will work such a likeness of character, such a readiness to receive all the good we can find in the world as a gift from him, and such a test to reject all the evil, as shall enable us to walk through life, safe in our Father's care, living, moving, and having our being in him; so that we do not need to leave our work in order to go and seek him, for he is with us there; and we serve him amid the multiplicity of our duties, as well as in our worship. Though the two kinds of service can never take the place of each other, as some would like to believe, when they follow the world too hard to have much time, or inclination for their devotions; or when they go on the Sunday to the fields, to "follow nature up to nature's God," instead of to his house to worship in company with his people. If we neglect the worship of God "in spirit and in truth," we are not very likely to do our usual work in the spirit that makes it his service; but by performing both services in such a manner that they mutually stimulate and help each other, we are in the way of being more useful members of society, and Christians of a fuller stature than we could otherwise be.

Yet, even the necessary duties of life have a tendency to fill the mind to the exclusion and neglect of things eternal, especially as they so often lead us into scenes and circumstances unfavourable to growth in grace. Our Saviour himself tells us what to do then, as well as at all times: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Avoid as much as possible what you find to be injurious; and for an antidote seek closer communion with God. The daily duties of life, and the natural enjoyment of earthly things, are not in themselves evil, but good; it is the associations and practices of men in the one, and intemperance in the other, that make the evil. It is the over-anxiety with regard to the morrow, as if the reign of Providence were coming to an end to-day; it is the slavish indulgence in luxurious habits, often descending into vicious ones, making the world's good extend so largely that it lessens and clouds away "the inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," and creates a desire that the fashion of this world would never pass away.

Speaking of luxurious habits, reminds me that the luxuries and amusements in which a Christian may indulge have often been subjects of discussion. I think that with regard to these no very close rule can be laid down. Some of those commonly indulged in are perhaps harmless in themselves, but the associations connected with them undoubtedly give them a downward tendency in many cases, and the sooner they are put out of the category the better. For the rest, how often and how far one may indulge, after studying his Bible well, "let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind;" for that which is beneficial to one is sometimes hurtful to another. And this makes another limitation: a thing may be lawful for me, but not expedient; for there are circumstances, as St. Paul says, in which it is wrong to gratify ourselves, even in what we know would be beneficial, for fear of setting a stumbling-block in the way of a weaker brother. With amusements, a good test, so far as we ourselves are concerned, is this: if after indulgence we find our spiritual life as strong and bright as before, then indulge; if it is not, then abstain.

If we abuse the world, it will have its revenge before it has done with us; our sin will find us out. But the more we can get of it the better, if we put it to a right use. And the right using of it will beget the habit of estimating it at its true value, and teach us to lean lightly to it, because the fashion of it passeth away, and, with the weight of an eternity coming upon our hands, is worthy of but a little of our lowest regard and solicitude. Yet the same Bible which teaches to take no thought for the morrow, says also, "He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand." Let not any one, then, view these lesser things with a feeling akin to contempt for their littleness and evanescence, but glorify God by bringing all the talent he can to bear upon them, doing them well, not as unto men, or himself, but unto God; and then, under God's blessing, his diligence will be in the fairest way of being rewarded with success, and the earthly comfort of himself and others augmented.

We may rest assured that, if, like the fowls, we sow not, nor reap, nor gather into barns; and if, like the lilies, we toil not nor spin, notwithstanding our trust in Providence, we shall starve and go naked. The principle which Christ taught is, to cast our care on God, and trust his providence while doing what we can—trusting, as if we had nothing to do ourselves; working, as if it all depended on ourselves. A Christian merchant may—nay, it is his duty to use foresight and prudence, and make a bargain honestly to the best advantage. It is the duty of a Christian tradesman to do his business to the best of his ability. A Christian who acts up to his profession is the highest type of a man, and he ought to be an example of uprightness and industry to his neighbours.

Use the world, use it well, and enjoy it. "Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present evil world." Hold the truth in love. Have manly principle, that will not swerve a hair's breadth right or left from what you believe to be right, nor follow one step what you think even doubtful, in practice or theory, though all the world should cry after it.

Use the world, use it well, and enjoy it. It is only the God-fearing man that can truly enjoy the world. "The meek shall inherit the earth"—that is, all that is really valuable in it. They shall "eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart;" they "shall not be afraid of evil tidings," for their "heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord." "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace." He, and he alone, can truly rejoice in the labour of his hands, and find the world's good in the using of it. For Christianity is neither asceticism, nor a system of effeminate or maudlin sentiment, that weakens the freshness of life, and renders tasteless the enjoyments of earth. It is a living impulse, whose effect is to quicken with fuller life all the springs of action, and give zest and relish to every good the world can bestow; because it renders powerless—or ought to render, if its professors would only give it the chance—the fear of death and the uncertainty of earthly things, teaching that these are all the good gifts of a loving Father, and to be valued accordingly, and are also an earnest of the better things that shall be our portion when these shall have passed away.

The joy of the worshippers of mammon, and the world's pleasure and applause, is but like "the crackling of thorns under a pot"—plenty of noise, and smoke, and flame, for a moment, and then—ashes! The words of “the Preacher,” when he calls life “a sore evil,” and speaks of the labours and delights of the earth as “vanity of vanities,” have been echoed by the hearts of men in every age, when they set the world before them as their supreme good, and seek satisfaction from it. Satisfaction it cannot give, except to the lowest part of our nature; and those who have no higher aim, must just go sorrowing and sighing over the bitter disappointment that poisons even the good they can find. But when the hope of a blessed immortality fills and lifts up the soul, it sweetens all the enjoyments of earth. It is only the Christian who can sing of his earthly pilgrimage, “The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.” J. H.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—IV:

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

HERE are many cases brought to our notice,” continued Sydney Welworth, “which, though sad and distressing enough, are quite hopeless, and far beyond the reach of the temporary assistance which is the main object and intention of our society to offer. For instance, a man with his wife and family may be starving, from their own faults of wilful idleness, drink, and reckless improvidence, and if you were to give them a pound a-week, they would be no better off when that was discontinued than they were before; they must go to the workhouse sooner or later, and it will be all the better for the little children, at any rate, when they do; though in such a case I should probably give them an order for a little firing for that night, and a meal for the hungry children: but no more can be done.

“But where it is from no fault of their own that they are out of work, and consequently have no means of buying food for themselves and children, as in such severe weather as at present, when all building, digging, and all work on the river is stopped entirely by the snow and frost, this is the time for real help with orders for soup, and coal, and blankets, and everything else to keep body and soul, and, what the more respectable ones really think almost as much of, their little homes together; that is, their few articles of furniture from the pawnbroker’s, which, if once carried there, are seldom, if ever, brought back again. Support in these cases for a fortnight or three weeks, will often see them through their troubles, and set them going again.

arm or leg; then one feels that, by providing warm clothing, good food, including meat and soup, and bringing him back as soon as possible to his health and strength, and making him fit for work, upon which himself, his wife, and half-a-dozen little ones are depending, five, seven, or ten shillings a-week is well bestowed, not in money but in kind, for the month or, perhaps, six or seven weeks while the pressure lasts: for that poor fellow, unless he has the funds of some benefit club or union to fall back upon, which in the very poorest class few can afford, has no hope of any help.

“Should he send to ask or claim relief from the board, he will be told by the overseer—and not unreasonably so—that he must come into the workhouse; and before he can do that, everything he possesses in the world must be first parted with; his bed and bedstead, chairs and table, and, perhaps, old-fashioned chest of drawers, his wife’s clock and bits of crockery, which very likely have taken the scanty savings of many years to purchase, must all go. He will be separated from his wife and children, and, in short, his family broken up, with scarcely a hope or chance of ever being reunited.”

“But,” said Archie Scott, “if you don’t give them the money to buy the necessaries you mention, I do not understand how you manage it, for I suppose you do not take them round the loaves of bread, and the tea, and meat, and all the rest of the things they are in want of; and when they have got your money, I do not see how you can depend upon their spending it in the way you intend them to do.”

“Against giving money,” answered Sydney, “we have a strict rule, which, of course, like all others, has its exceptions, as in the case of an actual immediate necessity for a bed, or a blanket; or, as sometimes occurs, in redeeming their necessary articles of clothing, or tools for working, from the pawnbroker’s, which may be done occasionally, with due discrimination, when it may be the means of their obtaining work for the support of their family—if it can be ascertained, on full inquiry, that the pressure under which those articles have been pledged, or, as their own delicate term usually is, “put away,” has been from illness, or actual want of food, or some other bond fide distress, and not, as it too often is, a craving for drink, even in these cases, I scarcely ever should trust them with the money; but go to the second-hand shop, or even take the tickets to the pawnbroker’s myself.

“The latter proceeding is not agreeable, and but very seldom to be considered advisable, though we have had one or two, if not more instances, where within a few weeks of being thus set on his legs again, and enabled to work at his trade, which he would not otherwise have been able to undertake, for want of proper tools, the poor and honest mechanic has actually proved his gratitude by coming to offer his guinea, not as repayment—for that is never asked for—but as his voluntary subscription to the funds of the society.”

“I suppose you didn’t accept it from the poor beggar, did you? though he deserved some credit, I will say, for his honesty in offering it.”

“Indeed we did,” replied Sydney, warmly, “and would not for a moment have thought of wounding his feelings, as I am sure we should have done, by refusing it.

“But I was going to tell you how we manage our relief, without giving them the money. We have always with us printed tickets, or orders for bread, groceries, or fuel, which they have to take to some respectable general shop, or coal-store in the neighbourhood, where an arrangement has been made, and whose accounts are settled, on the production of these vouchers, every fortnight, or month, as may have been agreed upon. That system works well enough, as long as you can place reliance upon your tradespeople; but it is as well to keep a certain watch upon them, to prevent their complying with what I believe they are sometimes requested to do; I mean, instead of letting the bearers have the full value of the order in kind, to pay them a less sum in ready money, which in that case is pretty certain to go straight to the gin-shop.”

“Well, it is as well to know that, for, if you had not told me, I should certainly have given them the money, as being less trouble to oneself, and also thinking that they would have known how to make it go further in useful things than we do.”

“Ah,” said Sydney, “you have no conception what the temptation of a little extra ready money is to many of quite the poorest classes. Even with some who may have been sober for months together, the possession of an unexpected half-crown, or a few shillings (unlike that for which they have had to work hard, and having thus reckoned upon, already settled in anticipation how they shall lay out to the last halfpenny, if, indeed, it has not already been spent beforehand,) is more than many of them can resist; besides, they suppose it to be a mark of gratitude to drink the health of their friend and benefactor in, at least, some portion of his bounty.

“Not very long ago there was an ardent young philanthropist, who took it into his head to commence a course of charitable visitation on his own hook, and did no end of mischief in one of the poorest and lowest parts of my district. He found his way down into a court entirely occupied by a colony of the wildest Irish, and there was much shocked to come upon a family of nine, all living together in one small, miserable back cellar, a father, mother, and her sister, and six children of different ages, who, as I could have told him, all lived entirely by street begging. There had been a party there a few evenings before, and the consequence was, there was not a single whole pane of glass in the window, or a vestige of furniture left, either in the shape of bed, bedding, table, chair, or any other article, except a broken orange-box, on which the mother of the family was sitting, two cracked marmalade-pots, and an old iron saucepan without a handle, in which they did their cooking. How they contrived thus to live at all, or to pay their two shillings a week rent, which they must do, is quite marvellous, as all they have to depend upon is what is begged for by the women and children in their different beats all over London, while the head of the family himself enjoys his leisure, leaning against his favourite post at the top of the court, where he and four or five others of his intimate friends, spend the greater part of their day in pleasant fellowship, talking over their affairs, general and domestic, while they share their one pipe, passed round sociably from one to the other in regular turn.

“My young friend Verdant, as I will call him, was so horrified at the utter destitution found at this first place into which he had been led by his good heart, and the youngest but one of the interesting infant mendicants, that he instantly presented them with a five-pound note, desiring the mother to go out at once and buy her family proper bedding, and all the other necessities of life. The consequence of which lavish munificence was, that through all the eight houses or hovels of which that court consists, neither man, woman, nor child was sober for more than a week. I myself was offered a marmalade-jar full of whisky, upon happening to go down that same court in search of a poor widow charwoman, who had been strongly recommended to me by a most conscientious and precise lady visitor, as highly deserving some special assistance and encouragement.

"It was so far fortunate for me that it was only early in the next day after my young friend's visit, while the orgy was scarcely in its height, and before the general fighting part of the proceedings had yet begun; but I am sorry to have to record that the widow, who was the particular object of my visit into those precincts, was as far gone as any of the company, and as tipsy as Cloe, in spite of her high character and recommendations."

TRUTH.

THESE patient stars, which do allow each cloud,

However light, their glory to eclipse,
Are truths eterne, which every babbler loud

And vain may hide with his unlearnèd lips.
The ocean, with her hundred navies ploughed,
Bears little note of those imperious ships,

Though here and there the hapless mast and shroud
Mark the sad gulf where half a kingdom slips;
They are not touched by little deeds of men,
They do not blur with his deceiving breath,
Which forms o'er him the mist of life, and then
Parts, and he sees the purer skies of death.
Time as a veil God o'er himself hath thrown,
But we shall know at last as we are known. J. S. W.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

DEALING WITH WOMEN.

HERE was a certain revulsion of feeling in the heart of Margery Oglvie, when she came to believe that her distrust of Horace had been unjust. She, at least, had no faith in instincts, except in such as were wholly evil; as, indeed, were all the natural propensities of man, according to her belief. When the wet and woe-begone figure of her poor brother had fled past her into the house, she had been ready to accuse the captain of the mischief that had been done, whatever its nature or extent might be. She had no means of knowing that her brother had been exposed to danger; but she could see that he had suffered violence, and against the inflictor of that violence her heart had been hot. She had already sent the poor creature to bed when the other two arrived, and it fell to Captain Oglvie to relate to her what had happened; for Peggy had suddenly fallen into her arms, sobbed out a few incoherent words, and hurried off to her own room.

To do him justice, Horace Oglvie had related the simple truth of the story, as far as others were concerned; his own part in it had been more passive than active. But at length Margery, noticing his dripping garments, had exclaimed, "Why, you have been in the water too!" and he had owned, with seeming reluctance, that he had helped to drag Sir Alexander out of the river.

Afterwards, Peggy had said the same thing in nearly the same words, and had made so little mention of David Haldane, that Margery had very naturally come to the conclusion that Horace Oglvie had taken an active part in rescuing his witless cousin from self-destruction.

Peggy had not been able to come down again that evening. Margery was engaged in nursing her brother, and Captain Oglvie had had the long, dismal dining-room all to himself. There he had been so wretchedly uncomfortable—"the whole thing," he had said to himself, "was so nightmarish"—that he had better get away as fast as possible. But his jealousy had been roused, and it was a much keener incentive to pursuit than the still somewhat distant prospect of the Oglvie inheritance. It was not vulgar avarice that filled his heart with its selfish craving to enter into other people's possessions; it was desire for the good things of the world, for freedom and ease, and more or less refined enjoyment. Peggy, penniless, had been one of the good things beyond his reach; Peggy, with a fortune, was something to be won. But Peggy with a fortune, nearly won, and about to be lost, and to slip into another man's hands, was something to be secured at all hazards. He resolved, therefore, to give her no chance of escape. The mouse was not to be allowed to play any longer.

Margery was present when they met at breakfast on the morrow. Horace Oglvie put on the air of an injured man; he could see at a glance that Peggy was very ill at ease. There was little said on the subject of yesterday's event, especially as its issue was doubtful. Poor Sir Alexander was alarmingly ill. The shock and chill had fevered the sickly frame, and it seemed already more than likely that the river might prove fatal to him after all.

There were three letters that morning—two for Captain Oglvie and one for Miss Oglvie. Concerning the latter there rose a little dispute as to who it was intended for; but Peggy, declaring that she had no correspondents in Bleaktown—nor, for that matter, anywhere else, handed it over to the elder lady.

"This is for you, not for me," said Margery, at last, handing it back again; not, however, till she had made herself acquainted with its contents.

It was the notification from the lawyer that Delaube had passed into other hands, and must be vacated forthwith.

"What does it mean?" said Peggy, in painful bewilderment.

"May I see the letter?" asked the captain, laying aside his injured tone.

She put it into his hands. "Can it be true?" she said, when he raised his head from the perusal of it.

"I see no reason to doubt it," he answered.

"But I am sure my grandfather did not know."

"He must have forgotten," said the captain.

She folded her hands, and sat for a few minutes quite motionless, looking straight before her into vacancy. She was realising her new position of homelessness and dependence. "It is very hard to bear," she murmured.

"There are harder things to be borne," said Margery, in an unsympathising tone, which had the effect of checking the coming tears. But the hardness of the tone came not so much from want of sympathy as from the keenness with which the speaker felt the truth she told herself: that the girl did not like the thought of dependence upon her. It is never hard to be dependent on those we love.

"If you only knew how I love the place," Peggy said, in appeal. "I have been so very happy there!"

"I don't see what there was to make you happy," answered Margery. She would have added, had she uttered all her mind, "You ought much rather to have been miserable."

And neither could Peggy see any ground for happiness at that moment, for the gladness had been all her own, except what had come with the sunshine, and the breezes, and the birds.

What was to be done was the next consideration; and Horace Oglivie had proposed, and Margery had seconded the proposal, that he should go into Bleaktown and call upon the lawyer that very day, when a gentleman wishing to see Captain Oglivie on business was announced.

One of the captain's letters that morning was from his mother; the other missive was of a much less pleasant nature: it was a request that he should take up a little bill, which he had intended to renew, and which ran its course at the end of the current month. At that moment he had no more money in hand than would suffice to meet his expenses—the bare necessary expenses of his gentlemanly existence.

A gentleman waiting to see him on business! the gallant captain's heart sank within him. He had no business on earth, save the getting and spending of money, and as he had none to get, he concluded that the business related to that which had been spent, which is generally an unpleasant business. In a word, he feared that one of his creditors had come down upon him, through an agent in that part of the country. The thought flashed into his mind, as he once more read the reminder about his bill, that he might make a clean breast of it, and get Margery to assist him. "She is not so hard as she looks," was his reflection, as he rose and went to meet the stranger, who had been shown into the drawing-room, and awaited him there.

The clerk sent down by Mr. Haldane's agent had not expected any difficulty in executing the task assigned to him. He had not anticipated having to take possession by main force, and he was therefore not prepared for the rather rude reception accorded to him by Jean. He had been about to go to Mr. Haldane to complain of the obstruction, when he thought that perhaps, after all, it was only the ignorant opposition of a servant, and that he would find the mistress more reasonable; so he had spent the afternoon in enjoying himself in the neighbourhood, and the evening in enjoying himself at the inn; and in the course of these proceedings he had learned that Miss Oglivie might be considered a minor, and that a male relation was at present staying at the Forest House, under the same roof with her. To him, therefore he resolved to go, "For," he said to himself, "it's no use dealing with women."

This was the gentleman who had waited upon Captain Oglivie, and who certainly found him much easier to deal with than honest Jean. The captain was, in fact, particularly gracious, as soon as his apprehensions as to the character of the visitor were removed. He assured him that Miss Oglivie was not in the least responsible for the reception he had met with; that no obstruction whatever should be offered to him; but that it would be necessary, on Miss Oglivie's behalf, to examine the papers connected with the transaction, of which the family of Gilbert Oglivie had remained in ignorance. The result of the conference, therefore, was that Captain Oglivie promised to come into town and examine the papers, and to come armed with the necessary authority to settle the matter. With this the emissary was obliged to content himself.

"May I know who is the purchaser of the property?" said the captain, as his visitor was about to depart.

"It is not with him you have to deal," was the answer; "but, under the circumstances, perhaps, I had better tell you. It is Mr. Haldane, of the print-works here; a highly respectable man. You will find it is all right, sir, unless"—he hesitated—"unless you have any suspicion of forgery."

The captain only smiled, and said, "I have no suspicion whatever," and bowed the man politely from the room.

Then he returned to the two ladies, and repeated to them the substance of his interview; at the same time expressing a hope that he might be allowed to take the affair into his own hands, and save Miss Oglivie all trouble and anxiety in it.

"Certainly, it is very kind of you," said Margery, answering for Peggy.

"It is very kind of you," echoed the latter, not knowing what else to say.

So Captain Oglivie took Peggy's affairs into his own hands, that the gentlemen concerned might not be driven to their wits' end, dealing with women.

"I wouldn't wonder if he had forged his father's name," said Margery, when Peggy had gone out of the room. She was going over to Delaube, without loss of time, to prepare herself, as well as her old servants, for the worst.

"Who? her father!" said Horace Oglivie. It was the second time the idea of forgery had been mooted to him. "It is very unpleasant," he added; "but if it were so, I don't suppose we could do anything."

"Nothing," she replied.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

UNDERSTANDING IT ALL.

THE Grants were coming home with flying colours. There was no need for them to remain and read after the session closed this year. They had really worked hard, for the first time in their lives, and it didn't seem to agree with them. They were longer and lankier than ever; they were somewhat pale too, and had lost the last vestige of their boyhood. They were carefully-attired young men, who evidently visited the barber, and paid some little attention to the tailor.

It was a lovely April day, and no one could be induced to go inside the coach, on the pretty bit of road between Bleaktown and Strathie. Everybody insisted on a seat on the roof. Three jovial old gentlemen, of whom the fattest was placed in the middle, because of his tendency to somnolency; a newly-married pair, distinctly recognisable, but who thought it quite marvellous that the jovial old gentlemen should know all about it, and begin to poke the mildest of fun at them, in the matter of sitting together—these and various units of society, climbed to their seats. Among them Archie and Sandie Grant. Sandie had an outside seat on the box, and Archie had one immediately behind him, with an air-cushion for his feet, he said, as his long legs, as much in the way as ever, dangled over the side of the coach. It was a capital place for him, for it allowed him to pour an uninterrupted stream of nonsense into his brother's ear. He had nicknamed the fat old gentleman "Centre of Gravity:" unfortunately, he was on the top of the coach, instead of at the bottom of it, where he ought to have been.

They had rolled along, top-heavy as they were, till the Grants were getting near the end of their journey. There was no Peggy to hail them this time from the little hill. Their mother had duly kept them informed of all the doings at Delaube, therefore, they knew that she would not be there to meet them; but they were looking none the less eagerly for some familiar sight or scene, at every turn of the road. It was a very rough road, with many ups and downs—a bank here and a brae there; near the bed of the river strewn with great stones, and on its higher levels, with blocks of granite showing their teeth through the sod.

They were passing a comparatively easy bit, and getting quickly over the ground. The coachman was choking, somewhere under his huge cravat, at Archie as he rattled on behind his ear. Suddenly the leader stumbled and started aside, and the heavy coach gave a great lurch over to the left. It righted again in an instant, but not till three of the passengers found themselves standing, and one found himself sitting, on the turf at the side of the road, regarding the world around them with wonderfully scared faces.

The young bride was in her husband's arms, not very sure whether she would like to laugh or to cry, and the fat old gentleman was seated on his right-hand crony's knee, who, being a very small man, was nearly-annihilated under the burden.

At the moment when the coach lurched, the four who occupied the outside seats on the left, had, as by one impulse, leapt clean off their seats; while the next row had instinctively thrown themselves towards the right side, and thus the coach had been saved from a disastrous overturn.

At length the three who stood on their feet unhurt fell to laughing, and then the little bride laughed, and then everybody else laughed. And Sandie Grant, who had looked very rueful, sitting on the ground, got upon his feet and laughed too, though it cost him an effort to do so. Then they all got up into their places, and began congratulating themselves and each other that there had been no harm done. The jovial old gentlemen declared it was a pity that it had not taken place at the beginning of the journey, they had all become so sociable from being well shaken together.

"You're not hurt, old fellow?" said Archie to his brother, who had not recovered his spirits like the rest of the party. Sandie declared he was not hurt, only bruised a little by his fall; for he had not fallen on his feet, as the others had done.

Then the coach stopped to set the brothers down, and they shook hands all round; and there were the servants waiting to carry up the boxes, and Dr. and Mrs. Grant coming down from their post of observation in the garden, where they had caught a first glimpse of them. And the coach rolled away and left them standing together. The servants moved on before, but the little household found themselves standing still. Poor Sandie had at last given in, acknowledging that he was in horrible pain, and unable to move a step without assistance.

Between his father and Archie he was almost carried up the short brae to the house, Archie telling, on the way, how the thing had happened, and how innocent up to that moment, it had appeared.

The little bruise turned out to be a serious dislo-cation. Sandie had been an instant longer in taking the leap—an instant later in getting the general impulse into his slower brain, and, consequently, he had come down heavily. The doctor was called in, and poor Sandie found himself confined to an invalid's couch, and sentenced to weeks, if not months, of inaction.

Sandie, always slow and thoughtful, had time now to become slower and more thoughtful still. After the first pain was passed, it may be questioned whether he did not enjoy his invalid condition. There had come to him that deep, patient, sustained thirst for truth that nothing can slake or satisfy—that never is satisfied on this side the grave; a thirst which finds the forms of sound words, out of which other souls get sustenance and refreshment, as broken cisterns which can hold no water. Thus, in his illness, there came to him thoughts which he could not communicate even to his brother, who had hitherto shared his whole life, and for the simple reason that he had not put them into words even to himself.

As for Archie, if the accident had happened to himself it would hardly have sobered him so much as it had done. In the course of a week he grew quite worn with watching by his brother, day and night, and the whole house missed his fun and frolic.

In his own way Archie was unsettled too. He had shared the same influences as his brother, and, both being destined for the sacred calling, these influences were, naturally, religious. But unlike his brother, all that he wanted was a faith that would work. He was not of a speculative turn. The faith of the many would be enough for him, so long as it was real, and truly moved their hearts.

"You'll be going to the kirk to-morrow," said Sandie. It was their second Sunday at home, the first having been the day after their arrival. "I can stay by myself now."

"I don't want to go," Archie answered.

"But father will be vexed if you don't. He spoke about your taking notes of the sermon," rejoined his brother. Archie pulled a long face.

"I could do that just as well at home," he muttered; "and when they're written already, what's the good?"

It had come to be to Archie, as it is to every soul in which is the breath of life, simply intolerable to do that which there could be no manner of use in doing. It made him feel like a prisoner who has to turn a crank to fetch up empty buckets. It was something worse than intolerable to him, to listen to his father's sermons in his present state of feeling, in which he knew that they were no longer serving, even as bodily discipline—it was positively hurtful. Loving his father as he did, Archie was in despair about this matter.

"I want desperately to go over and hear Mr. Keith again," Archie continued, after a while.

"I wish you would," said Sandie, unconscious of the struggle.

"Do you think he would feel it though?"

"Who—father? Well, I don't know; I didn't think of that. Half the parish is going, you see; even Tam Lane has taken to the kirk under Mr. Keith."

"And he drinks worse than ever," put in Archie; "maybe he drinks to drown ill thoughts."

"If you fall in with Peggy," said his brother, "I wish you would ask her to come and see a fellow."

"She's a great lady now, mind," was the answer, "and mayn't care to come our way so often."

"It won't make a bit of difference in her," said Sandie, impatiently. "I'm sure ye ken that. I would like to see her. And, Archie, you understand, that was all nonsense."

Archie understood the that to refer to their last year's love, and he laughed. They were still at an age when they could afford to laugh at love, though life had grown more serious to them than it used to be.

On Sunday morning, Archie settled the matter with his father, for that day at least. "Are you going to the kirk to-day?" Dr. Grant had said. And his son had made answer—"If you have no objections, I would like to walk over to Burnside and hear Mr. Keith."

"Are you going to desert me, too?" the father asked, with a touch of disappointment in his tone. And Archie, because he could not tell him that this was true, stammered out several reasons at once for his wish, among others, his desire to see Miss Oglvie.

Then Dr. Grant, always generous, sent him off with a good grace, saying, "Mr. Keith is a fine preacher, and it will do you good to go and hear him sometimes. Mind, I shall expect you to bring back copious notes of the sermon."

Sunday had intervened on the business which Captain Oglvie had undertaken on Peggy's behalf. He had gone into Bleaktown, and had ascertained, from an examination of the papers in the lawyer's hands, that she was no longer mistress even of the small property of Delaube. He had also arranged to meet Mr. Haldane for a settlement of minor matters. For instance, it seemed that after the date of the deed which assigned the property to Louis Oglvie's creditor, on the death of his (Louis Oglvie's) father, the wood on the small estate ought to have been left untouched. Peggy was eager to set this right, by the sale of whatever else she had a right to sell; but, as has been said, Sunday intervened, and she was very glad to lay aside her perplexing thoughts, and obey its call to rest.

Margery was detained at home by her brother's illness, but she ordered Peggy and the captain off to church together, and there was no escape; but they could not go on longer as they were doing, at any rate. Horace Oglvie was acute enough to perceive that the injured tone was the best he could take. The walk to church was a longish one, and he went on quite silently beside her for some time, looking very miserable—not more so than he felt, perhaps, but he gave free expression to his feeling.

At last he said: "This must come to an end, for both our sakes, Peggy."

"I know it," she answered, wistfully.

She was very unselfish, and it was easy for her to look at it from his point of view, and to consider him more than herself. Such unselfishness is very rare in the world, and the few who possess it are not often fortunate in exercising it.

"I must go away," he said, "for I cannot endure it longer. Not that I shall be the happier for going away from you, but it will be easier to bear my fate like a man. You make me wish that I had never seen you. I would have been a better man if I never had," he added, with the energy of truth.

"Oh! do not say that," she said, in a pleading voice. "And yet you have a right to say it. I have used you ill, Horace."

"Did you ever care for me at all?" he asked, bitterly.

"Yes—oh, yes," she answered.

"Then why have you been false to me?"

"These are cruel words, Horace," she said, quietly, though with quivering lips. "I was true to you then, I am trying to be true to you now."

"What do you mean?" he said.

"I mean," she answered, struggling to express herself, "that I loved you then as well as I knew how, and now I know that I ought to love you more before I can be your wife; yet I feel it is very hard for you to understand this; indeed—indeed, I hardly understand myself."

"But you can tell me if that other man has come between us or not."

"He has not," she answered; "but I do not think I would have felt thus but for him."

He turned away, and walked on in silence. Her transparent truthfulness mirrored his deceit, so that for a moment he saw himself as he really was.

"And you compared us together, and found me wanting," he said. "Peggy, I don't mind telling you that I think I am wanting in some things—that I think I deserve the treatment I have had from you; but if you will only love me, darling, I shall not deserve it again. Think this time before you answer me. I am ready to throw away my whole life as utterly spoiled if you refuse."

And she did think, and thought of nothing else, as might have been supposed, all through the service, only that every time she raised her eyes they met those of Archie Grant honestly fixed on her face. And David Haldane noticed how much graver and manlier the youth had grown, but he could not understand either his look or Peggy's. Their looks were not those of youthful lovers. Then he turned steadily to the business in hand.

At the church door Archie found himself side by side with David Haldane, with Peggy and Captain Oglivie a little before them.

"I want to speak to her," said Archie, pressing forward; "but she has that fellow with her. He is marching her off as if she belonged to him."

"Do you know him?" asked David Haldane.

"I saw him last summer," said Archie, discontentedly, "and he took possession of her at once. I will come back to you presently;" and so saying he hurried after the pair.

Just then, however, as if by concert, Peggy turned, saw him, and advanced a few steps to meet him, leaving her companion standing alone. She was looking very grave and sad, and as David Haldane passed she was already parting with Archie, who was holding her hand, and saying eagerly, "You will be sure to come."

Then David thought he understood it all, and gave up hope on the spot. Her heart belonged to the youth at his side, and she was bound, probably by some domestic treaty, to marry Captain Oglivie. "She is doubly bound," he said to himself; and he thought that she had even shunned him, for as he advanced she had barely acknowledged his distant salutation, and hastily retreated to the captain's side, who bore her off in triumph.

From that day, Archie and David Haldane were fast friends.

GRANNY'S SPECTACLES, AND WHAT SHE SAW THROUGH THEM.—VI.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRAP TO CATCH A SUNBEAM," ETC. ETC.

FRANK THE FIDGET.

THE last story; oh, dear! oh, dear! I am sorry," said little Edith, taking her place at grandmamma's side.

"Well, dear," said Mrs. Everley, "they have lasted just the right time, for I have had a letter from mamma this morning, asking for you to come home on Saturday."

"The day after to-morrow! well, the last day is worse than the last story," said little Edith, sighing.

"Why don't you wish to go home, Edie?"

"I want to see mamma and papa, of course, but I should like to fly home and kiss them, and then fly back to you."

"Notwithstanding the spectacles, Edie?" said granny, smiling.

"Yes, granny; I don't mind the spectacles now, because I think they are kind to find out all our naughty ways, and break us of them."

"That is right, love; you will soon lose all your faults when once you become aware of them, and try to mend them yourself. You have, I think, seen your uncle Frank, have you not?"

"Yes, granny, but not very often."

"Have you noticed that his good looks are quite spoiled by an unusually large under-lip?"

"Oh, yes! I thought he was ugly, granny."

"He would be very handsome, Edie, but for this disfigurement, occasioned entirely by pulling his lip when he was a child. He was as deserving of his title as any of the children, for I never beheld such an incorrigible fidget. No amusement pleased him that compelled quietude. His fingers were for ever touching or playing with something, his feet for ever scuffling, so that the place where he sat in the nursery could be seen by the wear of the carpet, and when put to bed for his morning sleep he pulled the knots all off the counterpane or bit holes in his petticoat.

"Don't do that, Frank; put down those scissors; leave that collar alone; don't touch that bracelet—such were the constant reproofs that went on. He could not stand near any one without pulling something they had on, till I dreaded seeing him approach any visitor.

"I was tired of the incessant, 'Don't touch, Frankie,' and yet knew not how to cure him. He had had endless punishments, but it really seemed almost a disease with the child.

"His restlessness was mental as well as physical; he could not play for any long time at one thing, and no story amused him that took more than a few minutes to read; he could not sit still long enough to listen to it. We used to try taking him for long walks, and thoroughly tiring him; and even then, when he was weary enough to throw himself on the ground to rest, he would roll over and over, or take something from his pocket to pull to pieces. The pulling of his lip began after he went to school. I never noticed that until his first holidays. Of course, I spoke to him of it directly. He said he did not know when he did it, but that he believed he did it when he was learning his lessons.

"During these holidays, an old friend of your grandfather's came to stay with us. She was very rich, and had lived a great part of her life in India, from whence she had brought a great quantity of curiosities, and the children looked forward to visits from her, as she always brought them each some curious present. A certain box, that came with her luggage this time, caused great wonderment amongst the little folks; and little Dora, more bold than the rest, ventured to ask what was in it.

"Ah, something to amuse you little folks some day.' You may fancy how eager they were, therefore, for this day to arrive, and how numerous were the speculations as to what it contained. One afternoon, after this lady had been with us a short time, it happened to be very wet, and she said it was the very day for the opening of the mysterious box. Accordingly, the children were all summoned, and seated round the large dining-room table, and Mrs. Mosse displayed to their wondering and delighted eyes models of various trades and occupations of India, the little figures all in their national dresses, and each following his own occupation; the whole of the groups were arranged on a kind of raised board. After the first exclamations of delight had subsided, she told them to wait a moment, and they would be still more delighted.

"I must fetch something first,' she said; 'don't touch it till I come down,' and she left the room. Alas! it was too great a temptation for Frankie. He had noticed a small round hole in the raised board, in which was a small key.

"I know,' he said; 'this will make them move—it's clockwork: how jolly! I could do it.'

"Don't, don't!' exclaimed the others; 'she told us not to touch it.'

"I'm only looking,' he answered; but one finger was on the tempting key.

"For a time Maude restrained him, but Mrs. Mosse was long gone, and his patience was exhausted. In spite of all Maude could say, he fidgeted the little key backwards and forwards, till finally there was a loud snap, followed by a continued 'whir,' which told too plainly that the spring of the curious little toy was broken.

"Mrs. Mosse opened the door at the moment, with several little parcels in her hands.

"I have been long gone,' she said; 'but these things were at the bottom of my box. What is the matter?'

"The faces of the children spoke that something was wrong, and poor guilty Frank, with scarlet cheeks and watery eyes, stood near the toy, in a loud and angry whisper declaring he had done no harm.

"But indeed he had, Edith, as Mrs. Mosse soon showed him; the little machine, wound up properly, would have set all the figures in motion at their several employments: it was clockwork, and, too truly, he had broken the spring.

"Moreover, Frank,' she said; 'I had meant it as a present to Maude, because I did not buy her a nice one last time. I must now give her yours.' And she handed a parcel to Maude, and one each to the others. 'I had gone up,' she continued, 'to fetch these, that I might present all my gifts at once.'

"I had entered the room at this moment, and told Mrs. Mosse I considered Frank rightly punished, and how anxious we had been for something to give him a lesson he would never forget. I explained to her that the accident was not occasioned by curiosity, or wilful disobedience, but an incorrigible love of fidgeting and pulling at something. The present he had lost by his folly was a little Indian writing-case of inlaid wood, beautifully fitted up.

"Maude was, of course, very much pleased with it, but the novelty of the curious toy would have made her naturally prefer what had been originally intended for her, particularly as she had a desk of her own; but I thought it so good a lesson to Frank, that I offered no opposition to the arrangement, and he was left without any gift at all."

"And was it a lesson to him, granny?" asked Edith; "did he leave off fidgeting?"

"He could not at once, dear, leave off what had been such a long habit, but it certainly did cure him of touching things that did not belong to him; his own unfortunate lip he still continued to pull and twist, till he made it, as I have told you, the ugly thing it is."

A loud ring at the visitors' bell here disturbed them.

"How tiresome!" said Edith; "I wish people would not come in the middle of our stories."

"They are over, Edith, darling. I have nothing more to tell, and here comes Sibly to announce the visitors."

"A lady is in the drawing-room, ma'am," said Sibly; "she will not give her name."

"A lady—won't give her name—oh! dear, it is some one begging, I suppose. Stay here, Edith, I will come out again when she is gone," and Mrs. Everley rose and entered the house.

Some long time elapsed, and Edith thought she would just go and peep in at the drawing-room window, for surely this person must have gone, and granny forgotten to come back to her; but the blind was down to exclude the afternoon sun, and Edith was no wiser. She went round to the front of the house, and there stood a carriage with a gentleman inside, and a lot of boxes on it. What could it mean? Somebody had come to-day; but how funny to come without being asked, for granny evidently did not expect them. Well, she must go back on the lawn; granny had told her to stay there. So only running to fetch her doll from the summer-house for company, Edith had just stationed herself under the tree when the garden-door opened, and granny came out, leaning on the arm of a tall lady, and granny's face was wet with tears! She came up to wondering little Edith, and said—

"My little girl, this is my Dora, come back from Australia to gladden once more her poor old mother's eyes."

The lady stooped and kissed the child warmly, as she answered, "Dear Philip! think of this being his child."

"And aint you glad, granny?" Edith whispered, drawing closer to her grandmamma, and putting her hand in hers.

"Yes, my child, glad—more glad than I can say: these are tears of joy."

Edith could not understand such tears at her age, and she was not satisfied till they had passed from poor granny's face; and, seated on the new uncle's knee, who had come with aunt, she listened to tales from Australia, and told him in return how granny had amused her with the story of her aunt and Frank's early days.

I wonder if, amongst my little readers—if I have been fortunate to have some—there have been peevish, careless, talkative, fidgety, or dainty ones? If not with these same faults, perhaps some others, as likely to lead to future mischief. Like brave little folks, determine to overcome them, for as the tiny seed which is planted in the earth grows and lives to be a giant oak, even so will little faults of childish years grow with you and strengthen with your strength, till you will have lost the mastery you might once have gained over them. If these little tales will help you to this end, I shall be glad indeed that I have told you about "Granny's Spectacles, and what she saw through them."

WOLF LEGRANGE.

BY WILLIAM DUTHIE, AUTHOR OF "A TRAMP'S WALLET," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

ANTOINE LEGRANGE sat by the fire, nursing his wounds. In reality they were not serious; and he needed rest as much, or more, than lint and bandages. But he had received a deeper wound, and one more difficult to heal. Jessie's bright eyes had pierced him to the heart. In his morose self-containment he had never thought to look upon the damsel before; and now her beauty, lighted by pity and tenderness, had come upon him like an earthly embodiment of an angel of light. For a moment he had bathed, as it were, in a vision of bliss; but his jealous eyes soon caught signs which told him too plainly how powerful a rival stood in his path—how little his newly-awakened love was likely to be returned. Even in the short time that Felix and Jessie had been together in his presence, he had seen glances interchanged, and words almost formed upon their lips, which could not be misunderstood.

Thus the love of Antoine Legrange sprang into existence in a desert, most like the snows he had just left, and seemed feredoomed to failure. But his passion, although suddenly conceived, was too intense to be without hope. He lingered at the New Haven till the light began to fail, and John Atkinson and his son returned. Then it required very little pressing to induce him to remain for the night.

"My hurts are already half healed," he said, in an apologetic tone; "I shall be well to-morrow."

"And will spare the wolves," cried John Atkinson, "if only out of gratitude for your speedy recovery."

Legrange gave a muttered imprecation in reply. As he bade Jessie good night, the hot pressure of his hand, and some few words whispered in her ear, brought a tremor into her frame, and a deep flush upon her cheek.

Christmas Eve dawned with the morrow. This festival was as joyfully kept by the English settlers amid the snow-wastes, and by the frozen inland waters of Canada, as in England itself.

The French Canadians did not hold the day in such high estimation—New Year's Day being their great anniversary—but even in their eyes the Fête de Noël was a notable feast of commemoration. For the moment, however, the wolves were uppermost in every man's thoughts. They must be hunted down; and perhaps no day could be better for the purpose than Christmas Eve. All the settlers within riding distance heartily joined in the expedition, and by early dawn a troop of some thirty horsemen had collected at John Atkinson's rendezvous. Antoine Legrange was among the earliest of the hunters. He looked pale, but resolute, and almost scorned commiseration.

In order thoroughly to cover the ground, the party broke up into three sections, under the orders respectively of Pierre Guèroult, John Atkinson, and a broad-backed miller from the Utawas lake. Each division advanced as near as possible in the same line, keeping within bugle-call of one another.

Perhaps, considering the nature of the animal they were in search of—so cowardly, so watchful, and so keen of scent—the hunters might still have failed in their purpose, if chance had not favoured their enterprise. They had advanced at least a mile in the order described without falling upon any recent wolf-tracks, when they espied a solitary horseman emerge, as it were, out of the blank waste of snow. He was riding at the utmost speed towards them.

"A man-hunt!" rose the cry. "We shall soon be upon his hunters."

The whole party dashed forward, and quickly came up with the fugitive horseman. Panting with the exertions he had made, he could only gasp out the words, "The wolves—the wolves!"

A few minutes' advance brought the hunters into the midst of a herd of at least a hundred wolves, yelping, open-mouthed, and hungry for their prey. Then followed a scene of direful slaughter. The wolves, checked in their flight, surprised and exhausted with running, were almost at the mercy of their assailants. The hunters, on the contrary, fully armed, and in every way prepared, shot down the bewildered brutes by scores, with scarcely any danger to themselves. The creatures were scattered in all directions, but were followed up by individual horsemen; and on every side resounded shouts and cries of excitement, yells and howlings of pain, and the sharp, almost echoless report of fire-arms.

By a mere chance, young Felix Guèroult and Antoine Legrange came together in their pursuit of some half dozen of the flying herd. Intent only on overtaking and destroying the common enemy, they were led away from the rest into a deep hollow, almost a ravine. Each was armed with a revolver, and took flying shots at the terrified creatures as they fled before them.

Meanwhile the sky, which had been overcast since early morning, became every moment more threatening with storm-clouds. While the hunt was at its height, there fell a shower of fine white dust; soon this thickened into a denser fall of hard pellets, approaching to hail-stones; and this, again, changed into a close, fleecy snow, which completely filled the air.

By shouts and bugle-calls, the scattered party were called together. Two alone failed to answer—Felix Guèroult and Wolf Legrange. The calls were repeated, but without result.

"Let us return," said Atkinson, "and seek them."

"It is not necessary," replied Père Guèroult. "They have wandered farther than the rest, but will soon find their way home, driven by the storm."

Little by little the cavalcade broke up, and the hunters found their way by twos and threes to their homes. Pierre Guèroult and the Atkinsons lingered behind the rest, in the hope that the missing men would join them; but they reached New Haven without tidings of their safety.

The snow was now falling in a dense cloud, which obscured the sky. No serious fears were entertained for the safety of the two hunters who had been left behind, whose arrival was momentarily expected; still there was an uneasiness in the minds of all.

"Your son must have gone home, Mr. Guèroult," said John Atkinson, hopefully, as he sat by the blazing log-fire. "And as for our friend Legrange," he added, with a forced laugh, "the 'Wolf' is safe, you know, against all weathers."

Père Guèroult looked grave, and at once rose from his seat. "I thank you, my friend," said he, "for your kind thoughts; but if Felix is at home, it is time I was there also. If not——"

A shade of anxiety shrouded his face as he thus gave a first hint of his secret fears.

"We will go with you," cried the two young Atkinsons, rising to their feet with one accord. The father nodded his assent.

The snow-storm was still unabated as the three hunters set out for Montrouge, the residence of the Guèroults. They had not advanced far when they heard the dull thud of a horse's hoofs behind them, even above the moaning of the storm. They drew instinctively on one side to let the rider pass. A horse swept by them at full gallop—a horse with an empty saddle. Père Guèroult gave a cry of alarm.

"Heavens!" he exclaimed; "I know that horse; it is Antoine Legrange's. I know it by its white mane. Let us push onwards."

There was no comfort to be found at Montrouge. Felix Guèroult had not returned, nor was there any tidings of him. With a groan of despair the unhappy father clasped his hands to his forehead.

"God help my poor boy!" cried Pierre Guèroult, as he sank into a chair. "No human aid can save him!"

That was a miserable Christmas Eve, both at Montrouge and at New Haven, for the inmates of each stood in dread of a terrible bereavement. An eye was scarcely closed in either homestead. The morning came glimmering through the clear, frosty air at last. The snow had ceased to fall. The first object which met Jessie's tearful eyes, as she looked out of the window, was the ragged pony of Felix Guèroult, half dead with hunger and cold. The sight brought a pang through her very heart. Was, then, Felix lost to her for ever?

With tender care the poor beast was led to a stall, and all its wants supplied. It ate and drank and was refreshed; but it was not at ease.

Some keen instinct in the dumb brute showed itself in the evident desire to brave once more the wintry air without. All observed this.

"Perhaps," cried John Atkinson, animated by a new hope, "the good beast knows where its master is—will show us the way to find him."

They let the pony loose, and followed in his path. The snow was so deep that even the horses could scarcely wade through it.

Sagacious and affectionate as a dog, the pony led the way to where Felix Guèroult lay, in a rude snow-hollow, prostrate but living.

His father threw himself by his side with a cry of joy.

Was he lamed or wounded?

How? By whom?

Antoine Legrange!

By accident?

No! With a fell purpose to kill!

This was the story Felix had to tell. Legrange had turned suddenly upon his young companion, and fired upon him; had left him on the snow-drift for the wolves to harry and devour.

Felix, wounded and unhorsed, had lain for a time stunned, until the strong rush of life to his heart had roused him to consciousness and hope. The cold had congealed the blood which threatened to pour out with it his life upon his snow-bed, and closed the wound. Then, with his right hand, he had dug out a hollow in the snow, and lay there waiting and watching—the pain of his wound would not let him sleep—till succour came.

There were many tears shed, both at Montrouge and New Haven, when young Felix Guèroult was brought tenderly home: but they were tears of joy. There was a merry Christmas in both houses; a happy New Year for all. The wound in the shoulder of Felix was not dangerous; and for the wound in his heart—it is enough to say that Jessie and Felix were betrothed on New Year's Eve.

And where was Antoine Legrange? Lost in the snow-storm. It was many weeks ere his body was found; and then it was recognised only by the remnants of his clothing. The wolves had feasted there.

"'Wolf' Legrange, indeed!" cried John Atkinson, when he heard the news of this discovery. "The name was not given to him in vain. There is a judgment in these things, if men would only read it. Even wolves are God's creatures, and serve some purpose on the earth. I warned him; but he would not hear me. He thought only of revenge, and of the dark purpose that was in his heart. The wolves, whom he thirsted to destroy, have been his executioners; and a poor colt the chief witness against him."

CHRISTMAS—THE WORLD'S BIRTHDAY.

HERE was a paragraph in the column of news in an evening paper a few weeks ago which caught my eye, and painfully arrested my curiosity.

It was the report of a mother, taken up by the police at a doorstep, with a dead child in her arms. What a world of sorrow seemed to be wrapped up in that short announcement! In the hands of a master of his art, here was the raw material for a tragedy as doleful as that of Ugolino of the Tower of Famine, or that most fearful episode of all in the siege of Jerusalem, familiar to every reader of Josephus. Who was that mother, and what must her feelings have been, thus to bring out her dead into the streets? Had she been driven out of doors, with a sick and dying child in her arms, by a drunken husband or a merciless landlord? What was her story, and where is our boasted civilisation, when such things happen in our midst, to teach us what a little way we have reached as yet in staunching the wounds of the aching human heart?

Eighteen hundred years or more have rolled by since Christ was born, and yet these things are. About as many hundred years before he was born, there was another such scene as we have just described. The story of Hagar in the wilderness of Paran, with her child Ishmael dying of thirst before her eyes, and within a stone's throw of a well, which she sees when God opens her eyes, is one of those Bible pictures which, once read, can never be forgotten. It has been a favourite subject with artists at all times; yet what pencil can paint thoughts on the brain like those which the simple words themselves call up?

There are moments when we can only cry out that God is great, but we dare not lie to our soul by saying that he seems to be just or good. There are moments of blindness when the soul can only see its own sorrow. Tears may dim, but they bring relief. But there is another kind of sorrow that leaves the eye dry, and the brain fired with the sense of wrong.

Such was the darkness of soul which fell upon Hagar, till her eyes were opened to see, not only the well of water, but also the presence of Him who is the Lahai-Roi, the Living One who seeth me.

Now the history of the heathen world seems to me to be summed up in that story of Hagar. Rome has been called the Niobe of nations, childless and crownless in her voiceless woe. The whole world before the birth of Christ is indeed one Niobe turned to stone. The mother with her dead child in her arms in the streets of London, what is it but an epitome of the world's history?

All religions, from India to Mexico, have lived in the hope of a Messiah, an Anointed One, a virgin-birth, who was to bring God and man together again. It is Krishna in India, it is Balder in the North, it is Apollo in Greece, it is Foh or Buddha in China, it is Manco Capac in Peru. But what is the result? Paganism sits at our doorsteps, like the mother with the dead child in her arms. The oracle for once lied not, when at the birth of Christ it cried out, "Great Pan is dead." The oracles were dumb, as in Milton's "Hymn of the Nativity,"—but why? For this reason, that man sought a deliverer, but could find none. All his dreams of a coming hero had turned out to be dreams; and darkness now covered the earth, and gross darkness the people. It was the darkness of despair, and the gross darkness of a scepticism which had settled down on the world when it had found out that its religions were all a delusion.

But the children of Israel had light in their dwelling. We have compared heathenism to the Niobe turned to stone—to Hagar, blind with sorrow, within bowshot of a well of water—to the London mother, with her little street-Arab dead in her arms. It is different with the chosen people. The symbol in their case is the great wonder in heaven which the seer of Patmos saw: "A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars: and she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered." For long centuries she had been travailing in birth; the lament of Isaiah in his day refers to this very thing, that the Jewish Church had "wrought no deliverance in the earth, neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen."

But the promise which tarried long came at last. In the fulness of time the Man-child who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron, was born, and was caught up to God and to his throne. The great red dragon may rage, and the woman may have to flee into the wilderness till the time prepared for her; but the victory is secure, our Elder Brother is in heaven; and the accuser is cast out, and the song is heard on high: "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ."

This is why Christmas is the world's birthday. It was more than a fancy of Milton, when he described it as the deathday of all those filthy and obscene idolatries of Greece and Rome. It was so, because it was the birthday of the Deliverer, who was the desire of all nations as well as the child of promise to the chosen people.

And what riches of blessing flow out of this great mystery of godliness which we celebrate every year at Christmas! Eighteen hundred anniversaries or more do not suffice to tell out the blessings which it has brought with it. They are new every year. Exhaustless as all God's gifts are, this, his best gift, is unspeakable. We do not dwell here on the Divine side of the mystery. That is a subject better reserved for the pulpit, though even there our words but "half reveal and half conceal the soul within." But, only to take lower ground, out of many aspects of the Incarnation, we may touch at least upon this one: it has taught the world humanity. We know we are on disputed ground. Schiller, and after him Wordsworth, to some extent, has iterated and reiterated a disparaging contrast between pagan and Christian faith, as if, although the theology might be on the side of the Christian, the humanity was all on the side of the old gods of Greece. Now here we join issue at once. We say that philanthropy, in the strict sense of the word, meaning love to man as our fellow-man, is emphatically a Christian grace. It is another name for that charity whose praises an apostle has sung in a strain the highest that ever passed from human lips: "After that the kindness and compassion (philanthropy in the Greek) of God our Saviour toward man appeared" (Titus iii. 4). Now this philanthropy is no cold abstraction; it is the "Word made flesh;" it is the person of Him who was called by Athanasius the Theanthropos, the God-man.

There are certain deep instincts in man's nature which this mystery of the Incarnation and this alone will satisfy. Why should Paul of Tarsus have singled out a verse of his fellow-townsmen Aratus—"For we are also his offspring"—in addressing the people of Athens, but for this? Our sense of sonship has been dimmed, but is not entirely destroyed by the Fall. Were this the case, as certain good people in their zeal for dogma inconsiderately assert it is, there would be no further need of arguing either about the nature of the disease or the extent of the remedy. But, happily, this is not the case. There are "those obstinate questionings, of sense and outward things—those fallings from us vanishings—those blank misgivings of a creature, moving about in worlds not realised," which Wordsworth in his noble ode on "Intimations of Immortality," has produced as proof that "we are his offspring."

Man has a sense of the Divine image in him, and of his lost sonship, though he shows it in a strange and fantastic way. Like mad King Lear, he plats a crown of straw; but yet, in his better moments, he bears himself as every inch a king. He gropes after the lost sense of oneness with God, and finding that he is without what he wants, yet unable to do without it, he is fain to invent what he cannot find, and to make God like man, since he cannot make man again in the likeness of God.

Thus it is this sense of the Divine image which lies at the root of all idolatry, and explains though it does not justify it. On the other hand, the doctrine of the Incarnation is exactly adapted to satisfy this spiritual instinct, and so to cut up idolatry by the roots. All those Hindoo Avatars, and Greek Theophanies, were so many stretchings forth of maimed hands of faith, and stumbings on the altar-stairs which lead through darkness up to God. All through the long night of heathenism, the unseen Father looked down with pity on man's misery, and at last provided the only sufficient remedy. In the Incarnation of his own Son, "made of a woman, made under the law," he satisfied this instinct. Jesus is the Immanuel—God with us—which our spirit needs. He became one flesh with us, that we might become one spirit with him. We but very imperfectly understand the mystery of the Incarnation, if we think of it only as a means to an end—a condition without which Christ could not as our substitute pay the penalty due to the broken law. It was all that, but it was also something much more; the Incarnation was both means and end. It is an end in itself, as well as the means to an end. It looked forward and led up to the propitiation of his death—a blessed and indispensable truth; but it will bear to be considered by itself, and in its bearings on the whole human family. Much has been said, and sometimes wisely said, of the education of the human race; of the steps by which the two classes of men, the one under the law, and the other as a law unto themselves, were being led back to God. But the education properly so called could only begin when the true union-point between God and man had been found in the person of Jesus Christ. All before was only the work of the pedagogue to lead us to Christ, that we might receive from him the adoption of sons.

Thus with his birth the education of man properly so called begins. This is why all reckoning of time, quite correctly, falls into the two divisions of before and after Christ. Christmas Day was the world's birthday in a sense deeper than the common run of historians suspect. Dean Stanley has strikingly said that history was born on the night on which Israel went out of Egypt. This is true, as far as it goes. History then emerged out of fable, and entered the region of fact. Moses was the first chronicler, and deserves to be known as the father of history, a thousand years before Herodotus earned that distinction in Greece. But the world's history, in the wider sense of the word, only began with the birth of Christ. Without some central fact to start from, some point to lead up to, the history of races, their wars and their wanderings, are little better than the scuffling of so many kites and crows, which is Hume's contemptuous summary of early British history. What is it which gives dignity to the race, and puts a purpose into events otherwise meaningless? Nothing surely but this: that in the ages to come God might gather up all things in Christ.

Christmas, then, is the world's birthday. It is meet, then, that we should be merry and glad. It is no mere secular holiday, but a holy day in the deepest sense of the word. It was, then, a birthday, and it should be remembered as such; and the older we grow the more we should keep it in the sober way that men remember their birthdays. The birthday of a very little child is kept in one way, that of the heir approaching manhood in another way. As Christendom is growing older, we may not keep Christmas in the rude and roystering way of our forefathers—for what we call "old England" was, in reality, "young England." The ninth century and the nineteenth are as unlike as a child of nine and a youth of nineteen. We cannot at nineteen keep our birthdays as at nine. The way that "merrie England" kept Christmas was right, as far as it went, though it would be mawkish sentimentalism for us to pretend to be merry in the same way. It would be a travestie absurd as that of poor Mr. Titwillow going to a fancy ball in the doublet and pinked hose of a cavalier.

Let us, then, keep a nineteenth-century Christmas,—not a mere milliner's revival of the Christmas of the Middle Ages. Let it be a national holiday, as it always has been, but one abreast of the age, not a mere masque of the past. We have only to open our eyes—and our hearts, we should add, as well—in order to do so. It is well that Christmas falls in midwinter, for it calls out the charities of the season, as well as the compliments. The compliments of the season are like those notes of the Bank of Elegance—a currency good enough for our rich kinsfolk and acquaintance; but the charities of the season should be paid for in good current coin of the realm, and in that which is better than coin—in golden deeds of visiting the fatherless and widow in their affliction. A Christmas with the poor is a better way of keeping the world's spiritual birthday, than a Christmas with the poets or at the pantomime. Not that we are sour Puritans: mistake us not, kind reader. Be charitable at Christmas, even to a critic. We do not forget there are little folk at home; and four little pair of hands will be at our pillow at daybreak on Christmas morning, in search of the fairings on which we have laid our sleepy head this Christmas Eve. We do not forget the little folk; and they certainly would not let us forget it is Christmas. But even home delights have their limit; and, our own Christmas-tree being well laden with fairings, let us see what we can spare for the lanes and courts of our city. A Christmas in Bethnal Green with the costermongers; in Spitalfields with the weavers; in Bow with the lucifer-match makers; in Poplar with the dock-labourers out of employment; in Bermondsey with the lightermen; in Southwark with the men of the fancy-trade, long working short time through the slack season; in Chelsea with frozen-out gardeners, and such-like; in the Brill and Agar Town with small dealers of all sorts. This is a great circle around London, into any segment of which we may cut, with great advantage to ourselves and others. Let us conclude with a whim. Suppose a Christmas-cake, large enough to cover all the poor shums of London, to be dropped from the skies, like that helmet in the "Castle of Otranto." Let us suppose London sugared all over with kindness, as it may be this Christmas with a snow-fall three inches deep. Who will give a hand to cut into that great candied mass, to pull out the plums for the poor, and not, like little Jack Horner, for himself? This would be better than any pantomime which will be produced this season; it would be a great deal more blessed, and more worthy of our age. Every Christmas there is such a cake over our heads, if we only have eyes to see it, and will bear a hand to cut it up. Christ's charity provides the cake, but he asks of us the common humanity to help to cut it up.

WHEN THE SNOW-FLAKES FALL.

WHEN the snow-flakes fall round the squire's old hall,
And fill each eave and rafter,
Round the blazing hearth echoes kindly mirth,
And Care shakes hands with Laughter.

Then loudly and long rings the yule-tide song,
And the squire leads off the chorus—
"Here's peace to the year in its icy bier,
And luck to the year before us!"

Though many a sigh stained the year gone by,
While there's life these hopes may cheer us—
That the darkest night must be lost in light;
That troubles bring true friends near us.

Then loudly and long join the yule-tide song,
Let the chorus rise to heaven;
With a sigh for the sad, a jest for the glad,
And thanks for the blessings given.

I. D. FENTON.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—V.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

HERE we are," said Sydney Welworth, as he took his friend's arm to stop and turn him down from the main thoroughfare, along which they had all this time been manfully plodding, through the snow and mud, into the entrance of a narrow court, which ran down to the river-side. "And now, having given you, I am afraid, more than enough of precept as to the style and system of the work, in which I hope to start you, I will show you a little of the practice."

Captain Scott looked rather doubtful.

"Oh, but I mean it; it is no use your shaking your head, and looking like that about it, for I have quite made up my mind to enlist you, and I know how very much obliged to me you will soon feel for having done so. At first you will only be required to spare us one afternoon in a week, but I feel sure, from my own experience, and from what I have seen in others, who have been quite as diffident of their capabilities as you are, that you will very soon warm to the work, and begin to take such interest in it that you will find yourself going down to your district two or three times as often, or even, as many do, almost every day of the week, and by the end of the winter have, perhaps, taken rather a new and different view of your own personal troubles, and forget your want of interest in anybody or anything, nor ever again feel that you don't know what to do with yourself.

"But now mind the crown of your hat under the arch, and keep a sharp look out for a regular slough of despond, which we shall have to pass, and, with all this slush of tramped-down snow, will probably be even worse than usual this evening."

With this admonition, Sydney led the way down a narrow passage, which one might have passed fifty times in broad daylight without ever even observing; then paused under the solitary lamp in one corner by which the court was dimly lighted, to consult his note-book.

"Let me see—oh, all right! No. 7: it must be the last house in that corner."

Passing through a small space of ground, surrounded by the broken remains of what might once have been palings, and perhaps, at some remote period of history, called a front garden, the two gentlemen came to a door, which, bitterly cold though the evening was, stood wide open, being the common entrance of four different tenants of the four separate rooms within, and therefore, nobody's business in particular to keep shut.

"I have been told of a terrible case of suffering here," said Sydney, in a low voice, to his companion, as they felt their way, stumbling up the narrow and steep staircase, in profound darkness, and knocking at the door of the back room on the landing, inquired whether a person of the name of Balmer lived there, and then, as the door was opened to them, Captain Scott had his first introduction to what might be considered an average, and by no means uncommon, sample of the real privation and sufferings of the London poor.

A low room, of about fourteen or fifteen feet square, nearly a quarter of which area was occupied by the framework of a tottering old four-post bedstead, on which lay stretched out, writhing and groaning, a middle-aged man, the father of the family, every bone in his body racked with rheumatic fever; a ragged old patchwork quilt covering his side, and his wife's threadbare shawl thrown over him; not a bit of fire in the rusty grate; his poor wife with a baby of three weeks old at her breast, herself almost blind with inflammation in the eyes, and four other children, all under six years old, and all crying for food at once, having had nothing but a quartern loaf and a pennyworth of dripping amongst them for the last two days. The two youngest children were in bed alongside of their writhing father, partly for mutual warmth, and partly by way of keeping them quiet out of the way, or, possibly, because they had no clothes to put on if they were to get up, as everything available, down to the very children's boots, seemed to have been "parted with," to get the means of procuring only necessary food. The poor man, when well, had been earning three-and-sixpence a-day as a mason's labourer, but this was now the third week since he had caught a chill from working up to his knees in water, and had been thus laid up, in excruciating agony, without being able to earn one farthing, and his poor wife was quite unable to work at the wash-tub from the state of her eyes, even if she had had strength to go to it.

Archie Scott stood silently looking on agast with astonishment and horror, while his friend, taking his seat at the side of the poor man's bed, was doing his best to cheer him by the kindness and commiseration of his voice and manner, as he endeavoured to find out the quickest and most efficient mode of alleviating some of this terrible distress.

In the first place, writing and signing ample orders for coals, and food for the children, and explaining where they must be taken, and promising the loan of a thick blanket for the rest of the winter, which should be sent before another night was over his head, "Now, my friend," he said, "for your flannel shirt and under-clothing, have you got any put away?"

"Yes, indeed, sir—that's just it; and almost everything else has gone that way too, except this very bed that's under me, and that would have had to go to-morrow, if we had not had the good luck of a kind gentleman like you coming in to look after us."

"Well," replied Sydney, after a little consideration, "though it's rather against our rules, I have heard so good a character of you from the Scripture-reader, who told me of your sad condition, that I think I may trust you, if you will promise me that, if I get your necessary clothing out for you, it shall not go back again directly; but remember that this is what we never do twice for the same person."

"May God bless you, sir, for a kind-hearted gentleman. I will promise and swear——"

"Ah, that will do, my friend; I will take your word for it. But now let us look over the duplicates; you haven't lost or sold them, I hope."

They were in an old tool-box, which was under the bed upon which poor Balmer was lying, and it was a relief to the feelings of Captain Scott to have the occupation of helping the little boy to pull it out. The box was locked, and the key was missing, and nowhere to be found.

The poor wife began to get flustered, and, nearly blind as she was, to search and feel in every hole and corner round the room for it; the baby, laid down upon the foot of the bed, began to squall with all its might; then the eldest child, being closely questioned as to where the key could be, immediately set up a howling, and deposed that she had last seen it in her little sister's—Elizabeth Sophia's—mouth. This was indignantly denied by Elizabeth Sophia, who forthwith lifted up her voice, and added to the chorus of howling, until Sydney suggested, that if they only looked, it might perhaps still be in her mouth, or that the infant in arms might have swallowed it; and that made them laugh. They were still further comforted by being allowed to examine a wonderful hunting-knife, which Captain Scott produced from his pocket to assist in forcing open the lid of the box, which contained within itself a perfect repertoire of carpenter's tools in miniature, besides surgical and veterinary instruments of all sorts and uses.

The first thing that was discovered within the box when the lock, which was a spring one, had at last yielded to this marvellous specimen of cutlery, was the missing key itself; so Elizabeth Sophia and the baby were at once acquitted from all further suspicion, and the tickets were found, and those which represented the most necessary articles selected.

As they were leaving the room, with a promise to call in again before many days, Archie Scott lingered behind his friend, under a shuffling pretence of having to shut up the hundred and one blades and instruments of his wonderful knife, all of which had been opened and displayed at once, to the imminent risk of Elizabeth Sophia's small fingers and thumbs, while he was surreptitiously, and although conscious of acting against his friend's tenets, presenting the poor woman with half-a-crown, and then sixpence a-piece to each of the delighted little ones.

"What struck me more than anything else," said the captain, in an off-hand sort of manner, to his friend, who was waiting for him at the bottom of the stairs, as if it was that which had delayed him, "was the extraordinary patience and gentleness of manner displayed by that poor man. Not one angry look or word—not one hasty gesture, escaped him, either towards his poor wife, fussing as she was, or his children, squalling as they were all at once around him; while he lay there in pain, and almost helpless, calmly suggesting where that key, for which they were all looking, might possibly be found. I never saw anything like it, and could not help all the time thinking to myself how I should probably have acted under like circumstances; why, if that had been me, and my late valet Phorner had been looking about my room for a lost key, while I was lying upon a bed, helpless and racked with pain, I should have rowed at him enough to blow the whole place about his ears in half the time, and very likely thrown every book, or slipper, or boot which I could find within my reach at his head. And did you remark the baby, too? I had no idea that babies were only that size at three weeks old; why, its head was not much bigger than a decanter-stopper, and its little hands were like an average-grown fox's pad. And only fancy having to keep a wife and family, and pay rent, doctor's, baker's, butcher's, and tailor's bills all included, on twenty-one shillings a week!—only just fifty-two guineas a year, and that not regular. Why, that is what I used to pay that rascal Phorner, who had no lodgings to find, and used to live free nine months in the year, when he was with me down at my uncle's, or visiting about at other people's houses; and he declared that he—a single man—couldn't live upon it, and persuaded me to make him an allowance for washing and tea and sugar besides. And here was I myself, only this very afternoon, thinking that I should have to starve and struggle upon £500 a-year. Why, it is monstrous! it is incredible, and a sort of thing that one cannot quite understand, without time to take the idea properly in.

"But what are you going to do with those tickets, now you have got them? Let me look at them; I have often heard of pawnbrokers' duplicates, but don't think I ever saw one in real life before. I do not know that I care to make my début at the pawnbroker's establishment to-night though; perhaps I shan't mind after a little time, when I may be more used to this kind of thing, you know, but——"

"No," said Sydney, laughing; "I will let you off that part of the performance this time. There is a very good little woman, who lives close by here, one of the district Bible-readers, who will, I dare say, undertake that job for us, as she has sometimes done before this. We must call there, as she takes care of my depôt of winter blankets, which I send out on loan; but there are two or three other bad cases in this court, which we may as well look up while we are here. There is, in the opposite house, a poor man of about four-and-twenty, dying of rapid consumption, for whom I have a letter of admission to the Brompton Hospital, though I really almost doubt whether it is worth his while, or, at least, whether it is not a cruel kindness to separate him, for the few remaining months, or perhaps only weeks, of his existence, from his poor hardworking and most attentive wife, to let him go to die among strangers, kind as they may and will be to him.

"Then, a few doors farther on, is an even more grievous case of hopeless illness, in regard to which, as I find myself doing every day, I am again breaking through rules and regulations, and yet I am sure I do not know how to help it; I mean in regard to what I was telling you about taking regular pensioners on to our funds, and so keeping on the same case winter after winter; but come up, and while I am writing the orders for grocery and fuel for the next fortnight, and you are looking round at the abject poverty to which they have been reduced, you will be surprised when I tell you that that poor couple were, within five years ago, in comparatively affluent circumstances.

"Well, Mrs. Fenton, and how is your poor old husband getting on? Here, I have brought a gentleman to see him; he is a soldier—or rather was one—in the cavalry, as your son used to be, of whom you have told me before now."

"Oh, Mr. Welworth, is it you? I hardly hoped to see you again so soon. Pray come in, sir, and the other gentleman, too, is, very welcome, I am sure, if he will walk into our poor place, for it is a poor place indeed, gentlemen, and not what we have always been used to."

Poor enough it was, and barely furnished; but the floor, which was without any pretence of carpet, was scrupulously clean; and so were the scanty bits of furniture, and the bedclothes of the poor old man.

"Here, James, here is Mr. Welworth called to see you," screamed Mrs. Fenton, at the top of her voice at him: "you know our kind friend Mr. Welworth, don't you, James?"

"I'm very feeble, my dear, but I am not deaf, as I often tell you," replied the poor old man, shaking his head from side to side, without the slightest expression in his wide-open eyes, "and I am very glad to see our kind friend Mr. Welworth."

"And he has brought a gentleman with him, who is a soldier—cavalry officer," she continued, in just the same high key, "as our poor son Jemmy was, before he died in India."

Captain Scott at this, began to pull his well-waxed moustachios, and look as if he did not altogether approve of this association, and wished that Mrs. Fenton was better informed in regard to the proper distinctions of rank in the army.

"Ah, poor boy!" said the old man; "he was a splendid fellow, was our poor Jemmy, and a real officer too, and used to dine at the regimental mess with the Duke of Cambridge, and Lord Ragland, and all the other great lords and generals; but he is dead now—dead and buried out in India. After having gone safe through all the Crimea, he was knocked off his horse, and was quite dead in less than three minutes by a sun-stroke. They sent us back his watch and his medals. Put your hand under my bolster, here behind me, Sarah, and show the gentleman Jemmy's medals."

"Dear me!" cried Captain Scott, in great astonishment, as his eye caught the name and the regiment engraved upon the silver medal, which he had first taken up more as an act of civility than from having any real interest in the matter; "dear me! was poor old Fenton your son? He belonged to my own regiment, and I knew him well; he was our quarter-master, was poor old Fenton."

"Young James Fenton was our son, sir," said the mother, with some dignity, and a strong emphasis on the "young." "He was only forty-seven when cut off in his prime, poor lad, and just beginning to rise in the world."

"Yes, of course he was, I was going to say so. He was raised from the ranks, and had his commission given to him, and he had just got his step as lieutenant and was made quarter-master, when we lost him—and a real loss to the regiment. He was a splendid fellow, and the handsomest man, whether officer or trooper, in the whole brigade."

As the captain thus spoke, with deep feeling for the memory of his former comrade, he really seemed to convey some of his excitement to the poor old bedridden man, whose eye kindled up quite brightly, and a proud flush came over his emaciated and careworn features, as he tried to hold out his hand to Archie, who immediately grasped and shook it tenderly.

"God bless you, sir!" said Mrs. Fenton, "I have not seen my dear old man look so pleased and life-like since he was first taken ill, and that's four weary years ago next month."

CAGED.

OH, Dick! what wonder if you and I,
 To each passer-by
 Look sad and forlorn?
 It's hard, Dick, hard,
 Caged and barred,
 This merry May morn.
 And the sights we see
 Are never so fair
 As they well might be;
 And the dusty air
 That we breathe all day,
 Will it ever compare, Dick, ever compare
 To the thing we were used to far away?
 Yet there cometh a time when we both forget
 How lonely we are,
 And the toil and fret,
 And the noise and jar;
 And it cometh, it cometh to thee, my bird,
 When the dawn creeps over the grey housetops,
 Ere a sound in the streets below is heard,
 And the golden drops
 Are hanging afar on flower and tree,
 A sweet and a blessed time for thee.
 You can raise your head and flutter your wings
 On your perch so high;
 You can dream of a thousand glorious things,
 And fly
 Over the meadows and over the streams,
 Clover fields, yellow and white with bloom,
 Mountains purple, and orchards brown—
 Away, away, from this dismal room.
 And it cometh to me—not at early dawn,
 But at night, at night,
 By the candle-light,
 When the streets are hushed, and the curtains drawn.
 And I lay aside my burden of care,
 And I breathe again of the fresh sweet air;

And I hear you sing,
 As you did of yore,
 In the beautiful spring,
 At my father's door.
 And I feel, oh, Dick! I feel happy then,
 And the numbness falls from my weary brain;
 And the pitiless scorn and the greed of men
 Are all forgotten; and once again
 The dead in their graves come back to me,
 And I kneel, I kneel at my mother's knee;
 And I feel a hand on my burning brow,
 And I hear a voice—oh, how dear, how dear!
 And I dream, like you, Dick, of many a joy,
 Away from here, away from here.
 Below in the street
 The sun smiles sweet,
 And the folks look glad as they hurry along;
 The houses are bright,
 In the morning light,
 So sing me a song, Dick, sing me a song!
 Till room and street with your gladness ring;
 The faster I work the sweeter you sing.
 And there's much to be done,
 Ere the set of sun,
 There's bread to be won for thee and me;
 And the tears that rise
 To my weary eyes,
 They must not be, they must not be!
 I thank thee, sweet, for that song of thine!
 Mid hunger and poverty, shame and sin,
 Care and sorrow, and strife and toil,
 Your song sings ever my heart within.
 And I wander scathless amongst it all,
 For it keeps me pure where so many fall.
 Then sing me a song, Dick, sing me a song,
 To the measure of feet as they tramp along;
 And let us forget, my bird, to-day,
 The sweetness that lieth so far away.

MATTHIAS BARR.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.

TURNING USURER.

ACCORDING to appointment, Captain Oglivie went to the print-works to meet old David Haldane. He had that morning been commissioned by Margery to buy back Delaube, if possible. The land was sacred in her eyes. It was sacred also in the eyes of Horace Oglivie. They had the true aristocratic feeling for it. Its passing out of the family gave them a pang. It was something to be handed down intact, and maintained as kings maintain their kingdoms. The feeling was as different as possible from Peggy's simple attachment to the place of her birth; but then Peggy was not an Oglivie;

 she had neither the Oglivie spirit nor the Oglivie face, owing to that wretched plebeian mother of hers, whose blood dominated in her veins. Margery's Puritanism had not lessened her pride, when she could think and feel thus; it had only increased her inconsistency: for she was ready to acknowledge that the Oglivie spirit had shown itself chiefly in pure unadulterated selfishness. However, she certainly did not want Delaube for herself—it was only an outlying portion of the Oglivie possessions—and she could scarcely want to keep it for the family. She had made Peggy very happy by the proposal to re-purchase it, but her object in doing so, she did not explain. She did explain that it would take all her ready money, and the captain thought ruefully of his little bill, as she pointedly told him to bid for it as great an advance on the price paid by Mr. Haldane as might be necessary to induce him to part with it. It never occurred to them that he could wish to keep it, when it was possible for him to make a profit by it. People are apt to think motives so different in different ranks from their own; whereas human motives are pretty nearly alike in all ranks.

Having entered in at the print-works gate, Captain Oglivie was looking about him for the particular door which might lead him to the presence of the owner of the heap of confused buildings before him, when young David Haldane issued from one entrance, and, on seeing him, stopped on his way to another on the opposite side of the court. David had on the close-fitting Scotch cap, and was in his working dress, while the captain was elegantly attired; and in place of the perfectly-fitting and spotless gloves which the latter wore, David's hands were dyed up to the wrists a beautiful blue.

Both men were slightly embarrassed at meeting. David was rather slow of speech on first acquaintance, and the captain, who would have been exceedingly cordial and gracious to an acknowledged inferior, did not somehow seem able to express the easy superiority which he ought to have felt towards this man. Perhaps it was because he had seen him do a brave deed with those big, blue hands of his, a deed of which it behoved him to take notice. Accordingly he began to speak of their former meeting; but he overdid his part, and was conscious of having his vain words of praise flung back at him with something akin to scorn; for David, as if he had not heard them, interrupted with a simple question as to how the poor fellow was, looking straight at Horace Oglivie with his penetrating eyes, and tossing back his brown locks from a slightly frowning brow, exactly as a Newfoundland shakes the water from his ears. "Here!" he shouted to a boy, who crossed the court at the moment, "show this gentleman the way to Mr. Haldane's room—the private room, and find him if he is not there. Good morning. You see I am busy," and he held forth the obnoxious hands, and with a curt bow, passed on.

"Boorish, certainly," thought the captain, following his guide. "It is not possible that she could care for this man." But then he remembered that she was not perfect in her tastes, according to his standard, and might easily have admired that singularly handsome face, without feeling that its owner could not be a gentleman. As for him, his assurance was simply unbounded, in the captain's eyes, and he longed for an opportunity to teach him his proper place.

With the old man he was much better satisfied—there was greater deference in his manner; and when the due amount of deference was conceded, Captain Oglivie at once condescended; and the shrewd old man had already taken his measure. Young David had not despised his rival—that rival's grace and elegance had rather imposed upon him; but they did not impose upon old David, who regarded Horace Oglivie with considerable contempt before he had been ten minutes in his company, and was prepared to humour him to the top of his bent, yet without the slightest exaggeration, which might lead an observer to discover that he was doing so.

Captain Oglivie was a little astonished when his offer to buy back the little property, at a fair advance, was declined.

"You may name your own price," he said. Surely that was enough to tempt the ex-packman.

But no; he wanted the land, and nothing would tempt him to part with what he had laid hold of. He wanted to lay hold of more, if it was to be had in that part of the country. He would not buy land at all, if he looked to profit. Ten times as much was to be made by works like his; and the works were still capable of absorbing more money and returning more interest. But for all that, he wanted land.

The captain, still going upon the ground that an ex-packman's notions must be very different from his own, wondered what anybody could want with land in that part of the country—it wasn't civilised enough for one thing, nor wild enough for another.

"But if you fell heir to any in this part of the country, as you may some day," said the old man, watching him keenly, "you would not sell it, would you?"

Captain Oglivie thought that would be a very different thing. "In that case, it would belong to the family," he said, "and of course I should not part with it. No one likes to sell family property."

"This Mr. Louis Oglivie does not seem to have cared. He parted with his before it belonged to him," said Haldane, still watching his visitor.

"So it seems," answered the captain, carelessly.

"He borrowed money on his expectations," Haldane continued.

"I wish anybody would lend me some on mine," exclaimed the captain. His pride was quite above feeling any disgrace in impecuniosity. The honour that could be touched by that was the honour of a tradesman, not the honour of a gentleman.

"Perhaps I could accommodate you," said the old man, smiling, but with a gleam of eagerness in his grey eyes. His conscience pricked him, as soon as the words were out of his lips. The verse of the psalm came into his head, which blesses the man who puts not his coin to usury. But he resolutely swept the words away with, "I suppose you could only offer personal security?"

"Nothing else at present," the captain replied; "but to tell you the truth, I am hard pressed for money at this moment, and would be glad to give a good per-centage for it. I need not say that the risk is very small," he went on, speaking eagerly, now that the feasibility of obtaining relief in this way had presented itself to him. "I suppose I shall be rich some day; but a man can't afford to wait half a lifetime for the means of living."

"Nobody could have expected the present Sir Alexander to live as long as he has done," remarked old Haldane.

"He is indebted to your nephew for being alive at this moment; but he is not likely to last very long now," replied the captain, in a tone of decorous indifference.

The old man looked at the speaker with a questioning glance and word, and Horace Oglivie told him briefly of the accident which had befallen Sir Alexander, from the immediate consequence of which his nephew had rescued him.

"David said never a word about it," he observed; "and you say he's not likely to live," he added; "then there's only this young lady and her father between you and the estates?"

"Her father is dead, I am assured," replied the captain.

"Well, but the young lady has an interest, I believe."

"I hope our interests will be one and the same some day," said the captain, significantly.

"In that case, your expectations are worth a good deal," replied the old man, with a sudden increase of warmth in his manner, which his visitor attributed to pleasure in prospect of a good investment; "and I have no objection to lending you as much as you require."

It was as if a mine of wealth had suddenly opened at the feet of Horace Oglivie, and without hesitation he plunged into it.

"Can you let me have as much as five hundred before the end of the week?" he asked.

Yes, he could have that, and more if he desired it. Then they fell to settling the rate of interest, which was fixed at the then high figure of ten per cent. The borrower insisted that his personal security was worth a great deal, as it was not likely that he, an officer and a gentleman, would allow himself to be thrown into prison; and the lender knew that it was worth very little, for the reason that it might be already pledged for as much as it was worth; but he did not insist. He had his own private views on the matter, and was very accommodating indeed.

David Haldane the younger, as he went to and fro, keeping an eye on the way of exit, could not help wondering what these two could have to say to each other for such a length of time. At length they came to the end of their conference, and old Haldane ventured to ask, assuming his jocose vein, when the wedding was likely to take place.

"As soon as possible, you may be sure," said the captain, hurriedly; "but she is still very young." And as he went his way, he rejoiced that Peggy was now penniless and dependent, and he resolved to speak to Margery that very day.

"His coin puts not to usury," kept ringing in Mr. Haldane's mental ear; but, holding a colloquy with conscience, he answered that the interest he was charging was not so great as he could make in his legitimate business. But then it was legitimate business, conscience replied, business representing labour, and foresight, and thought, and energy, while this was taking advantage of another man's folly and weakness. He could not get the best in the argument, and he knew it, and resolutely refused to listen.

That afternoon he again attacked his nephew on the subject of their removal to Delaube; but the latter was evidently determined to remain where he was in the mean time. The old man was eager to communicate the piece of information he had received, and he hardly knew how to do it. At last he said, "Captain Oglivie won't care to remain here after he's married; he's to be married to that Miss Oglivie soon, he tells me."

David knew well what Miss Oglivie was meant, and was grateful to his uncle for marching away so rapidly after discharging his shot.

It is "holy George Herbert" who says somewhere in "The Temple," "A sad, wise valour is the best complexion;" and no words could so well describe the complexion of David Haldane's thoughts, now that he dared not even allow himself to dream of his first and only love.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WORSE THAN DEATH.

THE long life-watch of Margery Oglivie was now intensified. Her poor brother lay in the first stage of fever, and she kept her place beside him night and day. She would accept of no help whatever. In vain Peggy pleaded to be allowed to sit with her, and share her office of nurse. She would not listen to her plea. With a strange unselfish selfishness she clung to her heavy burden. Others might say that it would be well that he, the poor afflicted one, should die. She, too, could contemplate his death, at a distance, as "a happy release;" but when it drew near, she only longed that he might live. All her life had been devoted to the preservation of that life—to the saving of every feeble spark of it, when threatened with destruction on every side, and when the least neglect would have seen it extinguished for ever. It was an awful devotion, not of the body only, but of the spirit, for every conscious act of love was given to an unconscious being, by whom it could neither be appreciated nor returned. There was only one thing she did not do. She did not pray that he might live. She did not dare to pray for this, lest it might not be the will of God. And she daily said, "Thy will be done," with a stern patience, not because she thought that will was the one all-wise and all-loving will in the universe, but simply because it was the one all-powerful, which must and would be obeyed. Great are the desolations sometimes wrought by misunderstanding between mortal creatures, but infinitely greater and more terrible are those wrought by misunderstanding the mind and will of God.

Margery Oglvie had been tempted into trying to alleviate the burden of her life-trial. She had been about to shift some portion of it on to other shoulders, which would bear it more lightly, perhaps not feel it at all; and the Lord had threatened to remove it altogether, she told herself, and to give her another, far more grievous to be borne. Sad as her life had been with it, she could not imagine what it would be without it, with nothing to care for, nothing to love. Sterner than ever, she took her post by her brother's bed, and would suffer none to help her in the crisis of his fate.

He had tossed about all the night, and towards the morning had fallen asleep, a sleep that grew less uneasy with the day; and the watcher had a respite. She breakfasted down-stairs; and Peggy would have had her seek some rest, but she would not. After breakfast she returned to her post, leaving Captain Oglvie to his own devices, and Peggy to go over to Delaube, to consult with the old couple there about their future movements. Mr. Haldane had said there need be no hurry in removing, and this would be some consolation to them. He had named the end of May as early enough for him.

"I would offer to go with you, but I must stay and write some business letters," said Horace, as Peggy prepared to depart; and she felt quite grateful to him for not pressing his company upon her. She felt quite grateful to him, and yet it was of him chiefly that she thought as she went on her way. He was looking worn and anxious—changed altogether, and not for the better, since she had walked with him in that midsummer dream. How much was she to blame for it?

These were her thoughts as she went upon her errand to her old home—hers no longer. It seemed, indeed, as if it had already shut its doors upon her, for when she tried the little garden gate, leading to the kitchen entrance, she found it fastened, and on going round to the front, admittance there was equally denied. Had Jean gone out? It was unlikely in the present state of affairs; besides, she remembered that, among other dilapidations, the locks were gone, and the doors only fastened on the inside. The house was rather distant, and the inmates rather deaf, but she took up a stone and knocked with all her might, smiling as she did so, in remembering that the probable reason of the lock-out was the desire to obstruct the forcible entry of the new possessors.

But no sooner had she knocked than the door was opened by Tammas, who appeared to be keeping sentry by pacing up and down behind it.

"It's you," said the old fellow, with a military salute. "Come in, missy, and let me shut the door again. Ye'll find Jean at hame."

She asked after the rheumatics, and getting a briefer reply than was at all usual from Tammas, who loved to dilate upon his pains, she left him re-fastening the door.

When she entered the house, Jean was busy cooking some kind of savoury mess over the fire, and preparations were going on as if for a very late and rather elaborate breakfast; and, more mysterious still, as soon as she saw Peggy, Jean left off cooking, and began to cry. "Eh, my bairn, he's come hame at last," she sobbed.

But still Peggy did not comprehend, till Jean told her plainly that her father had come back—was in the house at that moment—had slept beneath the roof all night. She sank into a chair faint and trembling, overpowered by the shock—she knew not whether of gladness or of fear. "Oh, Jean, take me to him," was the voice of the former. It was the latter that whispered, "What is he like?"

"He's sair changed," said Jean, wiping away the tears with her apron. "Let me gang and tell him that you're here."

Jean left her for the purpose, while she rose and stood at the door to listen—to listen with clasped hands and breathless lips for the intelligence which even a tone of his voice might bring her. Yes, the voice at least conveyed the assurance that it was indeed her father—the voice at least had something of dearness in it. It had a familiar sound—the strange family likeness which comes out even in the unlike, and which the voice as often carries as the face.

She could not wait. The voice drew her irresistibly. She stole up the short stair, and stood in his presence, her paleness flushed with an eager flush, her rosy lips apart with expectation. She did not stop to think of her forsaken mother, of her own fatherless childhood. He was her father, that was all. She stood before him with all the lovely reverence of filial awe in her beautiful face. And he rose to meet her—a small, but still graceful man, whose silken hair was prematurely grey, but whose colourless face was unlined and smooth; the features faultless, but slightly swollen; the eyes—the eyes were dead, no light of love nor any sign of living sorrow had been in those eyes for years and years.

He rose to meet her, and extended to her a chilly little hand; she noticed, as one notices the merest trifles in moments of intense life, how small it was as it held hers slackly. There was no embrace for her, no kiss, no blessing. Yes, surely the race had a curse upon it, in the soil of whose hearts not even the commonest human affection could live unwithered.

He was looking at her, and for a few minutes she neither raised her eyes nor spoke. The word "father" had died upon her lips. A chill fell upon her heart.

"We're not very well acquainted with each other, for father and daughter," he said, with a short laugh, which jarred on her ear. "I could never stay at this beastly place. If it does not rain, it snows, and if it does not snow, it hails. I fear we won't see much of each other yet. I've only run over to look how the land lay, but I can't stay long. Indeed I did not think I would see you, I have such a short time to stay, but I'm glad I have seen you. You've grown up very like your mother. She was even prettier at your age—more life and colour.” He made his speech with little pauses.

She lifted her eyes to his face when he had finished, the tears standing on their long, dark lashes, “Oh, father! is this all you have to say to me?”

“Of course I am very happy to see you,” he said, answering the reproach in her tone; “but I can’t afford happiness. I never could. It’s an expensive luxury. A man can’t live here unless he could live on fir-cones.”

“Did you come to take me away?” she said, catching at the idea that he might have heard of his father’s death, and have come to offer her a home, if he had found her homeless.

“I think you are much better where you are,” he replied. “I should be very sorry to mar your good fortune. You are very well provided for, and if Margery gets the estates—and I thought they would have been hers long ago—she may leave them to you, if you play your cards well. There’s not many she can choose from, and she won’t will them out of the family.”

“I would rather go with you,” she pleaded. “Oh, I would so gladly go with you!”

“I am so poor,” he answered, in a tone of more feeling; “I am so poor that I could not afford to have you with me. It would be very pleasant if I could.”

“But I would not burden you—indeed I would not; I could wait on you and serve you.”

He thought, as he looked at her, it would really be pleasant to be served and waited upon by a lovely daughter, and he said so.

“But, Margaret”—he did not call her by the familiar diminutive—“I have a wife.”

This, then, was the reason that he did not want her. Perhaps he had other daughters. She spoke her thought.

No; he had only a wife.

“Then I will serve you both,” she said; “I know so many things! I can do so many things: you don’t know how clever I am,” and she made an attempt to smile, though she was pleading in terrible earnest. “I do not care for being poor,” she went on; “we were poor enough here, but I never felt it. I can even make money; I have made some already at drawing designs for a print-works. You will take me, will you not?”

But he seemed to shrink from her, instead of drawing nearer to her. He was, in truth, troubled by her eagerness—her importunity. It touched what little of heart was left in him, and what there was could not be touched without a feeling of regret and shame. He raised her hand to his lips and kissed it, and then retreated to his chair. It was the act of a stranger, and of one who meant to remain at a distance from her, and she could not help feeling it. Still she was about to speak again; but he stopped her. “Don’t say anything more about it at present,” he said; “I can’t bear it—indeed I can’t. I won’t be able to eat a bit of breakfast as it is;” and with a deprecating gesture he pointed to a chair.

When she was seated, he began to ask her a number of questions about her new home and its inmates. “I should think he would go this time,” he said, after hearing an account of the condition in which poor Sir Alexander lay. “It’s a pity since he has lived so long, that he can’t live a little longer. It’s rather hard to see such a good thing as the Oglvie inheritance must be by this time, go by with only one life in the way. The other sister’s dead, and if Margery were to die, nothing could keep me out of it. None of it will come my way if she can help it, except what she might give a beggar for the asking. It will all go to that fellow” (meaning Horace), “unless she has taken a fancy to you, which I shouldn’t wonder if she had. It would be a good thing,” he added, quickly, “if you two could make it up together.”

He looked at her. She was crimson with indignant shame.

“Perhaps you have?” he said, eagerly.

She was about to silence him, but she remembered that he was her father, and covered her burning face with her hands. “Well, well, I won’t trouble you about it,” he resumed, dreading an outburst of emotion. This daughter of his seemed dangerous in that respect; she had evidently very little self-control.

Jean now re-appeared, opportunely, with the breakfast which she had been preparing, and Peggy stole back with her into the kitchen, on the slight pretext of helping her. Once there, she shut the door, took the old woman’s wrinkled hand in both of hers, and said, in a whisper of tearless agony, “Oh, Jean! there are things far worse than death.” And Jean did not trust herself to speak, except to say, “Whist, bairn, whist!” as she had been wont to do when hushing the sorrows of the motherless child.

CHARLEY'S MORRY.

“THERE’S a nice little dog my cousin George gave to me yesterday!” exclaimed Charles Moore to his sister Alice.

“What! have you got another pet?” she answered, in a tone of wonder.

“Yes,” said Charley; “but I mean to take better care of it than I did of the last.”

“I remember you saying the same thing about poor Dick, the canary bird that you were so fond of, and yet suffered to starve to death.”

“That’s true, Alice; but you know how sorry I was when I found the poor little thing dead in the bottom of the cage, and the seed-box quite empty. I’m sure I shall never forget to feed my little Moricaud; besides, he's such a sharp little fellow, he'll look after himself."

His sister looked at him very gravely, but said nothing more to him. She patted the little dog, saying, "You have a kind master, but I fear he will make you suffer."

Charles and Moricaud were such constant companions, and they grew so attached to each other, that they hardly seemed to be happy except when together. They both slept in the same room, shared the same meals, and always played with one another. Moricaud so entirely absorbed Charley's thoughts that he soon forgot all about poor Dickey and Bunny, his old favourites, and their melancholy ends.

One afternoon Charley's papa took him for a drive up to the market town, about five miles from home. Against his papa's wish, Charley insisted upon having Morry with them. When they reached the street where they were to stop to buy some goods, Charley's papa got out of the chaise, and told Charley to mind the horse. This pleased Charley very much, as he was fond of holding the reins and sitting on the driver's box.

He was engaged in this way for some time, without once thinking of poor Morry. Suddenly, hearing the barking of a dog, he started up from his seat to look for him, but he was gone. Charley began calling him, and whistling for him. All was in vain. So he waited until his father came back with his parcel of goods, hoping to find Morry return with him. But when he at last came, the dog was missing still.

Charley now felt afraid his papa's words, that Morry would be lost if they were to take him with them to the crowded town, would prove true; and he was very much vexed with himself for paying no heed to them. He did not like to tell his papa of his loss, for fear of being justly upbraided for not taking his advice to leave the dog at home.

Charley went home again. His Morry was lost. How miserable he felt when he saw the empty kennel! His sister met him as he was going into the house, and asked where the dog was. Charley said he did not know; he had taken him to town, and missed him there.

"Then he is lost," she replied, "as papa told you he would be. Why didn't you leave him at home? Poor dog! who knows what will become of him?"

Charley said he was very sorry, but he would go next day with the pony and look for him. He did so; he traversed all the streets, but could nowhere find the dog.

"I must advertise for him," thought he, "and offer a reward of ten shillings to any one who will bring him back to me. I have just got enough money to do that."

With this intention he went home. The next day he sent an advertisement to the Daily Messenger office.

Two days passed, but nothing was heard of Morry. In the evening of the following day, a lad brought a dog, tied with a string, and hopping on three legs. Charley was shocked to see poor Morry so lame. He asked the boy where he found the dog. The boy said he picked him up in the High Street; he was lying in the middle of the road, scarcely able to move. A coach-wheel had passed over his leg and crushed it.

"Poor Morry," said Charley, as he stroked and patted the dog, "I have been very cruel to take you to the town, where you have got so badly hurt; but I'm glad you have not been killed. Here," he said to the boy, "take this half-sovereign for your kindness in taking care of my poor dog, and bringing him back to me."

Charley examined Morry's leg, and found it so severely injured that he feared he was lamed for life. And so indeed he was: he was injured beyond all means of cure. Poor Morry was no more able to run and frisk about as he used to do. Charley could no longer make him his playmate; but he still loved Morry, and kept him as comfortably as he could, and Morry seemed quite contented. But this state of things did not last long. Charley soon got tired of looking after Morry, and handed him over to the care of the groom. This lad was a rough fellow, and sometimes ill-used the little lame dog, and neglected to give him his food. He fastened him up to the kennel, and left him for whole days without water to drink. Poor dog! he pined away in a few weeks and died.

That morning when Morry died his moans were heard by Charley's sister, as she was walking up and down the yard, while waiting a few minutes for her brother to go out with her for a walk. She ran to the kennel, and saw the poor dog stretched on the ground, and making his last struggle for life. She called Charley and told him to make haste to see Morry. He came quickly, and to his horror, he saw the poor dog lying lifeless just outside the kennel.

"How thin and wasted he looks!" his sister exclaimed. "Poor dog! he must have been starved to death."

She looked at Charley reproachfully, but said not another word. She saw how grieved he was. Tears were filling his eyes as he looked at the poor shrivelled animal that was once so sleek and well fed. Charley could not answer his sister. He would have said that it was the groom's fault for starving the dog to death, but his conscience told him it was himself who was to blame for giving up the care of Morry to another, when he ought to have looked after him himself; and he felt vexed that he had neglected his duty to poor Morry, and declared to his sister that he was indeed a cruel boy, though he always meant to be a kind one.

His sister remarked, soothingly, that since he had owned his fault she should hope better things of him for the future, and really believed he would take good care of any other dumb creature which he might wish to keep. He thought so too; but Mr. Moore said he would never allow him to have any more pet animals, until he should be a few years older, and know better how to take care of them.

THE STORY OF AN OLD CHESS-BOARD.

"CHECK-MATE."

"The third game I've lost this evening! I declare I won't play any more with you till I'm a better hand at it."

VOL. III.

The speaker, a lad about sixteen, gave an impatient sweep with his hand over the board, and got up from his seat.

"My dear boy," said the other player, "if you play constantly with me you will at last learn to beat me. But come, let us have our coffee, which has been enticing us to drink it for these five minutes."

They sat down at a little table beside the blazing fire, for the night was bitterly cold, and under the joint influence of warmth, some excellent coffee, and his companion's genial talk, the youth soon recovered himself.

"I wish I could stand a beating better," he said; "I never can lose at chess, or any other game, without feeling savage."

"I used to write in my copy-book, long ago, 'Bear defeat with equanimity;' and very good advice it is," said the gentleman. "To suffer losses patiently, and with good humour, is as good, if not better than gaining a victory."

"It's capital in theory, but, for all that, I don't like losing every game, as I've done."

"Come, now, which will you do, Harry: play another game, or listen to the story of a man who once was well beaten at chess, and not only 'bore defeat with equanimity' (and he was a first-rate player), but was quite contented to be beaten? The game or the story—which will you have?"

"Oh, the story, please."

After a few minutes' reflection, the gentleman began:—

At the beginning of this century, lived a curate, with his wife and seven children, in a small village in Derbyshire. In those days, as I dare say you have heard, curates were far worse paid than they are now. Fifty pounds a year, to which a few scholars added a little more, was all our curate had to keep his family with. You may imagine the ceaseless struggle it was for life; but, at least, they were happy—happy in the thought that it was God's will, and, blessed with good health, "doctor's stuff" was little known among them. The village apothecary often laughingly said, "It wasn't at all fair; the curate was always giving him good advice, but did not apply to him for any in return."

At length the doctor's services were required in sad earnest; the youngest child caught a fever, which was quickly taken by two of the others. The first died, his brother and sister recovered; but they were hardly out of danger before their mother, worn out by anxiety and nursing, was stricken down. This was a terrible blow to our poor curate; against every other misfortune he had borne up with Christian fortitude, but now the fear that perhaps his wife would die took hold of his mind, and almost overwhelmed him; and, indeed, he had good ground for fear, for her life was in great danger.

At this trying time his eldest daughter, Jenny, was her father's support and comfort, and bravely helped him to cheer the others. She was one of those who, whatever they put their hand to, do it with their might. The wife was spared, but it was many weeks before she left her room, and now poverty pressed on them more heavily than ever. The neighbours were very kind, and helped their pastor as much as they were able; but as all were poor—they could do but little. The curate had borrowed small sums, much against his will, to provide the comforts so essential for the invalids, and these little debts weighed upon his mind, and added to his distress.

One morning the curate remained in his little study longer than usual after dismissing his few scholars. He was evidently making up his mind to something that was distasteful to him. When he came into the kitchen, which served also for their general living-room, he found his two eldest daughters busy preparing their scanty midday meal; their mother was still confined to her room.

"Here you are at last, father," said Jenny; "dinner is almost ready."

"I am glad of that, my dear, for I want to get it over quickly, and be off."

"Off! where to, father?" Jenny paused in her occupation over the fire, and looked at him with surprise in her large blue eyes. She was a sweet-looking, fair-haired girl of seventeen.

"To Swaleton, to see a friend."

His look and manner appeared to her to be more cheerful and hopeful than it had been for some time past.

"Are you going to sleep there, father?"

"Bless me! no, my dear. I hope to be home again by eight o'clock."

"But, father, you cannot walk there and back," said the younger of the two girls; "it must be nearly eighteen miles."

"I must take my chance of a friendly lift; and, if I don't get one, why, I hope I'm not past my twenty miles a-day, my dear."

"I think there is a storm coming," said Jenny.

"I think my visit may be of service to us, so I hope not," said her father.

The girls said no more in opposition, but went on with their preparations for dinner.

"Jenny, I shall take the chess-board and men with me to Swaleton; I may find some one there who will give me a small sum for them. I do not like parting with such old friends; but poverty often parts the best friends, as surely as misery makes us acquainted with strange bedfellows; so pack them up, my dear."

Jenny could scarcely keep back her tears. She knew the sacrifice her father would make in parting with the old chess-board, for a game of chess was one of his keenest enjoyments. "Poor old thing," she said, with a little laugh, which helped her to hide what she really felt; "I shall be quite sorry to lose it, and I don't think it's worth much to sell, father, is it?"

The curate was not free from the weakness of disliking to hear his property undervalued.

"You do not know the cost of chess-boards, Jenny, or you would not depreciate mine because it's a little worn; it's quite as useful as if it were new."

The only answer Jenny made was to throw her arms round her father's neck, and to kiss him.

When they had dined, the curate began to prepare for his walk to Swaleton; but, just as he was ready, and Jenny was unwillingly packing up the chess-board, quaintly made in the shape of books, the storm, which she had predicted, suddenly and violently began.

"There," said Jenny, with a sigh of relief, "you cannot go now, father, so it's no use packing up the old thing."

The storm continued for half an hour without pause; thunder, lightning, and rain had it all their own way, and there seemed no prospect that they would soon give in.

The curate stood at the window of his wife's room, and unwillingly made up his mind that his journey to Swaleton must be put off. Suddenly he exclaimed, "Who's this, I wonder? A gentleman on horseback, my dear, has stopped at our gate; pretty wet he must be."

He left the room, and ran down-stairs; but before he reached the little garden in front of the cottage, the gentleman was off his horse, and coming in through the gate. The curate hastened forward, and begged him to go into the house while he took his horse to the shelter of a little outbuilding.

When he returned to the house he found his visitor standing before the kitchen fire, the younger children examining him at a respectful distance.

"I fear I am giving you a great deal of trouble," said the stranger, with a foreign accent; "but I really thought it was madness to go on longer through the storm."

"You are heartily welcome, sir; but you will find yourself in poor quarters."

"My dear sir," said the stranger, "I see no fault; a man with a drenched skin——"

"Bless me! I beg your pardon; you are indeed wet," cried the curate, laying his hand upon the stranger's riding-coat. "Jenny, Nannie, quick, girls; get a coat, stockings, and slippers. Let me help you off with your coat at once, sir; my coat is dry, if rather threadbare."

Having made his guest as comfortable as he could, the curate called to the girls to set down the contents of the larder. They had dined, he said, so they could only offer fragments.

The stranger protested he was not hungry.

When, however, bread and cold meat (their dinner for the morrow) was put before him, he eat with much apparent relish.

The curate soon discovered that his guest was possessed of a well-informed mind; and he congratulated himself upon the prospect of a few hours' intellectual enjoyment.

By degrees the stranger began to question his host about himself; and before long he learned the very trying position in which he stood, for the good man's heart was very open to sympathy.

During a pause in their talk, the stranger said, pointing to the chess-board, "You are a chess-player, perhaps?"

"I love the game," said the curate, enthusiastically, "but have little opportunity for play. I do not know that I am much of a player; but my friends about here cannot push me very hard, and I manage to get the best of them. Do you play?"

"I echo your words: I love the game."

"Why should we not play, then? This is too good fortune. Jenny, my child, bring the board here."

As Jenny placed the old chess-board between them, she looked at her father with a meaning smile. He shook his head, and said she was a saucy monkey, and had better take the children away.

The first game, after good play on both sides, was "drawn;" and the stranger expressed some surprise that, after what his host had said, he played so well. "You must know," he said, "that folks call me a first-rate player. I am, indeed, delighted to find so skilful an antagonist."

Put upon his mettle by this praise, the curate put forth his utmost care and skill, and, after a hard struggle, won the next game. His guest was by no means disconcerted, but appeared to be as well pleased as if he had been the conqueror. The rain had long ceased, but the stranger did not seem inclined to go. A third game followed—skilfully contested, step by step, ending at last in the curate's favour.

The stranger was in the greatest delight. He said he did not know when he had enjoyed such play. The curate was equally pleased. Should they have another game?

The stranger looked at his watch. "Dear me!" he said, "I had no idea it was so late. I have some distance to ride. My dear sir, most unwillingly I must go; but I hope it is not the last time I shall be beaten by you. It is no disgrace to suffer defeat at such hands."

The curate received his praises with much modesty; and with many expressions of delight at the good fortune the storm had brought him, he helped his guest to put on his own clothes, which were now dry.

"I hope," said the stranger, as he stood in the little rustic porch, "that your wife will soon recover her health; and that, when I have next the pleasure of seeing you, fortune will have favoured you as much in other matters as she has done to-day at chess." He then mounted his horse and rode quickly away.

"What a nice gentleman! what is his name, father?" said one of the girls, as they stood in the porch, with their father, watching the retreating figure.

"There! I knew there was something I wanted to ask," said the curate; "I never asked his name: he is a perfect gentleman, that's clear; but I must go to your mother now; she will think I have quite forgotten her."

While he was in the midst of telling his wife all that had passed, Jenny came into the room.

"Look here, father; I found these under the old chess-board;" and she held out to him several bank-notes.

"Bless me!" said the curate, "he must have laid them down when he was changing his coat. What is to be done? I hope he will come back for them."

As he spoke, one of the younger children ran into the room, holding up a scrap of paper.

"Papa, this fell from what Jeany found in the chess-board."

On the paper was written, in pencil:—

DEAR AND REVEREND SIR,—I beg you will not hesitate to use these for your present necessity; by doing so you will greatly oblige one who esteems himself fortunate in having made your acquaintance.

The curate handed the paper and the notes to his wife, without speaking. She read, and then looked anxiously in his face.

"It is the gift of Providence," she said; "you will do as he says?"

Her husband made no answer: he could not speak—his heart was full of thankfulness: but he sat down and covered his face with his hand.

The younger children were at a loss to understand what had happened; but, just as they had made up their minds to cry, the curate spoke, his voice shaking with emotion.

"I will, my darling, thankfully use this beneficent gift; and may the same Providence who has sent it enable me one day to repay our benefactor. Truly says the Psalmist, 'Yet helpeth He the poor out of misery, and maketh him households like a flock of sheep.'"

He then explained to his children what had happened, bidding them be thankful to Him from whom all good gifts come.

You may imagine what a happy family they were that evening.

"You need not part with the old chess-board now, father; need you?" said Jenny, as she kissed her father when she bade him good night.

More than a month passed, and there were no tidings of their benefactor. The curate vainly tried to discover him. It was clear that he must live at some distance, as he was unknown in the surrounding neighbourhood. One evening when the good man was at work in his garden, his wife, now almost convalescent, walking about with the younger children, a servant rode up to the gate, and asked if Parson Brownlow lived there.

"I'm Parson Brownlow," said the curate, coming forward to the gate.

The man handed him a letter, saying he was to wait for an answer.

Parson Brownlow seemed quite bewildered when he had read his letter. He rubbed his eyes and his glasses, and fell to reading again. "It must be a joke," he muttered. "Who—who is your master?" he asked the servant.

"The Duke of —," said the man, with some surprise in his tone.

"Yes, yes, so I see," said the curate. "It's wonderful, my dear," to his wife. "Come in with me, and read this letter."

The letter was from the generous stranger. He offered the curate a valuable living in his gift which had just become vacant. "The parsonage is near my own house," he wrote, "so we shall often be able to renew our contest at chess."

I need hardly say that the curate accepted the offer of the living with a thankful heart. He started the next day to see his patron, who lived about fifteen miles off, accompanied by the regrets of his wife that she had not had time to knit a pair of stockings for his grace. And there's my story.

"You see, Harry, what I want to show you is, that there are folks in the world who, when they are defeated (even at a game in which they are very skilful), can take defeat well, and appreciate the skill which has conquered them, instead of turning rusty."

"Oh, yes, I see the moral fast enough; but what a jolly fellow that duke must have been! and I should say they kept that chess-board in lavender ever after."

"It was, and is, greatly valued, as I well know. The curate was my dear father. Often I have heard him tell the story; and many a game I have played on the old chess-board. It is still in my eldest brother's possession."

T. R. M.

POVERTY.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

BY poverty the reader is not to understand at present the bitter, pinching want that goes barefooted and lacks bread. There is enough of that among us, God knows, and the time that would go to comfort it could hardly be better spent. But it will never be consoled by writing essays, not even by coming to the point at once, and saying, "Be ye warmed and fed." Every reader knows as well as I the only sound medicine for the pain that rages at dinner-time when one has had no breakfast.

But there is another kind of poverty, which may be soothed more or less by reason, because its pain is mental. There are people who must work hard, and deny themselves many luxuries, that their income may balance their expenditure; people who want a new hat or gown, and cannot buy it; people who know not what would become of them if sickness kept them from business for a month; people who find Christmas—happy Christmas!—a troublesome and anxious time, because of the bills which follow plum-pudding and roast beef; people who wonder why they cannot get on like Mr. A., nor save like Mrs. B.; people who think twice before sending their boys to a good school, and whose girls do not learn music for want of an instrument, and stay away from such a pleasant gathering as Miss C.'s, because they could never return the invitation. A sharp-sighted observer cannot help catching a glimpse now and then of the carefully-hidden cares, the anxieties anxiously covered by a smile, of respectable and worthy persons (not very clever generally, nor thrifty, but estimable and honest, nevertheless), who are unhappily stopped in life's way by a slippery place, where they cannot climb higher, and are in much secret fear of sliding a good piece down.

Now it is simply absurd to speak as if these things were not evils. When Paul said, "Having food and raiment, therewith let us be content," he did not imply that such content was natural, but just the opposite. It was a thing that required admonition; and it is to this hour a thing that requires special grace. No person likes to walk in a fog, and be quite uncertain what comes next—a hustling stranger or a friend. No person likes to think himself secretly looked down upon by those with whom he started fair; therefore we may not take up any philosophic claptrap about how little a man really wants, and the contentment of Diogenes in his tub. A slight touch of our northern winters, and the rheumatism, would have forced even a cynic to change his lodgings; and Christians are not cynics.

Something may be done, perhaps, by understanding the position. The man in the fog would be glad to know his bearings, and the poor, in their perplexity, might be helped by understanding the meaning of their lot. For is it not continually said, "This life is very perplexing; I don't see why I should be so much worse off than others;" and other complaints, which all come to this—the worst of the matter is that it seems so unreasonable and stupid?

Now every kind of want and privation, and all doubt about our future, is really the consequence of sin. If the Israelites had perfectly kept God's laws, there would have been no poor among them; but the same chapter which told them this, told them also that such a case never would arise: "The poor shall never cease out of the land" (Deut. xv. 4, 11); and our Lord confirms the assertion by saying, "The poor ye have always with you." It is easy to see that if all the wealth in England to-day were guided by generous and unselfish enterprise, there would be no bad wages, no difficulty in finding employment—and congenial employment too—for every one who would work; and if the poor did their part, the workhouses might soon be converted into comfortable almshouses for the aged and the disabled, with no disgrace in going there; the foul diseases that make so much of our misery would rapidly disappear, and every one would begin to feel that his future prospects were tolerably safe.

The fear of slipping down into squalid poverty is born of some person's improvidence, or greed, or sensuality; or rather of the mischief which these are doing, all over the community. But is that a comfort? We think it is. Better far that man should bear the blame, than that we should go about the streets, secretly and by insinuation complaining against God. Better far that we should regard poverty as part of the one great disease with which God is dealing as a cautious but able physician, than as a thing for which he has no sympathy and no care.

Again, poverty is like disease in being only the consequence, not the brand, of sin. It marks the delinquency of the race, not any special short-coming of the individual. When Christ took the likeness of sinful flesh, want was part of what he took. Not only had he no place to lay his head, but we read of him at early morning seeking to satisfy his hunger with unripe fruit—"The time of figs was not yet." And we are expressly taught.

to look upon our sufferings as filling up what remains of his. The poor man is not marked as more sinful than his neighbour; he is only bearing a larger share of what must be distributed between them. He is a kind of martyr for the race—a soldier sorely wounded that his standard may go forward. All refinement, knowledge, art, whatever is graceful and beautiful and elevated, rests upon the toil of weary hands and brows damp with sweat. That is small comfort if the poor know not that all men are united in one family, but a blessed solace if they have heart enough to see a more successful brother in every man of wealth. The stone in the bowels of the earth, unseen, rugged, and dark, bears up the carved and exquisite pinnacle upon which the last ray of evening lingers, and which the first beam of morning loves to kiss. The stone at the foundation, if only a stone, would gain little by that: if part of a united building, it would gain much.

Still, suspense is very painful, and doubt about to-morrow's meal must be agony. But then, it is exactly what Christ taught his people never to feel. The birds are fed; the flowers are clothed; the sparrows are watched; the growth of our bodies goes on without troubling us. If God cares for birds and flowers, which are less than we, shall he not care for us? If he gives us life and stature, which are more than food and clothes, shall he not give us what is least? That a poor Christian should have to ask bread at God's hand in vain, would therefore be as strange as for a flower in a good aspect to be wrong in expecting sunshine. How many gnawing cares, gloomy forebodings, clouded faces, sleepless nights, might be avoided if all Christian people would learn these lessons, not by rote but by heart!

These are duties which committees and societies never can perform, they must be done by the friendly hand and by the kindly voice. The class I speak of gets its morbid dread of ever needing help, from seeing help given reluctantly and haughtily. They see that when the needy are relieved, a claim is too often tacitly set up to servile instead of manly gratitude. They dread poverty because the poor are not treated (as we saw they should be, when they are in distress without crime) like wounded sailors who have a right to the hospital, but rather like lepers who must be shut up in the lazaretto. To remove what is excessive in their dread, benevolence is not enough, and patronage is worse than useless. The work is utterly undone except by those (and we are glad to know many such) who carry further than to the Epistles of Paul the idea that charity means love.

GREAT EXHIBITIONS: MATERIAL, NOT MORAL, IN RESULTS.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

HAVE lately thoroughly examined the International Exhibition at Paris. It is commonly suggested that it will be the last. This one is said to have been too elaborate and perfect for any future competitor; and, if it were not so, that commercial nations are tired of the toil, anxiety, and cost involved in the transmission to and fro of their articles exhibited. I can scarcely regret their discontinuance. Effects were expected from these opportunities of international intercourse which disappointed their projectors. From the first, which, in most respects, was the grandest of them, there was predicted the rise of a better and wiser understanding among peoples of various countries, which would promote the arts of peace, and discountenance the awful folly and multiplied miseries of war. Yet the bloodiest and costliest battles, whose carnage blushes on the pages of history, have been fought during the brief era of international exhibitions. They have proved of no higher influence than that of so many larger bazaars. The annals of commerce comprise a series of great fairs, but fairs have never prevented the foray and the fight. The world is not to be manufactured into peace. Commerce is not the Gospel, nor a substitute for the Holy Spirit of God. These exhibitions might have been blessed, as great international ordinances, instrumental to the spread of righteousness and peace, but that blessing was neither desired nor sought for in the minds of the great mass of their promoters. Religion, in some instances, played a formal part in the programme of their inauguration, or of their close; some few earnest supplications may have mingled, unheard and unsympathised with, on these occasions; but, for the most part, there was no real consecration of the project, no uniform recognition of the Divine presence, no obvious sense of responsibility to his claims, throughout the event. Hence their moral failure. Their material results have, no doubt, been extensively beneficial to the arts and manufactures of the age; they have given an impulse to human enterprise, genius, and invention; but they have corrected no great international error, denounced no generic vice, abated no ungenerous antipathy, removed no selfish envy, nor qualified the jealousy and ambition which originate the unspeakable horrors of war. Nevertheless, there was much connected with these great brilliant efforts calculated, humanly speaking, to promote these happy consummations. It is worth while for Christians to inquire into the cause why the moral results have been so meagre, where the materials were so abundant? In other words, what is the great lesson which serious men may gather from the general issue of the great exhibitions? This lesson seems to be, the utter hopelessness of any attempt to do without God. The invariable penalty attached to setting aside his law, ignoring his authority, and dispensing with his blessing, is to "come to nought."

If there were no other objections to this last exhibition, its flagrant profanation of the Sabbath is enough, and more than enough, to condemn it. Thousands and tens of thousands of English Protestants swarmed with the multitudes of French and other foreign Sabbath-breakers to this huge Vanity Fair, on that day which, in our own country, could not be, at least so publicly, dishonoured. At the same time I am thankful to state that, at a meeting of English and American exhibitors, convened by the zeal and earnestness of a London City missionary, it was resolved to close their stalls on the Sabbath. This quiet protest on behalf of the Lord's Day was adhered to from first to last.

Men may differ as to their views of the Divine obligation of the Sabbath in the Christian economy, but none can dispute the fact, that its secularisation does not stand alone in its iniquity; it is the gauge of religious sentiment in general. A broken Sabbath is, not the only fracture; it proceeds to "more ungodliness." There is no day of all days, no ordinance of all ordinances, on which God has put so much honour, as on his own holy Sabbath; but there is no day to which the ungodly do so much dishonour, and the profanation of which involves so much sin and moral mischief. There is nothing in the whole history of religion so solemn and impressive as God's repeated sanctions of the principle of a Sabbath. As if in significant reference to its own sacred number, as the "seventh" day, it received seven distinct and most emphatic appointments and ratifications. There was (1) the Sabbath sanctified and blessed on the seventh day of creation; (2) its renewal on the seventh day of the miraculous supply of food in the desert; (3) its incorporation as the fourth commandment in the Decalogue; (4) its appointment in the Jewish system for every seventh year; (5) its reimbursement to the land, by the seventy years' captivity, of the number of Sabbatical years of which Palestine had been deprived; (6) its commemoration in the jubilee; and (7) the great final Sabbath of the world, in the prophetic "rest that remaineth for the people of God." The religion of Judah rose or sank according as her Sabbaths were hallowed or abandoned, and the same result has been ever the rule, whether with individuals or with communities. The evil impulse, strong enough to burst the bars of the Sabbath, bears away with it every weaker obligation; and no marvel. Of all the Divine ordinances, it was the first of the sacred series dating from creation; of all God's ordinances, it was appointed to occupy the largest space of human life, viz., the seventh part; of all, it was the most constantly mingled with human life, by its recurrence every seventh day; of all, it was the most powerfully impressed on the human mind by miracle, by memorable changes in the condition of society, and by alternate declarations of Divine punishment and reward. An era which, like Jeshurun, has "waxed fat and kicked" against the Sabbath of the Lord, will sooner or later, in some shape or other, find it "hard to kick against the pricks." "No Sabbath" is the historical synonym of "no God." It is the atheism in our chronology which provokes God to avenge, by our expulsion from his eternity, our rejection of his authority in time.

If the example of these Sabbath-breaking exhibitions on the Continent should have the effect of loosening our sense of Sabbatic obligation and reverence for the house of God, no material advantage arising out of the competition in arts and manufactures, will compensate that serious damage. I forbear dwelling on other undesirable influences of the foreign exhibitions, or the moral sentiment of our fellow-countrymen: the open, public, legal desecration of the Sabbath is the fountain-head whence many evils spring. It was one of the worst blots on the great French revolution, that its leaders formally abolished the institution of the Sabbath. Succeeding governments repealed the obnoxious letter of the abolition; but, by legalising all kinds of traffic, and labour, and public amusements on that day, the Sabbath is practically as obsolete as if it had never survived the iniquity of its formal abrogation. Its general desecration lingers, like a chronic judgment, on the national infidelity which once so blasphemously abjured it. The occurrence of such scenes as exhibitions only renders more prominent, more palpably profane, the views and habits which previously existed. The same effects would, of course, follow every legal trespass upon the Sabbath in our own country. The sacred day is practically secularised to a vast extent among us already, but this is the act of individual Sunday-traders, revellers, and travellers, for which the nation is not responsible. But once let the law formally sanction the opening of public exhibitions, and legalise the pursuit of ordinary callings on the Sabbath, which would practically repeat the revolutionary abolition, only in a less direct form, and then the guilt becomes national. And nations are punished for their national sins, as individuals bear the penalty of their individual offences.

A caution may be suggested here. It is not to keep the Sabbath, merely to cease from our daily labours. Thousands do this, and devote the day to themselves, as a whole-burnt offering to the world and the flesh. In numbers of instances they would have actually sinned less against God, and against their own interests, had they been at work in their callings. True, the work would have violated the commandment, but the revelling and excess more contemptuously treads the institution under foot. Not that the Sabbath is, or ever should be, the gloomy ascetic day which some mistaken Christians make it; so much so, that their families abhor the sacrifice of the Lord. That is not the spirit of the holy rest which offers its genial comfort and delight in public communion with God and his people. It is a festival, not a fast; breathing more of the silvery notes of jubilee, than of the "sighing of the children of Israel by reason of their bondage." The Jews, in former ages, had suffered so severely from their neglect of the Sabbath, that, subsequent to the captivity, they fell into the other extreme of ultra-scruple. It became a superstitious rather than devotional solemnity, in their modes of observing it. The spirit of the Sabbath evaporated in their numerous and most irksome interdicts. Its religion sank under a crowd of rites, crushed, like the unbelieving lord of Samaria, under the feet of his own countrymen.

We urge no such harsh, unhappy, and unprofitable Sabbatism. Let it be the cheerfulest day of the week, the first in family joyfulness, as it is the first in chronological order. Keep the day for God, and for the souls of your households. But be very jealous for the Lord of hosts when any proposal meets you to trench upon its legal separation from secular uses. For the sake of your own souls, for the sake of your children after you, and for the sake of the poor, whose Sabbath is the Divine patrimony which too many of them, in ignorance of its value, would part with for the first mess of pottage which the special pleading of the ungodly sets before them, rescue their Sabbath rest for them, in spite of themselves. Be no party to the abridgment of one jot or tittle of its hallowed claims upon all men's love and reverence. The world will still have its vanity fairs, its great shows and pageantries, its marts and merchandise, its graven and molten images. These things you cannot help; but you can, and you must, at your souls' peril, resist the influence of such demonstrations, when their tides set in against the sacred dues of God and man. Happily, there exists some counteracting influence of numbers on the right side, to help to save you from the wrong. If the world allures you to "follow the multitude to do evil," your God and Saviour welcomes you to his sanctuary with "the multitude to keep holy day." The Church has her "great congregation" on earth, and she has a larger in heaven—the "great multitude which no man can number." There will be the glorious exhibition of the truly great and good of all nations, peoples, and tongues. Splendid and imposing in their way have been these earthly shows; but "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive," the infinite majesty and beauty, the diversified magnificence of the glory, that shall be revealed, when all flesh shall see it together—when the Son of Man shall come arrayed in the clouds of heaven, attended by all his holy angels, and accompanied by ten thousand times ten thousand of the redeemed saints, clad in their fine linen robes, washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb—when harps of cherubim and seraphim, and, it may be, other instruments of celestial music, shall blend in the lofty anthem, swelling "as the voice of many waters," chanting the new song of praise to Him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever. Would you barter your believing interest in this grand everlasting ultimate of all times and seasons, for the fleeting pageantries which the very hands that raised them dismantle and remove, as if in instinctive admission of the fate of all earthly shrines, so soon left without one stone upon another?

What a prodigality of human industry and genius, followed by the wholesale waste of human labour in their removal, these costly erections seem! But you, who resting in Jesus as the Master Builder, and through the power of his Holy Spirit are building up yourselves in your most holy faith for an habitation of God, not a stone that is laid on that foundation, not a gem of grace which decorates the erection, not a work of faith or labour of love which has been contributed to its progress, will be lost or missed in that day when your Lord shall number up his jewels.

Dwell upon this prospect, realise your own covenant inheritance in it. Seek, in the study of God's Word, in communion with his Son, and in the fellowship of his Holy Spirit, your daily increase in meetness for its august associations; and answer every temptation to draw off your lofty sympathies to any inferior, earthly, or sensual distraction, in the dignified words of Nehemiah: "I am doing a great work, and I cannot come down."

She lay against my breast."—p. 266.

ASLEEP.

A ROSY face is pressed to mine,
Soft golden ringlets kiss my brow;
The loving arms that wont to twine
Round me, are quiet now.

Two pattering feet, of fairy size,
Are wearied with the chase of June;
Even the Daisy shuts her eyes
In sleep, this summer noon.

How shall I move, and leave her here?
Will she not wake when I am gone?
Steal softly! hush! ah, needless fear,
She heeds not, sleeping on.

To look at her, I blame my heart,
And grieve that it can be so dull
To make its own Faith's glorious part,
So slow Love's flowers to cull.

I know she is not perfect—know
That latent sin too oft will spring;
That good thoughts pass like virgin snow,
Or birds shot on the wing.

I know that nought is perfect here—
That Nature's taint is deep and long;

But oh! sweet rushing waves I hear,
And distant, heavenly song—

"Christ's precious blood for her was shed!"
Like sunlight o'er baptismal wave,
His glory-crown, that golden head!
Her sins lie in His grave!

Meanwhile, since all things lovely tell
Of perfect loveliness and bliss,
May I not prize and love them well,
And thrill to Daisy's kiss?

I watched her struggling hard to sleep,
Because we bade her rest at noon;
Tight shut the bright eyes tried to keep,
But sleep fled like a tune.

At last, with one long, weary sigh,
She ceased to struggle so for rest;
And then it came—as, quietly,
She lay against my breast.

So let me cease, in self-despair,
To seek Thy rest through toil of mine;
And lay my heart with all its care
And weariness on Thine!

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MATCH-MAKING.

THAT marriages are made in heaven, they must be very often marred on earth by the intervention of the match-maker. The person who sets up as a special providence in this particular province of human affairs, has need of something more than human wisdom, when one thinks of all the consequences that may flow from matching the wrong people. If two people who were happily made for a true marriage, and all the blessedness it brings, are divided by such intervention, and allotted each to somebody who was never intended for them, who knows where the mischief of mis-matching is to stop? It is the slightest possible chance if it is bounded by the first four concerned. In all likelihood it is the efficient cause of a long list of matrimonial disasters. One can fancy a whole world thrown out of gear by a single couple going astray in this fashion.

Margery Oglivie was to all appearance the last person in the world to turn match-maker. She was neither stupid nor good-natured. She was, however, essentially an arbitrary woman; and the arbitrary will desire to arbitrate in the chief matter affecting human destiny. She was also a woman of few ideas, and with a strong tendency to act upon the few that took possession of her: and she was possessed with the idea that it would be the best thing in the world to make a match between Peggy and Horace Oglivie, and for no other reason had she brought the distant cousins together under the same roof, and made the former appear so very desirable an object to the latter. She was at once more delicate and more clumsy than the practised match-maker, for she had never mentioned the one to the other, and had been content to see what she thought a mutual friendliness spring up between them.

The vast wealth in the course of accumulating for the heir of the Oglivies was at the root of her desire. It may seem strange that the more there was to divide, the less willing she was to have it divided. But this is a common feeling. A man is much more likely to divide a moderate fortune than a colossal one. The latter lays hold of the imagination with a unity of its own, and the possessor is taken possession of by a passion to transmit it entire. If it fell to her to transmit, Margery longed to transmit the lands and the accumulated wealth which they had produced, together; she would not divide them between these two claimants; and Peggy had become a claimant as soon as her parentage was established. If it fell to her legally, it would fall entire, and in that case it could only be kept in the family by her marriage with an Oglivie.

Then she longed to keep Peggy near her, with her beauty, and her goodness, and her winning sweetness; and, above all, she longed, if her life should not be spared, that the natural guardians of her brother should owe it to her to guard him tenderly. She really meant to promote Peggy's happiness. She saw how dreary her life would become if she took Janet's place at her side; even Janet had confessed at last her secret rebellion. She had too little knowledge of the world, and in some ways of the human heart, though she had sounded some of its most awful depths, to know the possibilities of misery which she might create; but she knew enough to watch for and to welcome every sign and token of goodness in Horace Oglvie: and what she desired to see she saw. His devotion to his mother, and the evident refinement of his tastes and habits, were to her evidences of enormous weight. And if she had doubted the goodness of his heart, she acknowledged that she had done so unreasonably, especially after the part she conceived that he had taken in saving her brother's life.

She was, therefore, prepared to do more than acquiesce, when Horace Oglvie seized his opportunity to ask her to favour his suit. He had had to wait for the chance of speaking to her on the subject, for she did not leave her post by her brother's bed for more than a few minutes at a time, to take her hasty meals, or to snatch a breath of fresh air in the rapidly-greening garden; and while he waited, he had time to reflect on the desperate condition in which he would find himself if he failed in gaining his object. His honour was pledged to win; and men like him think of their honour long after they have ceased to regard that humble and useful virtue—common honesty.

With Margery on his side, however, he could hardly fail; but he was still in the dark with regard to her views, and, fearful that she might oppose the marriage for some crotchet or other, it was with some trepidation that he approached her on the subject. He was greatly relieved, therefore, to find that she not only approved, but was likely to help him in his purpose, and to help him in the most needful matter of an income. She was ready to bestow on Peggy, as a marriage portion, the money which was to have bought back Delaube—the savings of a quarter of a century, from the liberal allowance granted to the sisters on behalf of their brother, by the factor appointed to take care of the estate during his perpetual minority. This, and the mine of wealth which he had stumbled on in the accommodating Mr. Haldane, would surely suffice until the inheritance should be theirs. Nay, he had reason to believe that Margery, once in possession, would be more liberal still—would not allow them to wait for her decease to enter into the enjoyment of the splendour in store for them.

Their brief conference thus ended in mutual gratification. Margery was inclined to regard Horace with greater favour than ever, seeing that his views not only coincided with her own, but that he had confided them to her, and implored her assistance.

Meantime Peggy was making further acquaintance with her new-found father. He was restless, irritable, peevish. He asked innumerable questions, some of which his daughter could not answer, but which served to give her an insight into his character. He showed considerable anxiety as to the transfer of the little property, and a still greater desire that she should not allow the fact of his return to be bruited abroad. He had "enemies." He was one of those people who are always having enemies: that is to say, they have once had friends, and have made use of them rather too much and too often. He seemed also anxious that Peggy should find out how Margery was affected towards him, and in this he grew so urgent as the day advanced, that he almost hurried Peggy away, making her promise to send him a message that night if possible.

What the daughter thought of the father it would be difficult to define. With her natural reverence, she tried to cover over what would not remain hidden from her clear, true sight. Then pity strove with what, but for this filial reverence, would have been dislike. She tried to think of what he might have been, instead of what he was. She found herself tracing in his features a resemblance to Captain Oglvie; but the resemblance was a painful one. They both had the Oglvie face, with more or less of manly beauty, but with its hint of a beast of prey about the mouth and in the long, white teeth.

Louis Oglvie was destitute of principle, and bankrupt in affection. He had no faith, either human or divine. To "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," was evidently his entire creed. His moral nature was as much paralysed as his father's limbs had been, and, to his daughter's thinking, he was the sadder spectacle of the two. When she saw how feeble was his health, her heart yearned over him with a boundless pity—a passionate desire to heal and help him. She was sure, whatever might once have been, that he did not love his wife. Of his way of living he said nothing, and of her he would not be tempted to speak, and seemed uneasy when Peggy spoke of her. All the piety of the girl's character woke in the desire to devote herself to this poor blighted life: the Spirit of the living God alone could quicken the equally blighted soul.

The news she carried back with her was received with astonishment, quite unmingled with pleasure. Margery and the captain were both equally chagrined, and they did not quite conceal the feeling. Peggy had to bear up bravely to hide the bitter disappointment swelling her own heart. She could ask for no sympathy in such a sorrow as this; that she had found her father, and in finding him had lost out of her life the very idea of fatherhood: who could understand or comfort her in this?

A few days ago the event might have deranged the plans both of Margery and of Horace Oglvie. Now it could scarcely matter. For poor Sir Alexander the end seemed near at hand, and in that event Margery became sole arbitress of the family fortunes, Louis Oglvie was of no account at all, and would hardly wish to interfere between his daughter and her. Indeed, Margery confided to the captain that she would not be long in getting rid of him. She had always found him more tolerable than his father. She had known him in his early youth, in the bloom of his boyish beauty, and considering what his life had been, she wondered that he was not worse. The negation of goodness in his character would not strike her at all, as it struck his daughter, as something almost more deadly than positive badness.

Therefore Margery proposed that she herself should drive over and see him, as soon as it was possible for her to do so. With this message, which was carried by Peggy herself on the morrow, he was obliged to content himself. And it seemed now as if all his desires centred in seeing Margery, while she was detained, day after day, by her brother's side.

And while Sir Alexander lingered on the brink of death, and Peggy was going to and fro between the houses, Horace Oglivie was suddenly called away. He had got the money from Mr. Haldane, and leaving his cause safe in Margery's hands, he was by no means averse to going, in order to recreate himself a little. His attitude towards Peggy during those days had been tender and deprecating, like that of a still undeclared lover, and she was powerless to do aught but accept the silent homage. He gave her no opportunity of rejecting it or him; and yet she felt that every hour which passed over her, while that attitude was maintained, narrowed her chance of escape. She had indeed come to feel that there was but one way of escape open to her, and that lay with her father. She had not given up the hope that he might take her away with him still.

Then Horace departed, saying, "Farewell for the present," in Margery's presence, and not attempting to see Peggy alone. He simply promised to write, and to write to her, as if she was the one to whom he owed allegiance, and who would expect such consideration. And he promised to return speedily—to return immediately, if wanted, and the latter part of this promise had reference to the end which seemed so near, and which had solemnised and toned down their present parting.

But the end was not to be death, after all; at least, not soon. The weakling had bent in the blast, but the blast had gone over him, and left him still rooted in the earth. In a day or two the fever left him. The doctor had pronounced the verdict, that if he could live through that, he could live through anything: and he had lived.

Then Margery had felt herself, to a certain extent, released, and, true to her word, she hastened at once to Louis Oglivie. She refused Peggy's company on the occasion, stating with her accustomed plainness that she would much rather go alone; so that on that day Peggy did not see her father. What transpired between Margery and him, the former did not say, and Peggy was glad to know simply that the interview had been a friendly one.

The next day she went early to Delaube, where the precautions against entrance had, for some reason or other, relaxed. Tammas was afield, and she found Jean, not bustling about as usual, but sitting, weary and depressed, by the kitchen hearth, where no preparations for Mr. Louis's late breakfast were being made.

"He's not up yet, I suppose?" said Peggy.

"Up!" repeated the old woman. But she quickly dropped her usual testy tone, and fell into a low complaining key. "He can rise when he likes. He's been up hours ago, and awa' wi' the early coach."

"To Bleaktown? He'll be back in the evening then," said his daughter.

"Na, na," said Jean, sadly; "he'll no be back again. He's gane for good an' aye" (for ever).

"Without saying good-bye," said Peggy, with a sinking heart, yet speaking quietly, as she had already learned to speak of him to Jean. "Did he leave no message?"

"He said he was sorry not to see you again, but I tell'd him I didna believe him. He had no call to hurry away like that. I've seen the last o' Louis Oglivie," said the old woman, thinking more of herself, and her own grievance against him, than of his sorrowful child. "Wha' could ha' thoct the bonnie boy I nursed on my knee, wi' his golden hair and saft kisses, would turn to that grey, cauld-hearted man!"

"Jean! Jean!" said Peggy, trying to hide her grief. "Had her coming anything to do with his going away?" she added, alluding to Margery's visit.

"She may have helped him wi' siller," answered Jean—"the weary siller!"

Peggy could bear up no longer. She moved toward the door. She would go up to her own old room, with the burden of her care and grief.

"Ye'll maybe miss some things," said Jean, stopping her, and speaking in another tone. "He's ta'en a' that he could tak' awa' wi' him. I fancy he would ha' left little but the bare wa's, but that he couldna help himsel'. He couldna carry a coo (cow) a' the way to France wi' him, nor yet a meal ginel."

Louis Oglivie had packed up all the valuables that remained in the house, even to the old silver candlesticks, and had taken them with him, thereby exciting Jean's utmost wrath and grief.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SANDIE'S SOFA.

ALL this time Peggy had been forced to neglect her old friends. She had only once visited the Grants since Sandie had been laid up with his accident, and then her visit had been short and unsatisfactory. The extent of her old playfellow's suffering had not been made known to her, and she had also been deceived into the idea that it was only a slight matter, by the cheerfulness which was maintained in his presence by all the family, especially by Archie.

The truth was that he had suffered severely, but it was still hoped that nothing worse would come of it than a term of suffering; and he was very patient.

and seemingly very cheerful, in the midst of his protracted pain. His father would have it that he enjoyed suffering, because it saved him the more troublesome necessity of doing; and there was a grain of truth at the bottom of the affectionate fiction: in his present state of existence, Sandie had simply to be. But the poor young fellow had enjoyed the use of those lithe limbs of his; they had been, indeed, the most active part of him, and there were times when his heart was very heavy, with the foreboding that he might never be able to use them so actively again: for the injury was even more serious than had been at first supposed, and so diseased had the injured limb become, that the doctor had whispered the dreadful word "amputation." This, however, Dr. and Mrs. Grant had kept to themselves, that, in the meantime, their son might have all the support which youthful hope can give, and that Archie might be the better able to cheer his brother.

Then it mended a little, and the doctor, fearing for his general health, had ordered a temporary crutch, that he might move from room to room, and, if possible, get into the garden on sunny days. So the crutch had been procured, and a grand commotion it made in "the boys'" room while it was being tried—Archie hopping about on one leg, to prove its sufficiency, and Sandie seriously practising, and seriously failing.

"Lean on me, old fellow," said the former, when the latter was almost ready to give it up in despair; and, leaning with one hand on his brother's shoulder, and using the crutch with the other, Sandie at last made his appearance in his mother's drawing-room.

After that, the sofa was set in the sunniest window, and he came down thus every day, and lay there when he was tired of moving about, which was very speedily—a visit to his father's study, and a turn or two in the garden, sufficing to weary him of his new and difficult mode of locomotion. And Sandy's sofa soon became the family centre. Round it they all gathered, at all times of family meeting—at meal-times, and at prayers, and for readings and discussions. By it the doctor paced up and down in meditation, and Mrs. Grant sat and worked, and Archie lounged and chattered. In it, stuffed into all the corners, were to be found the newest books and papers, and the last copy of Blackwood or the Edinburgh Review. And David Haldane was often to be found there now; Archie had not rested till his new friend was his brother's also. With him he would ever share the best he had.

It was generally on Saturday afternoons, or on Sunday evenings, that David Haldane managed to come and spend an hour or two by Sandie's sofa, thus showing that he had already become a privileged friend, whom the parents gladly welcomed, for the sake of their sick son.

One evening Mr. Haldane had Sandie all to himself; the others had gone to a meeting in the school-house. They would hardly have left him, if they could have imagined the depths of despondency into which he was now apt to fall. Yet, if at any moment they had returned upon him, he would have made an attempt at cheerfulness, and readily have succeeded, not only in imposing on them, but in restoring himself. But the black gulf was in his soul, however he might turn his back upon it, and avoid gazing down into the darkness which drew and fascinated him.

But with David Haldane he was less on his guard, less solicitous to hide his trouble, and he had not been long with him before, in the desire to unburden his heart, he had opened up the subject of his doubts and difficulties.

He was as usual surrounded with books of the lighter sort, for it was an understood thing in the house that all sorts of indulgences were to be granted to him; therefore, even on Sunday, his books were not banished, as they might otherwise have been, even by a man so little strict in such matters as Dr. Grant; but Sandie had not been taking advantage of his indulgences. From behind the sofa pillow he pulled out an old volume, which had the venerable appearance of a lengthy theological treatise. Despite its age, it seemed to have been very little used. It was evidently not of the light order of literature. It was, in fact, "The Confession of Faith."

"I have been reading this," he said. "Have you ever seen it?"

It may seem strange that he should ask this, but, indeed, that venerable work is very seldom even seen by those who profess to believe what it contains. David took it, examined, and shook his head over it.

"I should think very few read it through," he replied.

"We are bound to believe it, though," said Sandie.

David demurred to this.

"A minister of the church is, at least, bound to believe it," continued the young man, "and I can't agree with it on a good many points. What ought I to do?" he asked, earnestly.

"I don't think you can swallow all this at once, and I don't think it would do you any good, if you could. If a child could digest a man's food, even that wouldn't make a man of him in a minute. It takes time to grow in the body, and I fancy it does the same in the spirit. I wouldn't advise you to take in all this at once. It would go against my stomach, I know," said David, as he turned over the yellow, closely-printed leaves, and scanned their contents. "I would advise you simply to believe as much as you can."

"Take up one doctrine and reject another? is that what you mean?"

"No; I don't mean that you should reject anything, unless you find it utterly unbelievable, and contradicting something which you do really believe. Simply believe as much as you can, and let the rest alone."

"But it all hangs together, you know—it's all part of a grand scheme, and I can't give up a part of it, without giving it up altogether."

"Giving up this, you mean," said David, touching the volume; "but that's not giving up faith. I think true faith is very like a tree, Sandie; it all grows from a single root: a man's beliefs all hang together, but not like the propositions here—any man can take them asunder and arrange them differently—more like the branches that have grown out of a seed. True faith will grow into the same kind of tree in you and in me, if we have the root of it in our hearts, but there may not be two branches exactly the same between us. No man can think a thing, any more than do a thing, exactly like another man, except in the mathematics, and we have not been able to get a creed done into theorems."

"But then a minister is bound to teach the doctrines of the 'Confession,'" urged Sandie; "and how can he do that if he does not believe them?"

"That's a different matter," confessed David.

"Yes," said Sandie, vehemently. "You can't undertake to teach what you don't know, and you don't know what you can't believe. Man, a minister must take this" (lifting the book) "word for word, and I can't take it, and so I can't be a minister."

"Wait a bit, Sandie," said his companion. "I don't know all that may be in the book, nor how it may be worded, but you may come to believe a great deal more than is there, if you begin with ever so little. There's no question of your having to enter the ministry for a year or two."

"I would like to be a schoolmaster," said Sandie. "You're always beginning at the beginning there. There's no need for going far into things. I can't help doing that for myself, but I wouldn't like to lead others, and land them where there was nothing to stand on, and maybe no room to turn. And do you know, I think this leg will never be sound again. I'll be a cripple dominie," he went on, smiling with pathetic sweetness—"a lame old bachelor; I'll never marry."

"What puts that in your head?" said David, smiling too at the sad fancies of his companion.

"Why, you see," he answered, "to speak in a parable, if Archie and I couldn't both have a thing, we'd neither of us have it. Many's the coveted treasure mother's had to put away for that very reason; or we'd agree to have it time about, if we couldn't have it both at once. But we can't do that with some things, you know—a wife, for instance," he added, archly.

Soon after, the family returned, and David took his leave. Archie accompanied him part of the way. They were speaking of Sandie. David kept his counsel, but Archie said, "Don't you think he looks better to-night?" and when David assented, he added, "But you should see how dismal he is sometimes, when he thinks nobody notices. I think you do him more good than any of us, and I wish Peggy—that's Miss Oglivie," he explained—"would come; that would cheer him best of all."

"But I thought it was you who had lost your heart in that quarter," said David, trying to speak in an unconcerned tone.

"So I had," he said, bravely, "but I wouldn't have her when Sandie had set his heart on her; and it doesn't matter," he added, "for she's for none o' us, I fancy."

"You're a pair of as fine creatures as ever God made," said David Haldane to himself. But for all that, he thought that his friend Archie might possibly change his mind if he had the chance. Then he considered that it would be well to tell him, and through him, Sandie, what he knew of Peggy's engagement. It was soon told, and, with little more said on either side, they separated for the night. Archie forgot that it was Sunday, and went back whistling to himself the tune of an old ditty of luckless love.

CHARLIE'S HOLIDAY.

THE busy streets of the manufacturing town of Stockley were flooded with golden sunshine, except where the tall mill-chimneys threw long shadows on the ground. An eager multitude of men and women, boys and girls, were pouring out of one of the largest of these mills, glad to breathe once more the free air of heaven, and escape from the hot, stifling dust inseparable from their employment among the filmy cotton-down and the perpetually-moving machinery.

"Oh, I wish we could have a holiday, and go out for the whole day somewhere," said a boy about fifteen, as he stepped into the glad sunshine.

"I mean to have one somehow," said another about the same age.

"How will you manage it, Tom?" asked the first speaker, "you see we can't afford to lose a day now, after being out of work so long."

"No, but we might get the master to grant us a day, I should think," replied Tom; "at all events, I've made up my mind to try it on, if a few others will join me. I shall ask the foreman of our room to let us youngsters off for a day."

"You won't get it, Tom, I know," said a third, who joined them at this moment, "I was down in the counting-house this afternoon and heard the governor give orders for all the machinery to be looked over, that nothing might have to be done during work hours, because a press of work had come in, and nothing must hinder the hands."

"Bother!" ejaculated Tom. "I dare say you was glad enough to hear it, for you saintly fellows like to make life as miserable as you can; but I'll get a holiday somehow," he added, in a determined tone.

"How?" asked his companion.

"I don't know yet, Jim; but I'll manage it, and serve that sneaking Charlie Scott out, too."

"Charlie Scott didn't bring the press of work, if he heard of it," returned Jim.

"No, but I owe him a grudge, and I'll serve him out. I hate his quiet, saintly ways;" and he cast a malignant glance at the retreating figure of Charlie, who had hastened on.

Tom was true to his word, and asked for the holiday, but, as Charlie predicted, was refused. The three boys worked close together in the same department of the mill, and if one needed a holiday—a breath of pure fresh air from clover or corn-fields—more than another, it was Charlie Scott. His companions usually spent the Sunday afternoon and evening in strolling out into the country, or going a trip to some distant tea-gardens; while Charlie was teaching in the close, hot ragged-school.

Tom chose to fancy that Charlie was glad he had been refused—although he assured him he was not—and vowed to his chosen companion, Jim, to be even with him before long.

A few days afterwards, as they were leaving the mill, Charlie ran up to the two.

"Have you seen anything of my clasp-knife?" he said, addressing them and one or two others at the same time. "I dropped it out of my pocket this afternoon, but couldn't stop to pick it up then, and now I can't find it."

"No," answered both the boys; and Charlie returned to look round once more, while the others pressed on out to the gates. As soon as these were passed, and they were unobserved, Tom drew Jim aside, and putting his hand to his pocket, drew out a strong, clumsy-looking knife.

"Why, that's Charlie's!" exclaimed Jim.

"Is it now?" said Tom, derisively.

"What are you going to do with it?" asked Jim.

"Get a holiday, and serve the young saint out too," replied Tom.

"Oh, Tom, don't—don't do anything——"

"Don't be a chicken-hearted ninny," interrupted Tom, with a mocking laugh. "I tell you what, Jim, I mean to have a holiday, and you must help me."

"How? what must I do?" said Jim, turning pale, for he was afraid of Tom, and would not have been such a bad boy but for Tom's influence over him.

"Well, you must bring a good, stout knife with you to the mill to-morrow. I shan't trust you with any more just now."

The next morning Tom's first question was about the knife, and when he found Jim had not brought it, he threatened to serve him out too, if it was not brought after dinner. Under fear of this threat, Jim took it in the afternoon.

"Now we can do it," said Tom, triumphantly.

Again the weary workers filed out into the glad, golden sunshine, all but Tom and Jim; and, unseen by the foreman or any of the workpeople, they lingered a few minutes behind. The mischief was quickly done, and before the last stragglers had passed the mill-gates, Tom and Jim were out too.

"Oh, won't it be fun to-morrow morning!"

"But if we should get found out," said Jim.

"But we shan't, you ninny; I've made all sure about that, as luck would have it."

"Why, what have you done?"

"Well, for one thing, I've told all the hands that Charlie found his knife yesterday; and, as though the young donkey was determined to get the blame, he began talking about a holiday—how much he wanted one this afternoon. I drew him on to say more, and that will all come out against him by-and-by. Oh, never fear, we've done it too clever to be found out." And thrusting his hands into his pockets, he broke into a merry whistle.

But if Tom could be merry, Jim could not. How he dreaded going back the next morning, when the discovery would be made! He would gladly have stayed at home, could he have made any excuse for doing so, but his father, he knew, would not admit any, and so he was obliged to go.

The moment he had lain and thought of, and pictured, and dreaded, came at last.

"What is that?" exclaimed the foreman, as the whirling wheels suddenly came to a standstill—"a strap broken?" stepping to where the nearest one hung.

"Yes, sir, and here's another, and another," cried several of the workers, who, recovering from their astonishment, soon found their tongues.

The foreman looked in blank surprise to where the heavy straps hung loosely from wheel and beam. "This is very strange," he said. "This has been cut," he added, taking the ends of the one nearest to him. He went on to the others and examined them. "This wilful damage must be inquired into," he said. "All keep your places, while I send for Mr. Sharpe."

Mr. Sharpe, the manager, soon entered, and after examining the straps, and ordering them to be instantly repaired, that no time might be lost, proceeded to make inquiries as to who left the room last on the previous evening. No one had seen the two boys linger behind, and therefore every one answered that they went out with the rest when the bell rung; and thus they escaped detection.

But before the questioning on this point was quite over, the foreman produced a knife, which had been picked up near the damaged machinery.

"Whose is this?" asked Mr. Sharpe, quickly, addressing the group of boys who stood near.

"Charlie Scott's," answered half-a-dozen voices.

"Send him to me instantly," said the manager; and the next minute Charlie stood before him, wondering not a little to see his lost knife in the manager's hand.

"This is yours, I hear," said Mr. Sharpe, sternly, holding up the knife.

"Yes, sir," answered the boy; "I lost it two or three days ago."

"But you found it again, I hear," said the foreman; and without heeding Charlie's denial of this, he turned and addressed Mr. Sharpe. "I think I can unravel the mystery of the cut straps through that knife," he said; "the hands have been wanting a holiday, but I told them it was impossible, and thought the subject was at an end, until yesterday Scott brought it up again. Now, I can understand that he had made up his mind to have one, and so cut the straps to cause a stoppage, when he thought the hands would have to be turned out while the repairs were done."

"But the hands shall not turn out," said Mr. Sharpe; "hurry them on with the repairs, and note the time it takes, and let it be made up after work-hours."

The consternation of the workpeople when they heard this, may be better imagined than described; but poor Charlie trembled with terror and astonishment at the charge brought against him, more especially, when Mr. Sharpe, turning to him, said, angrily, "Follow me to my room; I must inquire further into this."

What passed in the manager's room did not transpire for some hours; but Charlie did not return to his work, and Jim grew uneasy lest he should have been discharged for the mischief he had helped to perpetrate. Tom congratulated himself and Jim, too, upon their lucky escape; but Jim could not get over the terror he had passed through while the others were being questioned, and the sight of Charlie's white, frightened face, as he left the room, was continually before him, and he hoped—how earnestly no one knew—that Mr. Sharpe would let Charlie off.

But this hope was doomed to disappointment. In a short time the news had spread that Charlie Scott had been sent to prison, for the wilful damage done to the machinery. The master would not have been so hard, people said, but the boy was obstinate, and would not confess how he did it, even though it was promised that he should not be punished if he did so. Jim heard what was said, and his misery was increased tenfold. Tom heard it too, and for a moment his heart seemed touched, he did not think the punishment would have been so severe. He had been wishing all day that he had not done the mischief, seeing that it had only brought more work upon them, and now he began to regret it for Charlie's sake likewise.

"Oh, Tom, what shall we do!" said Jim, as soon as they were alone together, "I never was so miserable in my life before."

"Oh, I dare say not," said Tom, shortly; "I suppose you'd like us to go and tell Mr. Sharpe that we did that little bit of business last night."

"I've been thinking we ought," said Jim, timidly.

"Ought we! you'd better not let me catch you at it, though," replied Tom, getting into a passion; and, seeing Jim was not likely to be of any use in cheering his own dull spirits, Tom walked on and left him.

All that night Jim lay awake—actually afraid to close his eyes, for whenever he did so Charlie's pale, terror-stricken face rose up before him, looking so beseechingly at him, just as Charlie had really looked once or twice when asking him to go to school or church, instead of joining Tom in some Sunday excursion. How he wished he had taken Charlie for his friend now, and followed his advice. He should never be happy again he thought; but the dark, dreary prison and Charlie's sad, beseeching eyes would always be before him.

The result of these thoughts ended in his getting up very early—before he could possibly see Tom, of whom he felt very much afraid—and going to Mr. Sharpe's house. The manager was not up, but when told it was about the damage done to the machinery, he did not keep him waiting long.

"Well, my boy," he said, "what do you know of this?"

Jim hung his head, but in a trembling voice said, "Please, sir, I did it," and then burst into tears.

Mr. Sharpe was greatly astonished, and put many questions to him, which Jim did not find very easy to answer, as he had made up his mind not to betray Tom. From his answers Mr. Sharpe found this out at length, and resolved to push his inquiries further in the course of the day. He then inquired into the character of Charlie, and when he heard what sort of boy he was, felt very sorry that he had been so unjustly punished, and hurried off at once to obtain his release.

As he walked towards home, Jim wondered what his own punishment would be; but although he dreaded dismissal and disgrace very much, he felt that that would be light in comparison with the misery he had suffered all night.

That morning, when they were all at work, Mr. Sharpe appeared once more. Charlie was with him, looking pale, but very happy now. Jim was the first called from his place.

"I need not tell you, my boy, that you deserve to be severely punished for what you did the other night," he said; "but your friend here," glancing at Charlie, "has begged me to forgive both you and your companion, Tom Hatch."

Tom, who was close by, could scarcely comprehend the scene, but he knew that he was found out, and looked towards Jim.

"Your accomplice did not betray you," said Mr. Sharpe, calling him from his work; "but I am afraid, from all I hear, you have done him a great deal of harm by your bad example. You richly deserve to be sent to prison; but I have promised Scott that I will not; you are, however, discharged from our employ, so that you are likely to have a long holiday now. Jim, in consideration of his having confessed, may return to his work, and Charlie I shall send into the country for a week at my own expense; and now remember, all of you, that nothing is ever gained by falsehood and wrong, but misery and disgrace."

JOHN LYNCH'S DEBT.

BY ALTON CLYDE.

I.

THE summer day had died in tranquil beauty, like the close of a Christian life, and the sweet lingering twilight was closing in, with its dew-laden air and sky of soft pearly tints, with gleaming ripples of crimson and gold, giving promise of a bright to-morrow. Very deep and solemn was the hush that pervaded the great cemetery as evening drew on, changing the sky tints to tender, melancholy grey, and casting longer shadows on the outstretched field of graves, here and there giving deeper gloom to dark masses of verdure, and throwing out in stronger relief the white gleams of marble. There, on the plebeian side, where head-stones were few, and only the rise of the green turf mapped out the numerous graves, a young man stood, beside one of those undistinguished mounds, gazing down with bent head and folded arms. The deep band round his hat denoted mourning for some near relative, as also did his well-brushed suit of black. It was in a careful state of preservation, but there was about it, a painful air of threadbare respectability, that told its own story. Yet, in spite of these signs, though his purse was but slenderly furnished, and he would go home to a poor lodging and frugal fare, John Lynch, the merchant's clerk, could truly have written Gentleman against his name, for he was one of nature's own—honourable, large-souled, and full of gallant, high-bred chivalry as any of the belted knights of old.

He stood there until the few stragglers who made the cemetery a pleasant evening walk had passed out, and he was nearly left alone. He did not rouse himself until it was time for closing the gates; then he stooped down, and, softly as one might bind a coronet on a beloved brow, placed a little bunch of roses on one of the lowly mounds; at the same time, plucking a few blades of the waving grass, and placing them carefully between the leaves of his pocket-book, murmured, as he glanced at the sweet flowers and inhaled their fragrance—

"I cannot lay marble over him, so I bring him these; and for myself, I would not wish a fairer monument, nor sweeter epitaph. Poor old man! I know he loved the country, and craved a resting-place under the willows in the churchyard of his native village, so my roses will be a fit offering; and this," he added, touching the grass in his pocket-book, "is to keep my purpose fresh and green—not that it has faltered yet."

Thus communing with himself, he turned away, and pausing once to cast a lingering, backward look at the grave, went swiftly down the shaded walk, then passed from the solemn hush, and the presence of those silent sleepers, into the noisy life of the crowded streets.

II.

AN hour later, John Lynch was in his home, where no loved face or kindly voice awaited him. It was a third-floor back room, furnished in the dingiest and shabbiest lodging-house style. There, after office-hours, he lived alone his life of patient, unsuspected struggle, with the whole "current of his being" set to the fulfilment of one purpose, which partook of his native nobility—a purpose about which he was strangely secretive. There was only one being in the world whom he took into his confidence, pretty Alice Leigh, his promised wife; but even she did not know all the little secrets of his inner life, the daily sacrifices and stern self-conquest—all the voluntary privations to which he submitted with such proud stoicism. If gentle Alice had known that, it would have taken all the relish from the rich viands on which she fed at her master's table.

It was the first anniversary of his father's death—just twelve months since he had stood, a solitary mourner, at the grave, to which he had that day made a pilgrimage. Old John Lynch had died a bankrupt, broken both in spirit and fortunes. Beside his heavy losses in business, there had been a constant drain upon him in the reckless extravagance of a favourite son, to whom he had largely advanced money. The young man had drawn upon his father's purse until it could yield no further supplies. Since then, he had gone out to Australia, and nothing had been heard of him. That ungrateful desertion was the final blow which crushed down the old man. He had always been so fond of careless, handsome Ned, preferring him to his steady, reserved elder brother, whose sterling qualities shone out like tried gold in the time of adverse fortune. John, the seemingly cold and undemonstrative, whose retiring virtues had never been fully known or appreciated, and who had never given his father an hour's trouble or concern since his boyhood, it was to him that the old man was glad to turn for comfort and support, when all else had failed. The strictest honour in pecuniary transactions had been, through life, one of his marked traits, coupled with a sensitive pride of independence, that the slightest touch could wound. He was almost morbid on that subject, and carried the same spirit to his grave. Through all his sickness, when earthly things were fading from him, the burden of his debts pressed heavily—it was the theme of almost the last conversation which he held with his son.

"I can't help it, lad; I always tried to pay to the uttermost farthing. It is my debt to Daniel Road that troubles me, the man who came forward when he knew that I was going down. He has made up his mind to lose the money, but——"

"He shall not, father," interrupted the young man, with a tender break in his voice; "I bear your name, and the debt shall be renewed in me. From this day I take it on myself, and, if God gives me health and strength, it shall be paid in full."

An eager gleam shot from the fading eyes.

"My boy, dost thou promise this?"

"I do, father; rest satisfied, and let the shadow pass—it belongs to this world, and should not trouble you now. There are other debts to think of than these of earth."

"God bless thee, John! thou wast a good lad always; but my chief care was given to Ned. God will reward thee better than anything I could do; forgive—forgive me, and take my blessing for thyself and Alice."

John Lynch the younger was much moved, but he said nothing, only passed round to the other side of the bed with the Bible in his hand, and opened it to read. So closed the last compact between father and son.

III.

"ARE you at leisure, Alice? I want to have some serious talk this evening."

"Serious talk, John?" the fair girl repeated, with a wistfully interrogative glance at the grave, dark face which she had learned to read so well.

"Yes," was his brief answer, spoken very low and hurriedly, as if he could not trust himself to say more.

The girl's wistful look changed to an expression of anxiety as she said—

"Miss Sarah goes to bed early to-night. I shall only have to take up her glass of negus and read prayers, then my time will be my own; but if I ask leave she will let Thompson take my place. She is so considerate and kind. Stay here, and I will go to her."

John Lynch had not waited more than a few minutes, when Alice flitted back to his side, ready dressed for a walk. He looked tenderly down at the slight figure, and the fair, pure face which found such an appropriate frame in the dainty straw bonnet, tied under her dimpled chin with its simple white ribbon. She looked such a sweet, lovable thing with the pretty childish droop in her shy, brown eyes, and the half-conscious blush tinting her cheek, as though she felt all the yearning love that was finding expression in his earnest gaze. He could have gathered her to his heart in one passionate embrace, and kissed every bright ripple of the sunny hair that fell over her white brow. But he did neither, only drew her arm silently within his, and asked briefly—

"Where shall we walk?"

"Under the trees round the square, or anywhere that suits you, John."

So they passed together through the wide entrance-hall, where their footsteps fell so noiselessly, and it seemed quite natural to drop their voices, for even the sunlight seemed to come there subdued, as if to suit the air of grave quiet which pervaded that region of solemn respectability.

A few minutes more, and the two quiet figures were pacing round the square, which at that hour was nearly deserted. It looked so refreshingly green, that still retreat in the heart of the great "house forest" of London, with the waning sunlight filtering through the branches of the trees and weaving golden network on the pavement at their feet. But John Lynch walked on with blind eyes, talking earnestly with one tiny hand gathered in his clasp, and held as though he meant to keep it there for ever. Few could have guessed that he was nerving himself for a sacrifice. To give up, by his own voluntary act, the only bit of sunshine that had ever brightened his grey, colourless life. He had that day paid over the first instalment of the debt to his father's friend and creditor, Daniel Read; a little hoard, of which every coin was a silent register of heroic self-denial.

"I did not expect to hear this from you, John Lynch, that you could bear to give me up, and divide our lives in the years to come."

It was Alice who spoke with a tremor in her gentle voice, and a grieved, childish quiver about her lips. They had come to a sudden halt under the trees, and the young girl was leaning against the railing for support. They had not noticed the movements of an elderly gentleman within the enclosure, pacing slowly up and down the walks, and keeping those two in sight, in a manner which might have excited suspicion that he was watching them. He stopped when they stopped, and stood with his back towards them, and his head bent forward as if absorbed in the contemplation of the flower-borders, yet still near enough to hear scraps of their talk, if it had pleased him to listen. But, with the natural egotism of their species, the lovers observed nothing but each other.

"Divide our lives, Alice! is it possible that you can mistake my meaning?"

John Lynch spoke with a ring of anguish in his voice; he was deeply moved, and showed it more than was his wont. The strong man's heart was wrung and quivering in its finest fibres.

"No, I will not believe that you can doubt me; you, whom I love more than I can tell; for I am not a great talker, as you know." He went on, speaking rapidly, and crushing back with a strong effort the feeling that would have choked his words, if he had let it have its way.

"Alice, I have told you all; you know my promise to the dead, and the purpose to which my life must be given, until John Lynch's debt is paid. You know, also, that I am a poor man, and the money must be coined out of my own labour. Work—save—as I will, it may take months, perhaps years, before it can be done. Knowing this, can I with honour take you from your present home of luxury, and bind your lot to mine, with all its hard chances, uncertainties, and struggles?"

little girl, whom I would shield, even at the cost of my life!" Here his voice broke into sudden tenderness.

"Can you not see that it is my love which makes me shrink from making you a sacrifice? You were not born to walk in rough places; will it not be better for your happiness to release you from vows that I have no right to claim now?"

"Hush, John! you have a right that cannot be taken from you." She was looking up to him, with her brown eyes glistening, and her cheeks flushed with bright colour. "You will find that I am not to be shaken off so easily. I will wait for you until I am grey and old; but I will not be released, if you want it ever so much." She laughed to keep back her tears.

"My little Alice, and will you never regret?"

"No, sir! only, if you love me as you say, I shall expect to be always trusted and believed in."

How finely the true gold of the loving woman's heart came out from the test of circumstances! If it had not been for the sake of appearances, and the recollection that they were in a public square, the young man would have caught her to his heart; as he could not do that, he contented himself with a pressure of her hand that was, perhaps, more eloquent than words. Then they walked back to the stately home where she lived, and when the great hall door had closed on the slight figure, he went on his way like one who has taken a new lease of life and hope.

IV.

Not more than ten minutes after John Lynch had disappeared, an elderly gentleman walked leisurely up the steps of the house into which Alice had just passed, and let himself quietly in with his latch-key, somewhat to the surprise of the staid old butler, who had an impression that his master was dining out and would not return till late.

"Draw the blinds in the library, Thompson, and light my reading-lamp, and mark—I am not to be disturbed for the next hour unless I ring."

He passed on, sure of prompt obedience from the well-trained servant. A few minutes later, the master of the mansion was pacing the floor of the library with his hands behind him; a favourite attitude of his, in moments of profound mental abstraction.

"Truly, this is a pretty discovery for one evening: young John Lynch and my sister's companion engaged to each other. And then about this debt, which I had long since crossed from my mind. Well, it is something unique and out of the common run of business. But to think that it might have been going on, and I should never have got to the kernel of the nut, if I had not chanced to play eavesdropper. A couple of young simpletons! wait till they are grey and old!

we shall see; but caution, for I doubt not that young fellow has all the pride of the Lynches embodied in himself. Daniel Read, if you are a man of money, it is to be hoped that you have a conscience."

Time passed, bringing no visible change. The banker, Daniel Read, kept to himself his discovery concerning the lovers, and no apparent result followed his soliloquy in the library. Alice lived her own quiet life in the orderly old house, every day making herself more necessary to her invalid mistress; and John Lynch worked steadily on to the fulfilment of his purpose. His heart grew lighter in anticipation, when he found himself prepared to meet the second payment of his debt.

It wanted only a few days to the time he had fixed, when he was startled by the receipt of an anonymous letter, addressed to him in an unknown hand, and enclosing bank-notes that more than covered the amount due to Daniel Read. There was no writing, only a slip of paper on which had been hastily scribbled in pencil: "From one who holds himself indebted to John Lynch."

This unexpected stroke of good fortune was like the sudden uplifting of a burden from his shoulders. The sequel may be guessed. Not many hours later, the young man was standing in Daniel Read's private office, awaiting his receipt for the debt paid in full, not to the cashier, but to the banker himself, a tall, old man with a grave, lined face and clear, candid, grey eyes, that looked as if they could detect deception under any mask. He wrote out the receipt, but kept his hand upon it, and said, looking attentively at the young man—

"So you are John Lynch, and this is the end of the debt which you took upon yourself to pay for your father; and with this bit of business paper I suppose our connection is to end. You expect nothing but a receipt for your money?"

John Lynch was so thoroughly mystified about his meaning, that he only looked at him in blank perplexity, and said nothing. He was still more bewildered when the banker abruptly disappeared into an inner room, and, after a few seconds, came out, leading Alice.

"Here is my receipt in another form," he said, holding out the timid little hand. "Knowing your regard for each other—no matter how I came by the knowledge—I prepared this surprise for you both. Alice Leigh being an orphan, I claim to be her guardian, and give her to you, with a dowry of one thousand pounds, payable on her wedding-day. My only reproach is, that I shall be doing my poor sister an ill turn in robbing her of Alice."

"Oh, sir!" broke out John, in a choked voice, "that anonymous letter—those bank-notes—I see it all now."

"No matter what you see, young man; don't try to betray me into making confessions. I shall say nothing, only that I am indebted to John Lynch, father and son, for showing me that there is so much high honour and principle among men."

The rest is soon told. Alice Leigh and John Lynch were married, the good old banker giving away the bride, and his sister, Miss Sarah, providing the wedding-breakfast, though she did find it hard to reconcile herself to the loss of her favourite.

In due time John Lynch was installed in the bank in a situation of high trust; and thus the young couple were beginning the world with very fair prospects for the years to come. It was the just recognition and reward which should always be the crown of noble, useful lives.

AERIAL ARCHITECTURE.

HERE are very few people who have not, to a greater or less extent, built "castles in the air." The occupation is not an unnatural one. Human nature is but a "weak vessel" at the best of times, and this aerial kind of architecture is one of its weaknesses. No doubt, day-dreams are very pleasant things; and the only objection that can be taken to them is, that men should be doing, not dreaming. The time allotted to the longest-lived man is too short to be wasted in the speculative frivolities of dreamland. We have to be "up and doing;" not basking indolently in the sunshine, and feasting our imaginative faculties on what "might be."

There are two thoughts suggested at the outset of the subject, one a condemnatory, and the other an apologetic one. We condemn the impertinence of speculating upon the mysteries of the future, and mentally dictating to the Almighty how the course of our lives should be shapen. It amounts to this, although the votaries of day-dreams do not perhaps intend it as such: it is an insult to Providence to waste the present in idle pictures of the future. "Trust no future, howe'er, pleasant," says the American poet, and surely if any one has a prerogative to dreaming it is a poet. In his mind "imagination bodies forth the forms of things unseen," and the whole wondrous dreamland of fancy unfolds her captivating, but fictitious treasures, and lays them at his feet. But the poet, ignoring his own weakness, preaches a homily in that brief sentence—"Trust no future, howe'er pleasant." It won't do to draw upon the future by building castles in the air; and yet (and this the apologetic thought) the sentiment or feeling, or whatever you like to call it, is closely allied to hope. Hope is the great mainspring of human happiness. Life without hope would be a miserable existence, purposeless and joyless. No one could be content to live long without hope. Say what we may, our thoughts all tend and converge to the future. Where was there ever a lover who did not hope one day to call his sweetheart "wife," and who did not indulge in day-dreams of domestic bliss? Hope built the castles in the air then, but they were very natural edifices, very proper edifices, and vastly unlike those impossible ones, over which so many young people waste their precious hours.

Where is the line to be drawn then, about this penetration of the future? A man may hope—nay, must hope—for happiness in this world, and for a glorious existence in another; but he mustn't picture schemes full of extravagant ideas, and dream over them, instead of putting his shoulder to the wheel, and endeavouring to realise some of his wild hopes.

Even this is not so bad as a despondency and despair, caused by the failures of the past. The man who wastes his time in idle regrets upon the past, is tenfold more deserving of censure than he who wastes it upon day-dreams of the future. The past is gone for ever: it cannot be recalled; its thoughts and deeds have gone with it, and no mortal can undo what has once been done. He may cancel by other actions, but he cannot obliterate. The past is never to be washed out. What then is the use of repining over that which cannot be altered? Is it manly thus to waste the time in these vain despairings? Is it just to the world around you, is it just to yourself, is it just to your God? It may be foolish to look ahead too boldly, but it is worse than foolish to look back. Wishing won't bring the time over again. We do not say forget the past—her lessons are too useful. It is by experience that we learn. A modern poet has put the thought into much better form than we can do, and our readers shall learn this little homely truth in pleasant verse:—

"Arise! if the past detain you,
Her sunshine and storms forget;
No chains so unworthy to bind you
As those of a vain regret.
Sad or bright, she is lifeless ever,
Cast her phantom-arms away;
Nor look back, save to learn the lesson
Of a nobler strife to-day!"

But that "nobler strife" does not mean building castles in the air. We have very little belief in those "airy nothings." There are some instances on record of day-dreamers realising the object of their dreams. Warren Hastings, when, a little boy, pictured in the far future the re-possession by his family of the Daylesford estates. His dream was accomplished; and here there is another little lesson to be learnt. It was not only dreaming that brought to Warren Hastings the fruition of his fondest hopes; he worked for it. Through years of toilsome labour and fatigue, through ignominy and disgrace, through opposition and hostility, through evil report and through good report, he aimed at the one object—to rest his dying limbs in the ancestral halls of Daylesford. Too many of the young people of the present day ignore the practical part of these examples. They conjure up panoramas of an improbable future—fancy themselves the lords of "useless thousands" shoot up with the celerity of mushrooms from nobodies to magnates in the land—dispense imaginary gold, with an equally imaginary generosity—dream, dream, dream—ay, and always dream, but never do. What a life of lethargy this castle-building is, to be sure! If, instead of erecting these palatial atmospheric residences, they were to plod a little more, give a few more hours to work or study, drop the dreaming and take to the doing, there might be a chance of their success in the world, although not perhaps to the extent they are so fond of picturing to themselves.

We know a young man who spends the greater portion of his time in thinking what a model peer of the realm he would make. In a single day he goes through as much pomp and ceremony as most noblemen do in twelve months. His imagination is in one perpetual glitter of precious stones. Yet this poor, monomaniacal copying clerk has recently been discharged from a situation, because he is too idle to be of any use. So he tells all who care to listen to him that he is a great thinker!

There is no objection in the world to a young man having a reasonable and proper amount of ambition. By all means improve your position; to stand still in an age like this is to become retrogressive. When so many around are marching on, why should you be motionless? The desire to excel is one of the most laudable of human weaknesses. One likes to hear of a young fellow "getting on" in the world; but it is useless to carve out for yourself a higher walk in life, unless you battle manfully to obtain it. Fame and fortune won't walk up to you, doff their caps, and humbly request you to accept of their best and choicest gifts. You must win them with spear and spur, like a gallant knight, fighting bravely and manfully against obstacles, never being disheartened, praying always for help to a Higher Power, looking ever onward and upward. Have your ambition, by all means, if it is a godly and virtuous one; but do not sit down and lose your energies in fancying its accomplishment. Imagination in this respect is too often a fatal gift. Hundreds of people have such vivid imaginations that they seem to lose all desire of obtaining the reality. The imitation appears quite as good to them, for they dote on it with a fondness quite marvellous, and never use the slightest endeavours to obtain the fulfilment of their desires. It is the "Château en Espagne—toujours le château en Espagne."

One of the principal causes which has contributed to the growth of this pernicious "castle-building," may be found in the exciting works of fiction which teem from the press. Fiction restrained within proper limits is, undoubtedly, a vast aid in the work of education; but fiction now-a-days very often runs riot. Characters are portrayed in a highly-coloured manner, which rivets the attention of the thoughtless reader; and in following the narrative of their success, his mind becomes inflated with nonsensical notions of his own resemblance to the case. If the tale be of some invincible hunter on the prairie, who, after many daring adventures, wins a peerless beauty, for his bride, and an unaccountable number of diamonds to boot, the castle-builder immediately fancies himself created for deeds of danger. He is the hunter, and in the far future he sees himself struggling with Red Indians, scalping them right and left, overcoming fearful odds, winning the peerless beauty, and scattering the diamonds broadcast; and after all, he is only a whipper-snapper little clerk, who would find it a difficult feat to shoulder a rifle. This is but one instance, but fifty might be given illustrating the same principle. There can be no denial of the fact, that fiction is a great help to building castles in the air.

One thought more. When the mind becomes so wrapped up in these prospective visions of temporal happiness, the importance of the eternal life is apt to be diminished. The man who dabbles in aerial architecture has little time to devote to a preparation for another world. Sad thought! With a brotherly earnestness, we would commend an annihilation of the "castle in the air," and the laying of a foundation for a "mansion in the skies."

THE OLD TIMES.

 HE song we dare not sing, for fear
Lest, failing suddenly,
The tones of weeping should replace
The sounds of melody.

The name which, ever in the heart,
Must still unspoken be;
Friends' faces, children's looks and words,
All tell—all tell of thee.

Spring's fair flowers look into my face,
And tell of happy hours,
When hand-in-hand so merrily
We played among the flowers.

Ah, sister! fairer coronals
Entwine thy sainted brow;
Earth's sweetest sounds are discord
To the strains thou hearest now.

The new name of God's faithful ones,
Who bravely overcame,
Has taken place for ever
Of the dear familiar name.

Send one ray from thy glory
To ease my spirit's pain;
For my human heart is yearning
For the old times back again.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—VI.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

 WILL go and see if nothing can be done for you at the Horse Guards, or Chelsea Hospital," said Archie to Mrs. Fenton. "I knew one of the military secretaries well, and will certainly ask him if there is not some pension or allowance for you, as the parents of an officer who died in actual service."

"Ah, sir, that's been tried already for us, as Mr. Welworth here can tell you, for though the secretary, or whoever the good gentleman might be, was kind enough to give me a couple of sovereigns out of his own pocket, when I went up to him with a petition, he told me then that, though they did all they could to pension the poor soldiers themselves, or if our poor James, as being a real soldier-officer, had left a widow, which he couldn't well do, you see, gentlemen, never having been married, that she would have been eligible for a pension; but if they were to undertake to support all the parents and relations of their officers and soldiers, they would find it quite beyond all the means and funds at their disposal; and therefore, as our kind curate remarked when I told him, I suppose their refusal was not altogether unreasonable, though it does seem hard to see my poor old man, who was for so many a year a ratepayer himself, brought down so low as to come upon the parish himself, which though it has pleased God to spare us that trial as yet, is, if he goes on, what we must at last come to." And here the poor woman burst into tears, no longer able to control her feelings.

"But pray excuse my asking what means you have to live upon now," said Archie, gently, with the greatest expression of interest in his manner and voice.

"We have nothing, sir; though—as your friend here, Mr. Welworth, can tell you—we were in well-to-do circumstances, with a comfortably-furnished house of our own over our heads; but most of it was seized and sold, and what remained has gradually been parted with, to procure us food and lodging."

"But how do you live then? you surely must have some sort of means of procuring daily food, however small, or even paying the rent of this room, moderate as I suppose it is."

Sydney Welworth left his friend alone, thus eagerly making these close inquiries, as he had specially brought him, without being the least aware of the coincidence of the poor Fentons' son having been the captain's own brother-officer, but as a lesson to show him to what a point poverty and human suffering may really come.

"How can you live?" repeated Archie, earnestly.

"I am sure I hardly know how to tell you, sir, for I scarcely know myself," said the poor woman, sobbing violently, with her ragged apron thrown over her face.

"That is ungrateful of you, my dearest Sarah," said the old man, from his bed, in a clear calm voice, which surprised and startled them. "I will tell you, sir, how we live, and who I know will continue to keep us, unto the day of death, as He has been pleased in his mercy to do up to this time. God Almighty himself, sir, keeps us. In all our distress we have never failed to pray and trust implicitly to him; and he has never failed us yet, and I don't believe or really think he will."

The poor old man's hands were clasped, and his eyes turned up to heaven, as he thus spoke with an evidently firm and devotional faith in the goodness of his Maker.

"Many a time we have almost thought that our last farthing and last friend was gone; but we have prayed and trusted in Him, and He has always taken care of us. Sometimes help has come from some most unexpected chance, as many would I know call it; but I know better. It is not chance, and so I always feel when I pray to Him. He puts it into some kind friend's heart to come and see us, or to tell somebody else about us. Do you not think it must have been specially meant, sir, that you, who knew my poor son so many thousands of miles away, should come to call in to bring me comfort, just as I was only thinking of him this very day despondingly, and I am afraid ungratefully? And so God brings to us one kind friend and another; when one goes another always comes up, and so we get on somehow, from one week to another; and so I firmly believe and trust he will continue to help and watch over us until the end, which I humbly trust cannot now be very far off; and if he shall be only pleased to spare me from the degradation of being taken to die in the workhouse, I could lie back and close my eyes in real contentment and resignation. Though even in that case," added the pious old man, after a pause, "I sometimes feel that it may be only a pride and presumption on my part, to have the dread and horror against that place which I have; and should it please God to punish and purge me of that sin, by willing that it should be so, I trust that I may even then be thankful, and submit myself to his Almighty will, who knows what is better for us than we can ever pretend to do ourselves."

Archie Scott, though he may perhaps have had some sort of idea that such sentiments of firm trust and resignation were occasionally to be heard from clergymen in the pulpit, or read of in what in the days of his childhood he used to call Sunday books, seemed amazed at poor old Fenton, as he thus delivered himself; for, as a man of the world, he was too good a judge not to see at once that the feelings thus expressed were really genuine, and spoken from the heart, with no false object or hypocritical cant about them; but that he, the fashionable, useless dandy, Captain Scott, could ever be even supposed to have been specially sent by Providence, in answer to the prayers, or for the comfort, of a poor dying old man, was quite a new idea to him.

He could not help in his conscience and inward self drawing comparisons between that old Christian's trustful resignation, in the depths of his miserable poverty, with his own late bitter complaints and fancied troubles; and, though he did not at first express as much to his friend, yet, from the little he did say, Sydney could see that he had been deeply impressed, though perhaps not caring quite to convey his feelings with the same ingenuous freedom which he previously used in reference to the other cases they had visited.

Sydney Welworth, as he expressed it, rather stretched beyond his usual tether, in his orders for nutritious food and other necessities for this poor couple. And Archie promised to send down to the old man a change of linen from his own wardrobe, and a dressing-gown, which he thought would be serviceable in keeping his arms and shoulders warm, as he sat propped up in his bed. But what poor Fenton seemed to look forward to with the greatest pleasure of all was, an illustrated history of the regiment to which his poor son had belonged, containing an account of all the battles, engagements, and services, through which it had been since its first enrolment, and where, as Archie told him, he would find his own gallant son's name and distinguished services all set forth in print.

Captain Scott listened in silence, with attention, and evidently turning many thoughts over in his own mind, as they came together up through that dismal court, and Sydney gave him an account of the poor people, whom they had just visited.

"When I first knew Fenton, he was a prosperous and leading cabinet-maker, master of one of the best shops and houses in the principal street of this district; and she, poor gaunt creature as you see her now, with every bone showing through her miserable rags and tatters, was as fine-looking, well-set-up, decently-dressed a specimen of a comfortable tradesman's wife as ever you might wish to meet with. I remember calling in there the first season I ever visited down in these parts, to inquire about a poor man who had worked under them, but was then dying of consumption, and nothing could have been more comfortable and respectable than they were; and she, I know, was herself very kind in the way of sending round broth and other little comforts to their poor journeyman.

"It was, however, very soon after that time that poor Fenton was knocked down all of a heap with a stroke of paralysis, though I never heard of them again for nearly a whole year after that.

"The wife told me that she thought the first stroke was brought on by her husband's over-anxiety and working extra hours—indeed, sometimes all through the night, at some particularly beautiful specimen of his craft for the Exhibition of '62. He neither ate nor slept, nor thought of anything else, until one morning the unhappy man was found lying helpless and insensible in his workshop, under his own carpenter's bench. He, after a time, gradually recovered the use of his intellect, but never that of his limbs. It would, humanly speaking, have been almost a mercy had he never done so, but died at that time outright.

"His work was, of course, never completed for the Exhibition. In his zeal and enthusiasm for his work, or art it might almost be called, he had, most unfortunately, borrowed a considerable sum of money, for the necessary tools and materials for carrying out his design. But business went rapidly to the bad, through the mismanagement and dishonesty of a rascally son-in-law; his only son had, as you know, some little time before died out in India. And so, in short, they soon became bankrupt: they were turned out of their house, their furniture and goods all seized and sold, or rather thrown away, for anything they would fetch; and when I renewed their acquaintance, at the request of the widow of that poor journeyman—who had in the meantime died of consumption—I found them lodging in two decent little rooms, in a first floor in a small street leading out of the one in which they had lived in their better days. But they have gradually come down, and down, until compelled at last to move into the miserable back room in that court where we have just seen them, for a rent of half-a-crown a week, which is, I believe, paid for them by a sister of hers, who is housekeeper in some nobleman's family.

"It was just after the second stroke that I was asked to look after them, and the doctor, whom I then met in his room, assured me confidentially that poor Fenton could not possibly last beyond a month or six weeks at furthest; instead of which, it is now going on four years that he has been lying there, perfectly helpless, and unable to turn himself on his bed. And that poor wife of his rests, or rather lies down, on that palliasse which you may have observed at his feet, always ready at his slightest call."

"But it struck me," said Archie, "that she wasn't very kind to the poor old fellow. What makes her bellow at him in that way? for, as he remarked, he is not deaf."

"No, my dear fellow, didn't you perceive that she herself is, and has evidently gradually become so, without their finding it out. She spoke just as loudly to us as she did to her husband. But she is, indeed, an attentive and most devoted wife to him; and one need not be surprised that she has changed from the hale and hearty woman she was, as I remember her, to the gaunt and worn-out skeleton which she has now become, when I tell you that for nearly four years that poor creature has never had two hours' consecutive sleep, night or day. She assured me so herself, and it has been corroborated by the doctor, as well as the poor widow whom I before mentioned, and who is constantly with them, too happy to show her gratitude for past kindness to her poor husband by any little services in her power.

"Poor Mrs. Fenton's only object and hope left in life is to keep her husband out of the work-house. It is hard to think of the poor old man dying as a pauper on the parish of which he was so many years a ratepayer and a leading member of the vestry.

"I am almost afraid that she will herself be worn out and die before he does, for there he lies, without seeming to get better or worse, sometimes in a drowsy, half-unconscious state; and at others awake for days, and even whole nights together, clear and wakeful as we saw him this evening, reading his good books, or else composing whole yards of doggerel poetry. I bring him a present of a quire or two of writing-paper sometimes, on which he pours forth his verses, sometimes in my own praise, or about his poor soldier-son, and all manners of subjects.

"If she does go first, as I fear she will, he must, I suppose, be taken to end his miserable days where he and she have so natural a dread and abhorrence: I see no help for it; so that it will, indeed, be a real mercy when he, and I may say now, when both are taken, for she, poor thing, is thoroughly worn out in body and spirit too."

(To be continued.)

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE LETTER IS FOUND.

THE month of May was drawing to a close, and Alexander Oglivie was improving rapidly. Peggy was once more allowed to visit and amuse him, and he was beginning to crawl out into the sunshine and sit on a garden-chair, on the spot where the rays rested longest, in front of the gloomy house.

Peggy, who loved the sunshine and rejoiced in flowers, had had some of her favourites planted here and there about the house, and they, as well as she, wanted more light and warmth. She had therefore suggested that some of the little thicket of evergreens that closed round the house should be cleared away, and that the elder-trees overshadowing some of the walks should be removed. And Margery had given her consent, for the doctor had seconded the proposal, and pointed out that it would give the invalid what he needed most—sunshine and fresh air.

Captain Oglivie had written once, but the letter was addressed to Margery, and contained only the ordinary affectionate remembrance to Peggy. But she had been called upon to answer the letter in Margery's behalf, and this she found a very difficult task, for it was the task of writing something which should express nothing—an undertaking apt to stultify the brightest intellect. At last, however, she succeeded in producing one of those objectionable epistles of which people say with such truth, "There is nothing in it," and in which the writer has so carefully avoided any egotistic expression, that he or she—it is generally the latter—might as well be a writing automaton, as a living being with motives, and interests, and affections. Such as it was, Captain Oglivie set store by that little letter; and, showing that he was not wholly an interested schemer, not wholly corrupt at heart, he still keeps it among the relics of better days. It ran:—

DEAR HORACE,—Margery has asked me to answer your letter, and to say that she is happy to hear of your safe arrival. You will be glad to hear that Alexander is mending every day. We are going to get him out a little into the garden. I wonder if he will notice the flowers I have had transplanted here. I have quite a show of yellow primroses scattered about under the trees, and looking like drops of sunshine that have fallen through the boughs. The wood is beginning to look lovely, too. [She did not say that, wandering in it yesterday, her heart had relented towards him, thinking that if his love were warm and true, the world was so hard and cold, that she might bask in the warmth till love again would blossom.] Margery hopes that you will do as you say, and bring your mother with you when you come again. She sends her love to her and to you.

I remain your affectionate cousin,

PEGGY OGLIVIE.

The walks were being cleared from the overcrowding greenery. Two men were working there, wheeling away the branches in loads, and even removing entire trees. They had come up quite close to the house, where Peggy was walking with Sir Alexander, moving up and down at a snail's pace in the sunshine. A chair was placed for the invalid when he required to rest; and, after a little, he was coaxed to sit in it and watch the gardening operations. While they were thus occupied, the postman came up the walk and gave Peggy a letter, folded as letters usually were in those days, and sealed with a large square of red wax, on which was imprinted the Oglivie arms. She knew at a glance from whom the letter came, and, needing the refuge of her room to read it in, she held it unopened in her hand, till such time as they should go indoors again. But Alexander Oglivie had caught sight of the paper and its glowing seal, and had evidently set his heart upon obtaining it. He was usually so docile with Peggy, that, after striving to pacify him with something else, she yielded it into his hands. She would be able to redeem it, as soon as they reached the house, with something he was sure to consider more than equivalent.

The poor creature was delighted with his prize, and sat chuckling and crowing over it, and handling it with care. Then he got up, and was moving away, when one of the men drew Peggy's attention for an instant, and the other, leaning on the spade with which he was digging round the root of an ancient elder, uttered a hasty exclamation. Close to where they were standing, the elder-bushes had concealed the stump of a tree more ancient than themselves. The bole was short and thick, and it was leafless and branchless, as one of those broken monumental shafts one sees in burying-grounds. Near the top there was a great rift, revealing the rottenness within. In the instant during which Peggy's attention was diverted from him, Alexander Oglivie had suddenly stepped up to the tree. He was standing before it when she looked round at the gardener's exclamation. But the letter was no longer in his hands. He had put it into the cleft of the tree, exactly as one deposits a letter in a pillar letter-box; and it might very well have stood for one, though it was before the date of that useful invention, for the letter had duly disappeared. How it was to be recovered again was another matter.

Peggy caught the broad grin on the men's faces, and laughed herself in spite of her embarrassment.

"I suppose we can get it out again without much difficulty," she said.

"Oh, ay, miss, we've got it oot again, though we should fell the auld stump," said the foremost gardener, proceeding to thrust his bare arm into the rift. "It's no' that easy, faix," he added, bringing up a scrap of paper, which Peggy at once recognised as one of her own slight sketches. "It's hollow to the very root, and there's a heap o' bits o' paper doon." He brought up two or three more scraps, and then making a desperate effort, he cried, "I've gotten a grip o't noo," and brought up the letter between his fingers.

Hastily smuggling it away, lest Sir Alexander should seek to take possession of it again, she got back to the house with her charge, and went to her own room to read her letter. As she broke the seal, she noticed how soiled and stained it was. It was Captain Oglivie's lost letter to his mother which, first in utter bewilderment, and then in a sort of fascination, she was reading from beginning to end.

It will be remembered how heartless that letter was; how it gave an account of Peggy's prospects of the great inheritance having become secure in any event, whether Margery or Alexander should be the last survivor; how it mentioned her as an encumbrance, though a light one, which he would rather dispense with, but didn't mind going in for along with the estates; and how it finished with a cruel expression of hate towards him whom the kindly country phrase, acknowledging his irresponsibility, called distinctively, "The Innocent."

How long she sat with the letter in her hand she did not know, but it was some time before the act of reflection took the place of simple comprehension of the facts it expressed—namely, that its writer was mercenary, deceitful, cruel. Then she saw it all. He had made of her a plaything, and now he would purchase with her the inheritance he coveted. The inheritance—was it this that turned the hearts around her into stone? Her father had spoken of it in just the same way, as a thing to be won at the expense of life and happiness. Human love and faithfulness seemed to perish under its shadow, or if they lived, as they had done in Margery, they lived in lifelong agony. The possibility of one day possessing it, roused the evil spirit of covetousness, and those who had possessed it had sinned above other men; and she thought of the Scripture which denounces covetousness as idolatry, and then of that commandment which forbids idolatry, and to which the awful warning to transgressors is attached, that the sins of the father shall be visited upon the children to the third and fourth generations.

And thus the innocent must suffer for the guilty, and God is unmerciful! But her spirit, though almost blinded by anguish, cried out, "No, no, no!" She uttered the words aloud in unconscious pleading. It was the God of love she had loved, and the life he had given had been glad and beautiful to her. Her heart longed for gladness and beauty, but let it all perish, let all be dark and unlovely, and full of suffering, only let him still be the God of love, "who afflicteth not willingly," "who will not keep his anger for ever."

And it was better that the children of evil parents should suffer, than that they should sin. Margery had been right to take up that post of hers, and seek no happiness for herself. She might have sought it with a covetousness which might have made her heart like these others; and heartlessness and cruelty, supposing them to be cureless, Peggy in that moment felt to be worse than any suffering, any other death in life, such as she had had before her eyes in her grandfather, and now in Alexander Oglivie. Yes, as there was an inheritance of nature of far closer and deeper import than any outward inheritance of houses and lands, it was better to inherit the suffering than the sin.

Then Peggy became conscious that she had thought long enough, and that there was something to be done. The first thing was to recover the letter intended for her, and for that purpose she went out again.

The men had gone in to dinner, and for a minute she was puzzled how to act. Then she got a small garden rake, and inserting it in the rift, easily succeeded in fishing out with it the remaining contents of the strange letter-box, among which was what she sought.

And now what to do with it? how to dispose of it? She went back with it to her own room, and was about to break the seal. Then, with a true and deep-seated delicacy, she refrained. She had read that which was not intended for her, and he must know that she had read it (and remember she had a right to know the heart that was offered to her); but she would not read that which was intended for her, lest its contradiction should put the writer to the blush. She was ashamed for his shame, and would not curiously unveil his deformity. She would send back his letter unread, enclosed with that other.

And this was what she did. Her letter, with its enclosures, was very brief; but this time there was much in it. She told him how she had found the letter to his mother, and had begun to read it as her own, and how she had gone on to the end after she found it was not intended for her. "After this," she wrote, "I could not open the other. You would not have liked me to read them together." She did not say that there must be an end to everything between them, that she could neither love nor marry him now, this he must know of himself—this she need not tell him; but she did say, "Do not come here until I go away. I will go to my father, or find a home among strangers. And I will try and not think hardly of you, Horace, for you have been brought up to expect this inheritance. As for me, I have not, and I would rather earn my bread than long in my heart that others should die. It might come to this with me, as it has with others, but now it feels like murder in the soul; therefore I will go away." She ought to have added—and leave to you, as far as I am concerned, that which you have coveted.

The post-office was in the village, and, in haste to send away her letter, about which there could be no second thoughts, Peggy took it thither herself.

CHAPTER XL.

A FATHER'S CLAIMS.

It was dinner-time before Peggy returned from posting her letter—indeed, she had kept the meal waiting a little, and Margery was not patient in small matters, and waited rather ostentatiously. And already she knew all about it, at least, as far as its loss and recovery were concerned. The men had related the story to the maids in the kitchen, and the one who waited on Margery personally had related it to her; therefore Peggy was greeted with it at once.

So far well; but Margery, when speaking of it, had noticed her hearer's embarrassment, and attributing it to quite another than the real cause, went on to say—

"I know what the letter was about. As you were under my roof, Horace naturally asked leave of me to pay his addresses to you. I hope he may have an answer to his mind."

Her voice was unusually soft and womanly, as she said this. Peggy thought that she actually saw the tears in her eyes. She wanted to make confession easy to Peggy, and she was evidently glad for herself.

"I have answered already," was the reply that reached her, in a grave, low voice.

"You've been quick about it," she rejoined, in her usual tone. Perhaps she had expected the girl to consult her, and was disappointed that she had not.

She had paused, and evidently expected something more to be said. It was better to get it over at once.

"I sent back Captain Oglvie's letter," said Peggy, hardly knowing how it was to be got over, but making a beginning at least.

"Sent back his letter?" repeated Margery, as if she could not have heard aright.

"Yes."

"Do you mean that you say him nay?" she asked, with more than her usual sternness of manner.

"Yes, that is what I mean—we could not be happy together," said Peggy, sadly.

"What's to hinder you?" Margery rejoined, harshly. "You ought to have found that out before you gave him encouragement. No man asks a woman to marry him unless he has been encouraged to do it," she added, rashly generalising, not from an isolated fact, but from no facts at all.

"In that I did wrong," answered Peggy, bravely determined to take blame to herself, rather than betray Horace, or injure him in Margery's estimation; and she felt that in this she had somehow erred. "I did not know my own mind, and it has changed towards him."

"Then you ought to have known, or ought never to have changed," said Margery. "To be fickle in this is the greatest wrong a woman can do. Many a man's ruin lies at a woman's door for work like this."

"It is better that we understand each other now, than that the knowledge should have come afterwards; as much better," Peggy answered, softly, "as error is better than sin."

"If you understand each other, it's more than I can do to understand you," replied Margery, grimly; "but as you've changed your mind once, you may change it again."

She was very severe, for she considered that Peggy had not been open with her, and resented it.

And all this time the dinner waited, and when at length it came to pass, it was a very comfortless dinner indeed.

When he got Peggy's note, enclosing his two unfortunate letters, Captain Oglvie felt that "the luck" was against him, and that he might as well give in. He had hastily jumped to the conclusion that the letter had been drowned in the Strathie, when no trace of it had been discovered. To recover it in this fashion was doubly disagreeable, but it was only in the shock of that disagreeableness that he thought of giving up in despair. "She is even queerer than I thought she was," he said to himself; "but I really like her, and why should I not persuade her that I do? She would take a fellow in spite of all the faults in the universe, if she only cared enough for him. I was a fool to let her caring for me cool down as I did. There's one good thing, however—she won't tell tales, even to save herself." And the question in his own mind soon became, not, "Why should she not take me?" but, "Why should she not have me?" by way of a reward for her good qualities; for he thought himself a fine fellow after all, only "the luck" was against him.

At any rate, he knew himself to be an adept in the art of persuasion. He was subtle at subterfuge, clever at finding excuses for himself to himself, and why not to this unworldly, out-of-the-world girl, who was in many things little better than a child? Surely he could persuade her, and for her own advantage too. For since her father lived, there was not much chance of the inheritance coming her way. It would depend upon Margery, however, and Margery was on his side. He next questioned with himself as to whether he should write or go in person to plead his cause, and he decided on the former course, as "it was quite possible to trust to her discretion about the letters," so he said to himself.

Then there ensued between those two most dissimilar of human beings a curious correspondence, which was carefully destroyed on both sides.

"How am I to make you see," wrote Horace Oglvie, "that what I said concerning you was not written seriously? A man does not tell his mother everything, like a child; and one may speak very lightly and jesting of what lies very near one's heart."

And in this written dialogue Peggy made answer, that there was that besides and beneath the words which was no jest, which had taken away the veil not only from his heart, but from her own. "I think you have loved me a little," she wrote. "I do not think you have been wholly false; you have only been half-hearted. You care, however much you may deceive yourself, as much for this inheritance as you do for me. Do you think you could give me the other half of your heart if you were disappointed in this, and, since my father lives, you risk the disappointment?"

"I will risk it," wrote Horace, in reply, among other persuasives.

"But I cannot," she answered. "If I loved you wholly I would. But I have been half-hearted too. It seems almost as if I had loved some one else in you—as if you had undergone some transformation, such as we read of in fairy stories. What prospect of happiness could there be for us, each knowing that the other was thus half-hearted? You say our hearts would grow whole. The rift in the young tree widens: it never heals. There would be distrust between us from the first."

And Captain Oglvie, after this, thought to himself that, after all, it had better be so. Her insight frightened him. It would be a horrid thing to have a wife who didn't believe in him, especially an awfully clever wife who was always looking through and through a fellow, and with whom it would be impossible to keep up appearances. A man, under such circumstances, could hardly remain on good terms even with himself—a possibility more terrible than it seems on the surface. As for her, she is quite right; I might get to hate her. And yet he felt, when the feeling of his injuries came uppermost, that if she had only loved him, he could easily have become the man of his own and her best ideal; he felt, too, that, as it was, he might be very bad indeed—might come into the condition of hate which she described; and he shrank from it as he shrank from the idea of torture.

Peggy had prevailed, and he wrote to her a full and free release, and immunity from any further importunity; and, after all, he did it gracefully—so gracefully that gratitude was the uppermost feeling in her mind when their correspondence closed.

Margery had seen her receive several letters, and had held her peace, though in high dudgeon at what she considered pure coquetry on Peggy's part. But at length her silence gave way. "So you are still corresponding with Horace," she said (they were both engaged in reading letters). "I thought you had refused him."

"This is the last I am to have from him," replied Peggy.

Then Margery's pent-up wrath burst forth, and the coarse and repellent part of her nature came out. She told her helpless inmate, for the present depending on her for shelter and home, that she ought to have thought herself highly honoured to be asked to be Captain Oglivie's wife. What was to become of her? she asked, and her listener felt bitterly the humiliation of the question.

"I mean to go to my father," was the answer.

"And I can tell you he does not want you," rejoined Margery, in her anger, increased by the answer. With all her goodness—and she could be heroically good—this woman was not fitted to win love; once firmly won, she might have kept it. She had coveted this girl's, and she was casting it from her thus. "He as good as sold you," she went on; "I gave him a sum of money to part with you, to leave you where you are, for your own good, and he hasn't kept to his bargain; he wants more. See," and she flung her letter across the table.

"You are very cruel," said the girl, with trembling lips; and Margery's wrath became remorse, as she looked in the sad young face, and noticed, for the first time, the change that had been growing in it, the look of desolateness in the far-off looking eyes, the gain which was yet a loss; the change from the bright beauty of youth to the woman's beauty of soul.

Margery would have taken back the letter, but

Peggy was already reading it. It was from her father, pleading poverty and sickness in his home. And he had spoken to his wife about his only daughter, and his wife had desired that she should come; she might be of use to them, she had talents which might be cultivated. Would Margery let her go?

"He only wants more money," said Margery, nervously, when she saw that the letter was finished.

"I will try to believe the best," replied Peggy; "I will try to think he wants me. He at least has claims upon me which cannot be bought and sold. I will go to him in his sickness and poverty, and try to help him."

"You will not succeed; no one ever yet succeeded in helping Louis Oglivie," replied Margery. "He is a spendthrift and a gambler, and who knows what this French wife of his may be? She is very likely urging him to try and get something more out of his friends. Give such people anything, and they immediately begin to wish for more. I tell you, Margaret Oglivie, that you will never repent going but once, and that will be all your life. You can choose between him and me; and I've meant better by you than maybe you think, though my words are rough."

"I shall think nothing of the words," said Peggy, eagerly; "I know you are good and kind. But do not hinder me from going. I believe it will be best for all of us; for him and me, at least."

"You must take your own way," replied Margery, "of course, I cannot hinder you; and if ever you want a home," she added, almost humbly, "will you come to me?"

"I will," was the answer; and Peggy meant what she said. She had recognised Margery's greatness of heart, under all her poverty of expression, and she was not one who for pride's sake would baulk a generous heart of its desire. But many things must be settled before she would again seek a home in her native country. For the present, there was only exile before her.

CRIPPLED GERDA.

It was a holiday in the little German duchy of Sclatenburg, because it was the birthday of the duke's only daughter, Princess Olga. The schools were all closed, and no work was going forward among the young people in the fields and factories. It was especially their holiday, because the princess was only a girl, like themselves, except for her royal blood.

At the west side of the castle ran a road, cut through deep, mossy embankments. It had but few houses, and they were only poor cottages, quaintly built. At the door of one of them, stood a group of children, clad in clean white garments, with sundry gay ties, and one or two natural wreaths for finery. In a little chair on the threshold, sat a pleasant-looking girl, also dressed in white, but wearing no ribbon or flower, though a little bunch of field-blooms stood in a bowl beside her. Her face was very pale, and her hands were smooth and dainty as any court madam's. Ah! Gerda often sighed, when she thought how brown and hard her mother's were—it was the will of God that the poor woman should never have a daughter's help; for Gerda could not move unless she was lifted, and so she must sit in her little chair, and wait till the angels come to carry her into paradise!

"And where shall you go first?" she inquired of her gay companions.

"Why, of course, to the market, to get our bouquets," said one; "and then to the town-hall, to fetch the white banners; and then to the great hall at the castle, where we must wait till the princess comes into the gallery; and then we sing our anthem, and lay down our flowers."

"I should like to go, just once," whispered Gerda, very softly.

"Why! have you never been?" exclaimed a tall girl, a new arrival in Sclatenburg.

"I have always sat in this chair," answered Gerda, simply; and the stranger blushed, and was silent.

"It seems cruel to leave you at home, Gerda," said another.

"Oh, no," she replied; "I always enjoy the princess's birthday. You all have so much pleasant news."

"How contented you are," remarked a dark girl, with flashing black eyes. "Do you never wish for anything, Gerda?"

"Ah, that I do!" she answered, looking up with a sweet smile, though her voice sounded rather like a sigh.

"What do you wish?" asked the other, kneeling beside her. "I wonder if you wish like I do?"

"I wish I was useful," said Gerda.

"Ah, I never think about that," replied the girl, starting to her feet. "I only wish for finer muslins, or a French ribbon—or a sweetheart. I'm useless enough, in all conscience! I think we all are."

"Oh, no," said Gerda, deprecatingly. "See, now, to-day you are able to go and please the princess—the poor princess! They say she does not look happy. The grand duke's new wife is not so sweet as her own dear dead mother. And when she sees your flowers, and hears your song, it may give her new heart to live on in her grand loneliness."

Then they kissed her, and said it was very well for her to be a saint, sitting quietly there, and they all went off down the road, laughing and chatting; and Gerda watched them until they were out of sight.

Upon the whole, Gerda's seat was very pleasant: the grass was fresh and neatly mown, and the edges of the embankment were fringed with gay wild flowers. There was a wide sky-view, and not a sound to break the silence, except the occasional rattle of pot or pan in the house-yard, where her mother was at work. But it must be a very pleasant prospect which does not grow distasteful, when seen day after day for many years. Did Gerda have no unhappy, wearisome hours? If so, her face did not tell their history. She was quite content with the little changes which her cheerful spirit could detect in her monotonous life. A new hymn-tune, a book at fair-time, or a fresh knitting-pattern, were her only excitements, and she made up her mind to be satisfied with them.

So she sat there, knitting and singing softly, until she concluded that her young friends' presentation at the castle must be over, and began to long for their return. Presently a small, low chaise, drawn by white ponies, came along the road. It held two ladies, one with grey hair, while the other was still very young, scarcely past early girlhood, yet with a pale, worn face, and large intense eyes. The latter checked the reins when she saw Gerda, and whispered to the other, who said aloud—

"Little girl, how is it you are not with the village lasses, at the castle?"

"I cannot go," answered Gerda. "I am unable to walk."

"Have you been ill?" inquired the lady.

"No, I am always well," said Gerda; "but I am a cripple."

"You were singing the hymn they have been singing (here)," remarked the younger lady.

"Oh, yes!" said Gerda, "I like to do all I can—it is but little!"

"Are you not very dull?" asked the lady.

"No!" answered Gerda. "Just now I'm expecting them back with all the news of the castle."

The strangers exchanged glances. "We have been there, too," they said; "what would you like to hear?"

"About the princess," said Gerda. "Did she look happy?"

The younger lady bent forward, and spoke very gently: "The poor princess may well envy you, little girl."

"But she needn't," said Gerda, looking up brightly. "God's will is good, for the princess as well as for me!"

Gerda almost fancied that tears came into the stranger's great brown eyes; but certainly a beautiful smile broke over her pale face.

"Will you tell me your name?" she whispered; "the princess will like to hear the name of the little girl who wishes her so well, though she cannot come to see her."

"I am Gerda Hansler," said the girl.

And then the lady touched the little ponies, and they whirled away; but before they passed out of sight, she turned to leave a parting smile with crippled Gerda. And Gerda wondered who they were.

* * * * *

That evening the Princess Olga sat in her dressing-room. Her diamond tiara was put aside, her beautiful hair was unbound, and her attendants had departed, save one—the grey-haired Fraulein von Eutenberg, who had been the early friend of the dead grand duchess, and who called the princess "my darling" instead of "your serene highness."

"My darling," she said, "the pleasant excitements of to-day have done you good. You look quite bright."

"Ah, fraulein," answered the princess, "al thanks to little Gerda Hansler. She did not think that I must be happy because of my coronet and my castle—the very things which lie upon my soul like leaden chains. But she reminded me that they were as much the will of God as her own bodily suffering. If she can smile as she carries her heavy cross, should not I smile though a thorn lurk among the roses of my crown? 'God's will is good for both,' she said. That lesson is my best birthday gift."

NEW BOOKS.

THE history of chivalry contains no more noble, generous, stainless knight than the Chevalier Bayard; and yet, save as connected with the knight-ing of Francis I., or the administering a deathbed rebuke to the Constable of Bourbon, he is almost unknown to English readers. We are, therefore, glad to see a charming translation, by E. Walford, of the Chevalier's life, from the French of M. De Berville.* The typography and style of binding are both in excellent taste.

"Remoter Stars in the Church Sky" is the collective title of a series of biographical notices of the less eminent divines. The author, with true national instinct, has given a preponderance to the Scottish lights; nevertheless he has grouped together a galaxy of no mean lustre, and his little book will surely find favour with those who love to trace the lives and works of men comparatively unknown to the world but great in the kingdom of heaven.†

In a seasonable and judicious series‡ of congregational instructions, the author displays a comprehensive acquaintance with, and discriminative use of, his materials, which, in the popular shape in which the question of the church in these realms is submitted, cannot fail, under God's blessing, of being eminently useful. The analogy between Roman and ritualistic teaching, and the contrast to both, in the Articles, Liturgy, and Homilies of the English Church, is demonstrated unanswerably. Starting with the assertion of "the close agreement of the Church of Rome and the ritualists," the author shows: "in both cases the appeal is to Scripture and tradition. In both cases the right of private judgment is denied. In both cases the supreme authority of the church is proclaimed." No candid or unbiassed student of truth could read these admirable Lectures, without arriving at a general accordance with the author's reasoning. As a manual for circulation among the laity, the little work is invaluable.

Under the title of "Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets," the Rev. E. Paxton Hood discourses wisely and well upon the qualifications necessary to the sacred office and calling of the ministry. The student would do well to make himself acquainted with this volume; and, apart from the valuable matter contained in it, he will derive much pleasure and profit from the perusal of a work remarkable for perspicuity of style and elegance of composition.§

A translation of Dr. Preuss' Work on the Immaculate Conception is valuable, as showing the practical working of the development theory in the Roman Church. It surprised many persons when, a few years ago, the Papal powers decreed by a bull the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception to be a matter de fide, how uncomplainingly this addition to the Roman faith was accepted by that Church. Dr. Preuss in his history of the origin of this doctrine shows that it was practically accepted and believed by the members of the Church of Rome before it was sanctioned by the Papal bull, which really only made public, as a matter of faith, what was secretly being held as such. We learn from this interesting and lucid history of the growth of this doctrine, how dangerous is the beginning of religious error, and how the cloud, at first no bigger than a man's hand, may gradually increase until the whole light of heaven is obscured by dense masses of superstition.*

Biographical and literary "studies" are very plentiful in the present day, when men are becoming more and more in the habit of thinking for themselves, and each one imagines the result of his own researches to be more original and, perhaps, more perfect than any other. It is a pity to think how many really respectable productions are thus noiselessly appearing, to be quickly shelved, and forgotten by even the few who have been made aware of them, in much less time than it has taken to write them; and it is then the author is forced to feel that "much study is a weariness to the flesh," and too often ends in "vexation of spirit." In the present work,† Dr. Ross has, in three essays, enlarged upon the merits and characteristics of three great men—Shakespeare, Dr. Johnson, and Sir Walter Raleigh. The book evidences much thought and care throughout; let us hope that it is not a labour lost.

We have space for only a passing notice of the following books:—"Sermons from the Studio," by Marie Sibree (Jackson, Walford, and Hodder), a series of thoughtful papers on the relations of art to religion, gracefully written, and deserving of a less abrupt notice than the present one; "Old Merry's Annual" (Jackson, Walford, and Hodder), an excellent story-book for young people, admirably got up and cheap; the Eleventh Part of "Cassell's Biographical Dictionary" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), which alone contains some 400 or 500 concise but interestingly-written biographies, the most notable amongst which are those of Dr. Bickersteth, Sir Henry Bishop, Count Von Bismark, Sir William Blackstone, Admiral Blake, Robert Bloomfield, and Anne Boleyn; and has for a frontispiece a well-executed portrait of John Bunyan.

ST. MARGARET'S, WESTMINSTER.

THE GRAVES OF CANTON THE PRINTER, SKELTON THE POET, AND RALEIGH THE HERO.

IN many a secluded English village the church is often the only building which wins the traveller's notice. "The Hall," or "the great house," may stand near, but they seldom draw away attention from the grey tower, rich with the sculptured work of ages past, or from the humbler lichen-tinted and ivy-garlanded walls. In such rural homes every surrounding object gives prominence to the church. The quiet landscape, the embowering foliage, and the hamlet homes, all tend to make the old pile the grand point of the picture. Now, look at the contrast in St. Margaret's, Westminster. Was ever church so thrown into the background by the grandeur of its neighbours? The magnificent Abbey long made the church look like a poorly-clad infant by the side of a king on his throne. The predominance of the monastic pile might, however, have been endured—it was but the supremacy of a relation—but in the nineteenth century a structure has arisen which throws its huge shadow over both Abbey and church. The massive and lofty towers of the Houses of Parliament, and the long lines of sculptured stone, attract nearly every eye. Time was when St. Margaret's seemed part of one vast royal and ecclesiastical pile; now she stands alone; the Abbey scarcely recognising her, and the imperial pile in front looks as if deeming her presence an intrusion. Stern critics and disciples of "the beautiful" have even requested her to depart altogether from the place, and make room for "æsthetic" fountains and the statues of kings and statesmen. But the lady moves not; here she has sat from the days of Edward the Confessor; kings have been her visitors, and she has talked with men of renown. Here she will still sit, and commune, if it be possible, with the political principalities and powers now gathering in their imperial splendours round her.

Why was St. Margaret of Antioch selected as the patron of this church? Why go to Syria, when there surely must have been plenty of home-made saints to select from? St. Margaret was no ordinary canonised maiden: listen to one old story of her deeds, and then judge whether she must not have been a maiden of might.

One day Satan himself appeared before her, not, however, in the form of a knight, prince, or potentate, but in that of a ferocious, fiery-eyed, and open-mouthed dragon—looking, in fact, just like the brother of that strange beast over which the most noble and most mighty St. George triumphs on a thousand signboards. Now, we must confess that we never thought much of St. George's vaunted feat. Armed with that tremendously long spear, and seated on that terrific steed, any one—even we ourselves—could have killed the dragon. No spear was in the maiden's hand—nothing but a bit of the true cross, given to her by a kind angel; yet see the result. The dragon was so subdued that the lady led him about with a string round his neck, as if he had been a Regent Street poodle-dog! Talk no more of St. George after that.

Another legend makes the triumph of Margaret more amazing still, and the defeat of the dragon more ignominious. According to this report, the monster had it all his own way for a little while; he swallowed the damsel whole. Of course, all was over with the lady then? Not by any means; the dragon had for once made a mistake. The saint victoriously stepped out through the riven side of the brute!

We know not which of the two accounts to admire most. The first has more of poetic gentleness, and the second most of stern justice.

There is, we must hint, a third story, much too simple, many will say, to be true. A heathen governor of Antioch loved Margaret; she repulsed his offers, and he beheaded her. This was not, however, the story which the popular traditions accepted, and which made St. Margaret the favourite of the ladies. Nearly two hundred and fifty English churches were placed under her protection. Art loved to depict her marvellous deeds; and her head, garlanded with pearls or daisies, was seen on many a "storied window" in grand mediæval churches. Edward the Confessor had, therefore, good reasons for dedicating his new church to such a famous saint. Her image was long preserved in this church; and though the Abbey of St. Germaine, at Paris, might exult in the possession of Margaret's girdle, Westminster had one of her fingers cased in silver, and also "a piece of the head of St. George." We venture most respectfully to ask whether these relics are still to be seen.

Some critics attribute the present appearance of this church to tasteless repairs and alterations. They do not seek for any part of the old pile raised by the Confessor, or for that rebuilt under Edward I. by the parish and the Hanse merchants, but think that the structure rebuilt in the time of Edward IV. should look a little more like "the parish church of the Commons of Great Britain." A writer in 1799 is exceedingly fierce, declaring that the architects had made the edifice "the butt of contempt." The porch, especially, excited his indignation. The parishioners, it seems, looked upon this unfortunate porch as "Druidical in design." The critic tells them they might as well call the style "Hottentot." The repairs of 1802 were not more satisfactory. An architect then asked the parish officials to inform him whether the style of the work was borrowed from "Rome, Egypt, China, or Lapland."

Some, however, who will not say much for the exterior, stand up for the beauty of the interior. Let us enter, and look for ourselves. We may adopt the words of a writer, who denies that "alterations have destroyed the ancient simplicity and grandeur." The beauty is not of the highest; some may deny the "grandeur" altogether, though a modern writer calls the interior "most grand and imposing;" many will admire the pulpit, called "one of the richest in London;" most will glance at the Speaker's pew and the Commons' gallery; but all will study, for at least a few minutes, the richly-pictured east window, and recall its singular history. The Roman soldiers, the sorrowing Marys near the cross, the centurion with the spear, the view of Jerusalem in the distance, the demon carrying off the soul of one thief, while the angel bears the other to paradise, are all in strange contrast with the figures of Harry VII., his wife Elizabeth, St. George and St. Catherine. To increase the chronological complexity, we have the white and red roses of York and Lancaster, in company with the pomegranate of Arragon.

We do not here enter upon a discussion whether the royal personages are Prince Arthur and Catherine of Arragon, or Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York: the pomegranate naturally suggests the idea of Catherine. The magistrates of Dort intended this rich work for the chapel of Henry VII., but the picture reached England in unsettled times, and was never placed in Westminster Abbey. The Augustine canons of Waltham obtained the precious work, and held it until the dissolution of the monasteries, when the last abbot, Robert Fuller, managed to remove the whole window to the chapel at New Hall, Essex. A subsequent purchaser, the Presbyterian General Monk, is said to have buried it, in order to save the work from destruction, as a "superstitious" picture. The window was replaced in New Hall after 1660, and at length found a rest in St. Margaret's Church in 1758, when the parish purchased it for four hundred guineas. But trouble came to the new possessors. The churchwardens, William Rusted and Samuel Peirson, were charged with setting up "a superstitious window," and fierce was the conflict which ensued. The storm ceased after a suit of seven years, when the citation was dismissed, each party paying their own costs. The victorious Samuel Peirson celebrated "the battle of the window" by presenting a "loving-cup" of silver to the parish. Long may the window remain the chief ornament of the church, and long may the cup be honoured.

The old rood-loft* had its changes in exact harmony with the revolutions in religious opinions. In 1480 "the rood-crucifix, Mary and John," were all carefully repaired; in 1548 they were taken down, for Edward VI. was king; in 1556 they were set up again, on the truly logical ground that Mary was queen; in 1559 down they came once more, when Queen Elizabeth did reign.

The chapels of St. Margaret, St. George, St. Catherine, St. Erasmus, St. John, St. Cornelius, St. Nicholas, and St. Christopher, have also long disappeared, to the grief of some ecclesiastical antiquarians.

The parish had, however, other serious matters to manage. Fleas, dogs, episcopal feasts, the sale of church metal, midwives' pews, and the transportation of redundant children,—all and each vexed at times the perplexed vestries of St. Margaret's. We tremble at the state of the church pews, when reading the following item in the parish books in 1610:—"Paid to Mrs. Wells, sixpence, for salt to destroy the fleas in the churchwardens' pew." Fleas luxuriating in the churchwardens' pew! It seems to pass our comprehension. What, then, must have been the condition of the humbler pews? The next item is, "Paid £2 5s. for making a new pew for the nurses." Why should the nurses have a pew all to themselves? The nurses were, we admit, important persons in former times: they were even expected to baptise infants, on emergencies; but whether this will account for this special pew, must be left to a future time for discussion.

Dogs seem to have had an awful time of it in Westminster. We have had proposals in these tender-hearted modern times for the establishment of "dog orphan-homes," but the old vestry of St. Margaret's would have laughed at such nonsense. Among the parish accounts for 1603 is the following item:—"Robert Wells, paid six shillings and eightpence, for killing eighty dogs, and one penny each for killing four hundred and twenty-two more in the same summer." Five hundred and two dogs killed by Robert Wells in one parish in one year! These luckless animals were supposed to carry the plague from place to place, and so suffered on sanitary grounds.

In 1642 a vigorous attempt seems to have been made by the parish to get rid of its surplus infant population. In that year £26 12s. 6d. was collected "to carry children to New England." How many were thus transported we know not; doubtless it was a great relief to the poor-rate, and, therefore, laudable.

The restoration of the Papal power, under Mary, brought a charge on the parish purse, for the bishop's dinner, in 1544, at "the reconciliation of the church." The dinner was not very luxurious, the most solid joint being "a sirloin of beef," to which was liberally added "eleven gallons of wine." The reader will not fail to notice the name "sirloin" thus early used.

Here is an entry, under the date 1644, well suited to enrage an antiquary: "For twenty-nine pounds of fine brass, at fourpence per pound and ninety-six pounds of coarse brass, at threepence per pound, taken off tombstones in the church, £1 13s. 6d." One hundred and twenty-five pounds of sculptured monumental brasses sold at the price of refuse metal!

* A beam supporting a crucifix over the entrance to the chancel.

In the church thus despoiled many remarkable men have preached, and some exciting events have occurred. Here Father Latimer drew such crowds that even the pews were broken by the crush. The Puritan divines, Calamy, Owen, Baxter, and Hugh Peters, exhorted and argued in stormy times to excited audiences. Here Stillingfleet and Lightfoot showed the union of logic with learning. The reasonings of Tenison, Tillotson, and Sherlock delighted the taste of a less fervid age; and Bishop Atterbury, political, daring, and able, stands in contrast with the devotional Horne and the poetic Dr. Young.

The congregation at St. Margaret's was often of a peculiar character. On one occasion, in 1627, "four hundred and sixty-eight" of the House of Commons are enumerated as communicants. In St. Margaret's, on September 25th, 1643, the "Solemn League and Covenant" was signed. Let us endeavour to recall the scene. The building is crowded with the House of Commons and the Assembly of Divines; many an anxious heart is there, for the great civil war has begun. A psalm is sung, and then Mr. White has a prayer for near an hour; after this Mr. Nye preaches fervently for another hour; it is not over yet, for see, Mr. Alexander Henderson rises, and speaks from his seat "a long time." We must not go away, for brother Nye now reads the Covenant, clause by clause, and at each section all signify assent by holding up their hands.

Here, too, on the 31st of May, in the same year, Pym and the Commons had met to observe a solemn fast day, and were listening to a sermon, when a messenger hurriedly entered Pym's pew with the astounding news that the poet Waller had secretly collected "a thousand desperate rogues from Oxford," to murder the chief members of the governing party.

That broad, open churchyard, too, has had its historical contrasts. On the 23rd of November, 1658, a huge scaffolding, erected on "two hundred and forty feet of ground," was crowded with spectators, to witness the funeral procession of Cromwell, as it passed into the Abbey. Three years after, large open graves were seen in this churchyard, and groups of whispering men saw coffin after coffin hurried out of their Abbey tombs to these unhonoured pits. Who are the silent ones thus torn from their resting-places? Amongst them are the Lady Elizabeth Cromwell, mother of the bold Protector; his daughter, Mrs. Claypole; Admiral Blake, who had brought honour to the English flag on every sea; Pym, the great orator of the Long Parliament—the "King Pym" of the admiring people. The lap-dogs of Charles II. were treated with profound respect by the worthy courtiers who thus insulted the memory of Blake.

Though William Caxton is the most remarkable man buried in this church, there are others who demand a moment's notice. The headless body of the fine-hearted English soldier, sailor, scholar, and gentleman, Sir Walter Raleigh, was buried in the chancel here, on the 18th of October, 1618, the day on which he was beheaded, in the adjoining Palace Yard. The head was interred by his son, Carew Raleigh, in West Horsley Church, Surrey, and is said to have been found there in 1703.

John Skelton, the bold though reckless clerical poet, who satirised Wolsey as "the butcher's dog," died 21st of June, 1529, in the sanctuary where the exasperated cardinal had compelled him to take refuge for many years, and is buried in the church. Near Skelton's grave is that of a "court poet," Thomas Churchyard, whose monument once warned all against the cultivation of poetry. Here are his parting words:—

"Povertie and poetrie this tomb doth enclose;
Therefore, gentlemen, be merry in prose."

A greater poet than Skelton or Churchyard entered St. Margaret's Church as a mourner on the 10th of February, 1657. On that day Catherine, the second wife of Milton, was laid in her grave. Milton's twenty-third sonnet has given to his "late espoused saint" a long-enduring memorial.

Lady Dorothy Stafford's monument sounds her praises in three particulars. First, she "did good to everybody;" secondly, she "never hurted any," and thirdly, she was lady of the bedchamber "to Queen Elizabeth for forty years." We feel the profoundest respect for Lady Dorothy.

The monument of James Palmer, B.D., says that he preached twice a week "a comfortable sermon" to the people in his own almshouses. That "comfortable sermon" speaks volumes in praise of James Palmer, B.D.

William Caxton, our first printer, is the most suggestive name connected with St. Margaret's. There is a fitness in the place of the old printer's burial. He sleeps near the Abbey Almonry, where his printing-press began its influential work. Hither he invited, by handbills still preserved, the small reading public of his day to come and see a machine which was to revolutionise the world. We cannot say that he ventured on penny periodicals; those teachers of the millions were far distant; neither Caxton nor Wynkin de Worde saw, even in their most romantic visions, such a future. But our friend in the almonry would have sold you a "History of Troy," "The Oration of John Russell," "The Game of Chess," "The Sayings of the Philosophers," or, if you preferred it, "The Life of Jason," or a "History of King Arthur." A well-informed, observant, persevering, and hardworking man was this early printer and publisher. His friend and associate, Wynkin de Worde, tells us that Caxton was busy at work on the last day of his life, when he finished the translation of "the Fathers."

Other worthy printers carried on his work. Wynkin de Worde, Pynson, Grafton, Day, Parker, Baskerville, Bulmer, the Foulis, and numerous successors, advanced the great art, but William Caxton stands in front of the long line. The old workman was not buried without honour. On the day of his funeral, in 1491, the parish provided four torches to be burnt in his honour, costing "six shillings and eightpence."

The tablet by Westmacott, erected in St. Margaret's by the Roxburgh Club, in 1820, to the memory of the great printer, is fixed in the wall of the south aisle, close to the door at the south-east entrance of the church. Some gentlemen, who rightly regarded Caxton as a great national benefactor, wished to place the monument in Westminster Abbey. What hindered? the exorbitant fee demanded by the Abbey officials. Is not this food for a satirist? First we allow three centuries to pass before we give a monument; then it is excluded from the great national temple because of the fees!

We trust that the lovers of "architectural and æsthetic harmony" will consent to let this church stand, if only for the sake of its historical associations. "It spoils our view of the Abbey," says one class of critics; "It is not in harmony with the Westminster Palace," cries another. Very true, gentlemen; the church pleads guilty to these heavy charges; but it also hints that it contains the body of William Caxton, and that its presence reminds Englishmen of men and events which have permanently influenced the mind of England.

W. D.

THE ALL-SEEING EYE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SELF-MADE MEN."

EARLY four thousand years have rolled away since Hagar uttered the four striking words, "Thou God seest me," in the lonely wilderness of Beer-sheba, but they have lost none of their practical importance. While sitting by a fountain in that tenantless region, the Angel of the Lord appeared, and in the kindest manner remonstrated with her on the course she was pursuing. Encouraged by the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi, "the well of the visible God," Hagar retraced her steps to the tent of Abraham, where, in due time, Ishmael was born. The Angel that appeared to Hagar when she fled from the face of her mistress, was the Lord Jesus Christ—the Angel of the Covenant—who, in a human form, appeared to Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and other Old Testament saints. Keeping this in view, we now proceed to illustrate the mighty principles which stand out prominently on the face of the text, and which ought never to be forgotten.

There is an All-Seeing Eye.—We do not refer to the omniscience of God as a matter that needs proof, but for the purpose of reminding you of the propriety of familiarising your mind with that solemn fact. As a truth, it is clearly taught in the Bible, and all who believe in its divinity will bow to its decisions and conclusions. "Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord." "The darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee." This inspection is universal. Hagar is seen weeping in the way to Shur; Jacob is seen during the night in the solitudes of Luz; David is seen watching his sheep on the plains of Bethlehem; Nathanael is seen sitting under his fig-tree. But it is not enough to assent to general truth; there must be specific, personal application. This All-seeing Eye is in the sanctuary, watching you as you sit among the worshippers; in the family, seeing how fathers and mothers train their children, and how children obey their parents; in the street and the counting-house, in the shop and in the factory. Nor is this all. The Divine Eye is not confined to this world; it beholds all the worlds, and all the creatures, and all the things in the universe. God sits, as it were, on the centre of creation, and beholds all its movements.

"He smiles in heaven, He frowns in hell,
He fills the air, the earth, the sea;
None can without his presence dwell,
And none can from his anger flee."

This All-Seeing Eye is the Eye of your Protector.
—If there be anything plain in the world, it is that God

"Overrules all mortal things,
And manages our mean affairs."

He has innumerable instruments and agents—the angels—the fixed material laws—the faculties and instincts of the mind—the rules of Providence, and the principles of philosophy. But these do not operate of themselves. The Lord uses them, but He is your protector. This protection is minutely particular; it respects all persons, and all conditions, and all events. There must either be a universal Providence, or no Providence at all. A simple lad once dreamed a dream,—it foreshadowed the formation of mighty empires, the preservation of the chosen people, and the coming of the Saviour of the world. The flight of a bird once changed the fate of a whole country. In nothing is there chance, but in everything there is God. There is design in everything—an end to be served. All things work together, and work together for good. Things happen, not because they must happen, but because it is right they should happen. Some men are frightened at a very little thing; but those who believe that the eye of an Almighty Protector is watching over them, are calm and collected in the very centre of danger.

“‘Twas when the sea’s tremendous roar
A little barque assailed,
And pallid fear in awful form
O’er each on board prevailed—
Save one, the captain’s darling boy,
Who fearless viewed the storm;
And, playful, with composure smiled
At danger’s threatening form.
‘Why sporting thus,’ the sailors cried,
‘While terrors overwhelm?’
‘Why yield to grief?’ the boy replied;
‘My father’s at the helm.’”

The child of God knows that his Father manages all things for his benefit, and can therefore smile in the midst of the storm.

This All-Seeing Eye is the Eye of your Provider.
—All creatures come within the pale of God’s providing agency. Those that have powers of locomotion must work for their bread. Hence, in search of food, the cattle roam the fields, the fish cleave the waters of the mighty deep, and the wild beasts hunt the desert and the jungle. God has promised to provide for you, but only in conjunction with your own agency. You must not neglect the means, and expect Providence to work miracles to supply your wants. Your Provider is sometimes better than his promises, and gives you luxuries; but be not very anxious about these, for they who have abundance of this world’s good things, find it difficult to pray “give us each day our daily bread.” Child of poverty, use the means, and look up to God as your Provider. David says, “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.” A good man, unable to extricate himself from pecuniary difficulties, came to the resolution of leaving his native country. There remained but one Lord’s Day previous to his departure, and he resolved to keep it holy. The minister he went to hear selected for the subject of his discourse, Ps. xxxvii. 3: “Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.” His attention was arrested by the text, nor did he feel himself less interested in the sermon, every sentence of which was peculiarly applicable to his circumstances; and led him to conclude that the whole was the voice of Providence. He changed his purpose, and resolved to struggle against the torrent of adversity, and await the good pleasure of his God concerning him. The time to favour him soon arrived. The Lord quickly turned back his captivity, and caused his latter end to be more blessed than his beginning.

“The birds, without barn or storehouse, are fed:
From them let us learn to trust for our bread.
His saints what is fitting shall ne’er be denied,
So long as ‘tis written—‘The Lord will provide.’”

This All-Seeing Eye is the Eye of your Saviour.
—This Eye swims in tears. No ordinary human being could ever suffer as Jesus did, for his soul was greater than all other souls, and therefore, more sensitive to evils, pains, and sorrows. Go to the brow of yon hill, from which a full view of Jerusalem is obtained; stand by the side of the Man of Sorrows; behold the big tears rolling down his sacred cheeks, and hear him exclaiming, “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!”

“He wept alone, and men passed on—the men whose woes He bore:
They saw the Man of Sorrows weep; they had seen Him weep before.
They asked not who those tears were for; they asked not whence they flowed;
Those tears were for rebellious men, their source—the heart of God.”

Jesus is not only able to sympathise; he is also able to succour. “This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners;” “wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.” If the greatest criminal in the world would but look by faith to Jesus, the mighty load of guilt would roll off his shoulders, and his conscience would be cleansed from the foul and deadly stain of sin. The salvation of Jesus is commensurate with all your necessities, adequate to all your demands, and contains all that your circumstances require.

This All-Seeing Eye is the Eye of your Judge.
—“Before him shall be gathered all nations.” What a vast assembly! All the inhabitants of the world, from Adam to his last-born son, shall be gathered together, and stand at the bar of judgment at the last day. Yet no witnesses will be required, nor jury need to be empanelled; for the All-seeing Judge is as entirely and absolutely acquainted with the thoughts, desires, motives, and acts of each, as if there had been no other creature in the universe. There will be no mistake of character.

"Thou God seest me," may be read in the dispensations of Providence, the glorious retrospect of the saint, and the corroding recollection of the sinner. Write it in your heart, and on the lintels of your doors; hear it in the still small voice of conscience: forget it not on a sick bed; forget it not when you come to die: "Thou God seest me."

HURRICANES.

WHAT is a hurricane? The answer is not an easy one—that is to say, an intelligent answer. Half-answers, evasive answers, designed to conceal the want of knowledge in the speakers, are in plenty, and to spare; but an honest explanation is far to seek. The truth is, there is much real difficulty in ascertaining, even approximately, the causes which give rise to hurricanes. More than enough is known of their effects; of the violent wind, which turneth itself round and "whirlleth about continually," overturning houses, breaking up ships, dashing stones, and men, and cattle, and the produce of the ground, into one common pounding mill, and crushing them as in a mortar. The frightful effects of a severe hurricane have lately been seen in the complete devastation of the town of St. Thomas, in the West Indies, and in the total wreck of four mail steamers with upwards of fifty sailing vessels. And not only have St. Thomas and the parts immediately adjacent, suffered—the whole coastline of the Gulf of Mexico, north of Matamoras, and even to some distance south of it, has been the scene of many a fearful wreck, and of numerous casualties fatal to life. The effects are well known; but what about the cause?

In the earliest description of a hurricane with which the writer is acquainted, that given by Benzoni, the Milanese, who, in the year 1541, "started from Milan, in the name of God, the Sustainer and Governor of all the universe," in order to visit the New World, the causes assigned by the Spaniards and Indians respectively are stated, but the modest writer says, he leaves it to "the judgment of the more learned, and to intellects more worthy than his or those of the Indians," to decide between the two opinions. Without arrogating too much on the score of more learnedness, we may safely reject both the Spanish and the Indian theory. The Spaniards said the hurricane, which seems to have been a very bad one, was due to the devil, who was angry at so many souls being baptised, and had therefore "contrived all this destruction;" "and it was a general opinion that the erection of the holy ensign of the cross in these islands, was driving away the infernal spirits, who had been so long masters of those rough and ignorant men (the Indians), and that they made all this disturbance in their forced flight." So much for the Spaniards. The Indians had a very different notion of it. They "imputed all the mischief that had happened to the conduct of the Spaniards, and believed that Heaven wished to have forced them away from them." The description is graphic, and true also of the hurricane which occurred the other day at St. Thomas. Benzoni says, that "from the eastward there came a tremendous storm, such as those islands had never before seen; some winds arose, and one especially, called by the Spaniards Furacano, which came with such violence that it imposed terror both on heaven and earth, and seemed as if it would destroy both; wherefore, everybody felt sure they should die, and that the elements would be confounded and resolved, and so end the world. The lightnings of the air were violent and frequent, the thunder was loud and frightful, the day seemed night, and the darkness so intense that men could not see each other; . . . so raging were the winds, that they fought together screaming, they tore up the trees, they detached stones from the sides of the mountains, and with great fury hurled them into the plains, levelling houses, killing men, and even whole houses, with their inhabitants in them, were carried through the air, and then smashed."

Storms of this kind were experienced from time to time, some being greater and some less; but slight attempts only were made to arrive at an understanding of the causes and origin of them till the beginning of the present century, and it was not till the year 1832, when the attention of scientific and able men was turned to the subject by the fearful hurricane which swept Barbadoes in that year, that any trustworthy information was obtained. Colonel Reid, of the Royal Engineers, and Mr. Redfield, of New York, were the chief students who brought study and long, systematic, observation to bear on the subject.

Hurricane is the name given to a mighty revolving wind, which sweeps the Atlantic Ocean at irregular intervals, in the district comprised in the West Indies and the northern portion of the Gulf of Mexico. It is identical in character (though it is generally more severe) with that wind which is known in the eastern seas as a cyclone. Smaller manifestations of the same kind of wind are seen in white squalls, "devils," water-spouts, land-spouts, and, to compare small things with great, in the insignificant little whirlwinds which are to be seen on a breezy day, whisking the leaves and dust round in an eddy off the road, and moving them along in the direction to which the wind is blowing, at the same time keeping them in a constantly revolving motion.

All these eddies, small and great, are caused by the violent commingling of a stratum of hot air with a stratum of cold air, the former being the stratum next to the earth's surface. The two strata, each at a markedly different temperature, are compelled, by some cause which has not yet been ascertained, to impinge one upon the other. In doing so, a violent disruption takes place of the conditions under which the two formerly existed; the winds fight together, wrestling, and in the action, rubbing against one another, slide round in the direction suggested by the rotary motion of the earth at the place of combat. The greater the amount of hot and cold air to be mixed, the greater the violence of the mixing, and the greater the velocity of the revolving current, which sometimes, in very bad hurricanes, attains a speed of a hundred miles an hour. The amount of space over which the mixing process is going on may be a hundred miles, or more, or less, and that space, whatever it may be, represents the space within which the effects of the hurricane will be felt. But this diameter of a hundred miles, more or less, is not stationary; it moves with the general wind prevailing at the time, and in the direction to which that is going—that is to say, supposing the wind outside the limits of the storm to be blowing at the rate of six miles an hour, the hurricane, revolving within itself at the tremendous rate above mentioned, is moved forward bodily as a whole at the rate of six miles an hour. It is as if a wheel were set in motion, and attained a great velocity, and were then taken up, and, by some other power than its own, moved, still going round, in an independent course.

It is to be observed that Benzoni says the hurricane he witnessed came from the eastward. The result of all the observations has shown that all hurricanes come from that quarter, and generally form some point eastward of Barbadoes, and ranging between the twelfth and nineteenth degrees of north latitude, and between the seventy-fourth and eightieth degrees of west longitude. Their course is north-westerly, with rather more west than north, until they strike the land, when they are turned northward and easterly, and are gradually broken and dissipated. The places which lie outside the home of the hurricanes are, of course, exempt from them; and, taking the above-named degrees of latitude and longitude into consideration, it will be seen, on reference to the map, that Trinidad, Tobago, Grenada, the coasts of Guiana, and the Gulfs of Darien, Columbus, and Honduras, are favoured with exemption.

The months during which hurricanes prevail, and which are known in the language of underwriters as the "hurricane months," are August, September, and October. The indications of an approaching hurricane are—the dense mass of dark clouds containing the revolving vapour, which is to be seen long before it approaches, standing out in sharp relief against the sky around it. The atmosphere becomes oppressively hot, the sun, moon, and stars shine with a pale, sickly light, causing objects to assume sometimes a blue, sometimes a red, and often a dark olive colour. Wind coming in puffs, followed by complete lulls, and accompanied by a scorching sensation in the throat; these are among the indications of the great wind. The surest sign, however, is a rapidly falling barometer, without any apparent cause for the fall. If the barometer be seen to drop quickly and much, it is a sure sign of mischief brewing somewhere. "He who watches his barometer watches his ship," is the careful seaman's maxim.

In the centre of a hurricane there is a calm patch, which often deludes the sailor whose vessel has lived through the first half of the storm. He thinks the tyranny is overpast, and that he may now continue his voyage, though on the horizon all round him he sees signs of the raging storm. Half an hour will undeceive him. By that time the wind will begin to blow with equal, if not greater fury than before, but from the opposite point; a dreadful cross sea will be set up, and the other half of the hurricane will have to be endured. Unless in one particular part of the storm—where, if his ship be perfectly staunch and well prepared, the seaman may manage to edge out of the hurricane, even using its wind for the purpose—the only thing to be done is to lie to, and endeavour to keep the ship from falling into the trough of the sea. Should she fall into it, she must almost certainly be drowned; and in any case the chances are strongly against her, considering the enormous pressure of the wind and the almost irresistible force of the water with which she has to combat.

To give some idea of the rate at which the great hurricane of 1831 travelled, it may be mentioned that, beginning at some point to the south-east of Barbadoes, which place it swept, and destroyed in seven hours 1,477 persons and many thousands of pounds' worth of property, it was at its height at that place by midnight on the 10th of August, and reached St. Vincent at 7 a.m. next morning.

We have, so far, spoken only of the causes and nature of hurricanes; in another paper we hope to draw attention to their beneficial results.

HOPE DEFERRED.

OH, why doesn't Johnny come?
It's getting very late;

Draw the curtain back a little,

He may not know the gate;

For the bushes near were set after he had gone away,

The path has been made broader, and the wall was not so grey.

Do you say it's small use hoping?—

I know you may be right;

But the heart will hope unbidden,

My son may come to-night.

It is ten long years I've waited, and if I die ere morn,

He will not know which house is ours—the curtain will be drawn!

Do you remember Johnny, girl?

You do not think you would;

It is true ten years make changes,

But I am sure I should.

He was not one to change much—my old-fashioned soul is vexed

To see how lads are boys one year, and men and married next!

You wonder why he never wrote;

Ah, child we cannot tell;

We should not judge before we know—

Hark! was not that the bell?

You heard nothing?—dearie me, what was it that I said?—

We should not judge before we know, and Johnny may be dead.

He had words with his father, girl,

Which often gave me pain;

He does not know he will not see

His father's face again;

He does not know these ten long years how poor and lone I've been,

Unless, indeed, he is above, and has looked down and seen.

Yes, Johnny may be dead, child—

But keep the window light—

We don't know what may happen,

And he may come to-night!

I think I soon shall fall asleep, when I have said my prayer,

And God may wake me near his throne, and Johnny may be there!

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.

PEGGY'S PARTING.

IN the meantime, the necessary preparations had been made for quitting Delaube. There had been a sale of the ancient furniture, attended by all the farmer's and tradesmen's wives in the neighbourhood, and the things had fetched high prices, for they were of the kind which age does not deteriorate—old oak cabinets and presses, and tables of shining, dark mahogany, such as the housewives in question coveted. But Louis Oglivie had taken an afterthought, or had been prompted, as Jean shrewdly guessed, and had written to his daughter to remit to him the proceeds of the sale. The letter came close on the back of Margery's, and before Peggy had announced her determination to come to him. It perplexed her exceedingly, for she had just divided the sum, shilling for shilling, with the old couple who were thus turned adrift in their infirm age, after lifelong, faithful service. Then it struck her that she would make Jean claim arrears of wages. The old woman could hardly be brought to do it; but by this means a balance in her favour was shown, even after the division aforesaid, and with what Peggy had retained Louis Oglivie was obliged to be content.

And Jean had secured a cottage in the village of Burnside, and was to open a little shop for the print-workers, who were famous for their consumption of sweets and pastry, in spite of their native virtue of thrift. And Jean was to have the cow, as part of her share of the effects; for, when it had come to a question of selling her, the old woman had lamented the necessity with tears in her eyes, and said, "If I had the siller, I would buy her myself." She never kent what it was to have a hard word flung at her, the bonnie leddy." Indeed, Jean considered that there was more deference due to a cow than to any other creature, not excepting either man or woman. So her young mistress had taken care that Hawkie should be hers, and with Hawkie went the rest of the live stock, consisting of cocks and hens and cats. There were three generations of the latter, all personal friends of Peggy's, who had sketched their various attitudes and expressions over and over again. And all this work of "flitting" she had superintended in the midst of her grave anxiety and distress, remembering the smallest detail that might add to the comfort and happiness of her friends.

Then the house was left empty and bare and desolate, and the day of Peggy's departure was drawing near. She was going to bid farewell to her old friends and to her old home, and, as is always the case in times of change and movement, the days had flown so fast that this had been left to the very last.

It was Saturday afternoon, her own old day at the manse, when she went to say good-bye to the Grants. They were all in the drawing-room, with the exception of Sandie, whose sofa had been removed to his father's study, and who lay there often for hours alone. Dr. Grant had found out that his son craved for solitude, and, anxious to gratify him, had proposed the change, and had actually given up the study for his use.

There was an unusual gravity among them now; even Archie's welcome was subdued and quiet. Mrs. Grant had been displeased to hear of Peggy's engagement from other lips than the girl's own; she was gravely displeased that Peggy had not even mentioned it, and quite determined she should do so first. But her own trouble was at the moment too heavy to allow her to think much of so light a matter.

Peggy's first inquiry was for the absent one. She expected to hear that he was well and hearty, out of doors somewhere.

The one looked to the other to reply. It was Mrs. Grant who did so. "He's as well as he'll ever be," she said, shortly.

"The doctor has only given his opinion to-day. He may be wrong, you know—doctors often are," said Archie, pleadingly, and with an evident disinclination to repeat the verdict.

Peggy looked alarmed.

"He is lame for life, poor fellow," said his father, gently.

"Does he know?" she asked, trying to realise the change it might work in her old companion.

His father answered in the affirmative, and Mrs. Grant turned the conversation from the subject.

It was sad and painful to Peggy to be thus, as it were, thrust aloof from their trouble. They knew nothing of hers; they did not even seek to know; they kept her outside the pale, in the region of general conversation, and it was getting time for her to go. At last she said—

"I came to say good-bye, for I am going away for a long time, perhaps for ever," and she lowered her voice; "I am going to Paris."

"To Paris!" they all exclaimed in a breath.

"Yes," she replied, trying to speak lightly; "my father is there." She crimsoned as she named him, and the fact of his neglect rose up before her. "I am to become a travelled and accomplished person after all."

"Why does she not speak out?" thought Mrs. Grant, and she remembered her grievance against Peggy, and stiffened perceptibly. She was resolved not to help her; she expected a simple matter-of-fact statement of her engagement from the girl. She was one of those people who would seem to have been born into the world the same wise, soberminded beings they are at mid-age; not only not possessing, but never having possessed, any sympathy with the feelings, far less with the follies, of youth. She had no matrimonial designs upon Miss Oglivie—would have had none even if she had known how great her expectations were. She thought the girl was marrying to please her new relations, and that was quite right, only she was still rather young. As for her sons having had a fancy to her, they had been very properly kept out of mischief; and that was all she thought on the matter.

After a few more questions asked and answered, Peggy ventured to ask if she could say good-bye to Sandie; but just then the peculiar sound of a crutch was heard in the passage; the answer was prevented, and Sandie himself opened the door and appeared among them.

Archie had been about to spring to the door, but hesitated, and then resumed his seat: he would not do anything to suggest the sense of helplessness to his brother.

Sandie was much paler, much older looking, but cheerful and cordial as ever. He seemed also to restore cheerfulness and cordiality to the others; and questioning Peggy eagerly about her movements, led her to give an account of her recent proceedings more in detail; and the others showed their interest too. She never mentioned the one great subject of interest; and Sandie never alluded to his own misfortune.

Then came another, and Peggy could see, a most welcome visitor. David Haldane was ushered into the room. Peggy had not seen him, save in church, for many weeks. It would have been easy for him to speak to her after service, if he had chosen, and she had been more than once alone; but he had even, she thought, shunned her: and she had felt shy of meeting him, and had resolved to also avoid him now that she was going away. She was on her feet to go when he entered, and he added to the restraint of the parting; but she shook hands all round, and spoke her farewell unflinching till she came to Sandie, and then her voice failed, and the tears would come.

And Sandie, to the amazement of all present, swung himself up on his crutch, and kissed her cheek, and said, "That's for auld times, Peggy." He wanted to put a cheerful face on the matter, but he did not succeed, for Peggy could not second him in his effort. She turned away her face from David Haldane as she gave him her hand, and, in the little stir which her going made, he only noticed how cold and distant was her voice. He did not know till she was gone that the parting was for any lengthened period.

Dr. Grant accompanied her to the door.

"Tell them all how often and often I shall think of them," she said.

"God bless you, my dear," he made answer, "and give you every happiness. I wish you had not been going so far away, but anywhere in the world may good go with you." And so the kindly man dismissed her, and she knew that he blessed her from the heart.

Then, though it was late in the afternoon, she bent her steps toward the deserted house. It was hers no longer, and she might not even gain admittance, but she would look upon the place once more, and gather into one focus of memory all the inanimate objects that were so dear to her.

There is something very melancholy in a deserted house. The stare of the blank, curtainless windows puts one out of countenance. The fireless hearths, with the ashes of old fires still upon them, make one shiver. The echo of one's steps in the empty chambers seems to call up the ghosts of the past. It has altogether an uncanny feel to be alone in it. One tries, if possible, to escape from it before the evening falls; and the evening was falling as Peggy wandered from room to room, for the door was on the latch, and she had found ready access to her old home. Then she sat down on a favourite seat of hers, the seat to be found in the embrasure of old-fashioned windows, and leaned her head upon her hand, looking out into the deserted garden.

How long she would have sat thus in reverie there is no knowing, for she was dreaming of the future as well as of the past, imagining the old place with its new inmates—thinking how David Haldane would bring his wife there. What she would be like, she did not depict to herself, but she saw him sitting in her grandfather's place by the hearth, with the happy look of home on his face, and his grandly beautiful head bent towards a child at his feet.

It was impossible to say how long she might have dreamed on, but a soft thing was rubbed against the hand that rested by her side, and a little purring sound reached her ear. She started, looked down, and saw the "little cat," the very same little cat she had herself carried to Jean's cottage, when its staid elders had gone in the cart. She understood in a moment that the tiny creature, with a curious instinct, had returned to its old home. "So you are here too," she said, and her voice sounded weirdly: and the creature looked up in her face, and mewed with an expression of such entire, and yet ludicrous, sympathy, that Peggy half laughing, half crying, snatched it to her bosom.

But it had roused her, and she must go; and she could not leave it there, mewing piteously in her face and rubbing against her feet beseechingly; so she took it up in her arms and hastened to leave the place, beguiled somewhat of her sadness by the senseless thing.

At the foot of the hill she met old Mr. Haldane, and stopped to speak to him, still carrying her little friend clinging desperately to her cloak, with which she had vainly endeavoured to cover it up. She went up to him frankly.

"I have been to the old house to say good-bye," she said; and, seeing him look a little puzzled, she added, sadly, "only to the bare walls, Mr. Haldane." Then she went on to speak to the intent that had struck her on seeing him. He might have it in his power to befriend Jean. She told him of her lifelong fidelity, adding, "You may be sure I would never have parted with her if I could have done otherwise. She has been all the mother I have ever known."

"I'll look in upon her," he said, kindly enough; "the cottage she has taken belongs to me. For that matter, if I had kent about her, she might have stayed and looked after the place a bit, while it's lying empty."

Then he bade her good-bye, and looked after her—actually stood and looked after her—with a mixture of admiration and contempt. In the latter he tried to harden himself. "And she preferred yon Jack-anapes to David," he thought. "And to see her, as if she were a bairn yet, wi' a kitten in her arms; but there's neither common sense nor common honesty in any o' her kind."

CHAPTER XLII.

AN INTERVAL.

Two years had passed away, years during which David Haldane, as managing partner at the print-works, had laboured with an energy of hand and brain which is the rare possession of a few great leaders of industry. It was now the spring of 1830, a year which may be taken as a sort of tide-mark of the progress of manufacturing industry in England. About that time the marvellous series of mechanical inventions which had signalised the preceding fifty years, culminated, and combined to develop the cotton trade in all its gigantic proportions.

The art of cotton-printing was only introduced into England in 1696, by a French Protestant refugee, who established a small print-work on the banks of the Thames; and when David Haldane had erected his on the banks of the Strathie, three quarters of a century later, the art was still in its infancy, and mainly the work of the hand. Now, there was machinery for every successive part of the process. There were machines for washing, and machines for wringing, and machines for drying; and the roller had, to a great extent, superseded the clumsy block. No further back than 1720, an absurd law, in order to foster the linen and woollen trades, prohibited the wearing of all printed calicoes whatsoever, whether of home or foreign manufacture; and now more than three hundred millions of yards were being printed within the bounds of Great Britain.

And the organisers of this vast industry, represented in lengths of cotton that would swathe the globe ever so many hundred times (let those who are fond of calculation say how many), were realising enormous fortunes, but at enormous risks. Among these were the Haldanes, though, indeed, the management had been lately left entirely to the younger man. The old man now occupied a house in the neighbourhood, which had been built by a retired West Indian, and vacated in disgust, because of its dulness—a disgust which is apt to occur to people with disordered livers. Old David Haldane did not find it dull, but then his liver was as sound as ever, and he visited the works every day of his life.

And the works had been greatly enlarged. There rose from the new and more regular building a tall chimney, vomiting the blackest of smoke; and within, the engines groaned and the power-loom rattled almost day and night. The cotton-mill had been added to the print-work, that the latter might feed the former, and that both might compete with the great centres of the industry for the West Indian trade of Bleaktown, as well as for the home market. All over the country the race of competition and production was going on, and the human machines were suffering in the strain to keep up with those nerves of iron—that brain of fire. That which should have lightened human labour seemed only to have increased it.

"With grind and groan,
With clank and moan,
Their task the prisoned forces ply;
The great wheels fly,
As if they wove the web of fate;

"And to and fro, amid the roar,
Squalid creatures pace the floor.
Slaves of those iron wheels are they,
Bound their impulse to obey,
And upon their bidding wait;

"While to their service dumb,
Not only men are given,
But childish troops are driven,
And women come;
And every heart with weariness is numb."

The people at Haldane's new mill were working almost day and night, in order that the costly new machines might not remain idle, and so stand, as it were, consuming the capital they had absorbed.

Elsewhere—in the English manufacturing districts—the sufferings of women and children, from overwork, were extreme. "The cry of the children" was being echoed through the land. But here the system had not been long enough in operation to tell upon the far robust race of workers—at least, to the extent of disfigurement and death. But one day, while "the manager," as David was still called, was passing through the spinning-room, there was a cry and a slight commotion; several machines were stopped, while the girls who waited on them ran to the help of one who had fallen.

David Haldane was on the spot in a moment. The girl had fainted at her work and fallen—it was feared, injuring herself in her fall. The room was, of course, oppressively warm. They were manufacturing the lightest fabrics, for which the thread must be spun at a high temperature, and the first thing was to remove her into the cooler air. She was a slight girl, with an exquisite, pale face, the daughter of one of the Highland immigrants. David lifted her in his arms, and bore her out into the air as easily as if she had been a child. As he did so, her face struck him, with its pathos of stilled suffering; its transparent thinness, and the blue circles under the closed eyes, telling their tale of delicate and fading health. He had kept one of her companions by her side; the others were at their work again, as soon as the door had swung back upon its hinges. He held her, with her dark silky hair falling over his arm, till her companion brought water. "She'll soon come to herself," said the girl. "It's no the first time she's ta'en a dwam (faint). She's no fit for the work, puir thing. It takes a stout kimmer like me," she added, looking at her strong, red arms; "and some as strong as me hae gane like this wi' the lang hours."

Whether or no it was a fancied resemblance, the girl, opening her dim blue eyes, and coming back to life as she lay upon his supporting arm, put David in mind of Peggy Oglivie, and a pang smote him as he looked at her. He remembered what Peggy had said about the works—how terrible she had thought the incessant toil and din and heat. "And it must be terrible to such a creature as this," he thought. "Work is for the strong, not for the weak," he said to himself. "But even the strong seem to suffer. You must look to this," said the heart of the man, filled with the memory of one sweet woman, and for her sake tender to all.

The girl revived, but in extreme pain, and David Haldane speedily ascertained that her arm was broken, and, sending for help, had her removed to her mother's cottage, while the doctor was sent for—he himself taking care that every alleviation should be provided for her suffering that money would purchase. But the incident set him pondering more deeply on the condition of the workers than he had ever done before. He felt how great was the responsibility incurred by the masters of industry, in using their human material as they were doing. Their power for good or evil—his power—was greater than that of any territorial lord could be. The wicked Oglivies of old times might oppress their scattered tenants, but they could hardly wring gold out of the life-blood of thousands, as men like him might do. And yet the position was a difficult one. He could not stop the machines—the last hour's work might be the only hour that paid—yet the more he meditated and examined, the more sure he was that the work was too hard, the hours too long, especially for women and children.

And the manager taxed his brain to prevent it. "They shall rust rather," he cried, one midnight, as he sat in his room, still thinking, still working; his active brain, the real motive power of all the energies at work around him. The alternative present to his mind was the sixteen hours a-day which the people were then working; for precious things were perishing in the atmosphere of constant toil: the evening psalm was no longer heard in the cottages, and the school was empty, while the young ones played no truant.

And it was not without opposition that he carried out his purpose of shortening the hours of the workers, by providing relays, and by other measures of organisation which he projected and enforced. There are always a vast number of people with whom present gain outweighs all future loss, though that loss should be their own lives and the lives of their children. But having once put his hand to the plough, David Haldane was not the man to draw back. As he cured one evil, another would spring up. For instance, if he brought workpeople from a distance, he over-crowded the villages; but, ever vigilant, and ever active, the new evil neither escaped his notice nor was allowed to gain head before it was put down.

"You are working like a slave," said his friend, Mr. Keith, to him; "you must take some rest."

And David replied, "I will run over to Paris for a week in July, to freshen myself up a bit for the winter."
(To be continued.)

THE LOST KNIFE.

ALFRED WILMINGTON was a boy of twelve years old, possessing most of the habits, customs, and tastes usual to that age; but, from delicacy of health, frequently unable to participate in the amusements and active sports of his schoolfellows.

Now for several months his greatest ambition had been to become the possessor of a knife, similar to one which belonged to his father. Not a common knife, such as every boy in the school had; no, no, but one with several different-sized blades, a saw, a corkscrew, and many other useful implements; in fact, as Alfred used to say, in describing it to his boy-friends, "it was as good as a pocket box of tools."

At length Christmas arrived—that happy and exciting season for boys and girls. Great was the curiosity, many were the speculations, as to what present each child should receive.

I do not know what good fairy could have whispered to Alfred's father what he would like the best; but certain it is, that on Christmas morning, the delighted boy found himself possessed of the object of his desire. He immediately set about making a leather case for his treasure, which he wore fastened to a belt round his waist. Oh! how useful that knife was; everything which wanted to be cut, his blades were ready; if anything required sawing, out came the saw; and as to the old corkscrew of the house, it had Christmas holidays as well as Alfred, for he was on the watch to draw every cork required. But the greatest delight of all was, on his return to school, to display his new acquisition to the admiring boys. Time passed on, the novelty of the knife wore away, but not its value; on the contrary, so many were its uses, that he often said, "I only wonder how I could have lived so many years without one."

Spring came—a cold, harsh spring—and Alfred caught so severe a cold that he was obliged to remain at home for some time; until at length, the weather becoming milder, and his health improving, he returned to school; but still his cough was sufficiently troublesome to cause some anxiety to his friends.

Alfred always took extreme delight in fishing. Wherever there was water, there might he be found at every leisure moment, trying to decoy the poor little fish to their ruin. He had many companions in the neighbourhood, all equally intent on the same sport; but they were strong, healthy boys, able to bear any amount of cold or fatigue. Alfred had often been warned by his parents to avoid damp, and not to lean over water for any length of time, as in this way he had frequently caught cold. Indeed, since his late illness he had been forbidden to fish altogether. This was a hard prohibition to one so devoted to the amusement; and though he obeyed to the letter his parents' commands, yet he could not always resist the temptation of going with other boys to see them fish.

Now it happened that there was a canal near his father's house, and on its banks Alfred and his companions spent most of their play-hours. On one particular occasion, a boy named Charles met Alfred, and asked him to accompany him to the canal to sail boats. At first, Alfred told him that he had been forbidden by his father to fish in the canal.

"I do not want you to fish," replied Charles, "I only want you to come and see my new boat sail;" and so, with some slight compunctions of conscience, Alfred followed his friend.

Charles had a small ship, which he had himself made; they placed it on the water, and it sailed completely to their satisfaction. After watching its movements for some time, it occurred to the boys that if they could quickly make a few small boats of branches of trees, or even flaggers, it would be good fun to send them after the large vessel, in imitation of a set of pirate canoes in chase of a ship, of which they had read in one of Charles's books.

Immediately Alfred drew his knife out of the case, and commenced cutting pieces of stick to the desired shape. After some labour, the desired number of canoes were completed and launched, and Alfred in the hurry of the moment hastily shut his knife, and thrust it into his waistcoat pocket; then, as the tiny boats floated off in pursuit of the ship, both boys threw themselves flat on the bank, and eagerly stretched their heads, necks, and nearly half their bodies over the water, that they might with long sticks give a little push to the lagging canoes. Alas! after a desperate effort made by Alfred to reach one which seemed determinately lazy, he saw, as he leaned forward, his knife—his precious knife—fall from his waistcoat pocket. He made a desperate effort to grasp it. It was useless, although he nearly lost his own balance in the attempt. Down it went, before his very eyes, with a great splash into the deep and dark water. Oh! how that splash went to the boy's heart! He turned pale, he trembled, he felt sick. For a few moments he scarcely believed in the reality of his loss, or found voice to speak. At length his friend broke the silence.

"Alfred, your splendid knife! Oh, what a pity! what a loss!"

"What shall I do?" faltered Alfred, bursting into tears. "What will my father say? How shall I ever tell him? He will think I have been so careless of his present. I wish I could jump in after it; but the water is so deep. Oh, my knife! my beautiful knife! I shall never be able to do without it."

"Don't despair, Alfred," replied his friend; "we know the very spot it fell in. Suppose we get your fishing-rod and mine, and tie them together, and at the end we'll fasten the net you have for catching small fish, and drag the bottom of the canal? We'll be sure to find it. It is getting dark now, or we might try; besides, we must go home for the rods."

These words of hope partially consoled Alfred, and, drying his tears, he said, "Well, Charles, will you meet me here to-morrow, after breakfast?—how fortunate that it is the Easter vacation!—and we will bring the rods, plenty of strong cord, and my net; and perhaps we might fish it up, if the mud is not very deep."

"It is a heavy knife; I hope its own weight has not sunk it."

"Oh, no," replied Alfred; "it fell very slowly, and the water will break its fall. It did not go down with a violent bang."

"But it would be of no use if you had it; it will be all rusty."

"No," said Alfred; "I have often heard of swords and guns being thrown under water to hide them. My father says as long as steel is covered with water it will not be injured: it is only damp which produces rust. If I had my knife I would rub it very dry, and take it to a cutler to polish up. Oh! how I wish I had it! I fear, I fear, I shall never see it more."

"Courage!" replied Charles. "We shall know by this time to-morrow."

Just then they arrived at the door of Alfred's home, and the friends separated. It was with a heavy heart that he entered. Many were the questions addressed to him during the evening by his family, such as, "Alfred, are you well?" "Did any one vex you?" "Well, what is the matter?" Hard enough he found it to answer these inquiries, and to try to smile when he felt so unhappy.

The evening seemed very long. He complained of feeling tired, and went to bed earlier than usual, but not to sleep; his mind was busy forming plans for the recovery of the lost knife.

Soon a gentle tap at the door was followed by the entrance of his favourite sister. She approached the bedside.

"Alfred, dear, I know there is something wrong; will you not tell me what it is? I might be able to help you. Are you in any difficulty?"

"Will you promise, Lucy, that you will not tell any one?"

"First, is it anything which it would be wrong to conceal? If not, I promise, and you know I can keep a secret."

"Yes, I know," he replied; "you have often kept my secrets. It is nothing wrong, so you have promised, and I will tell you what happened me to-day."

He then proceeded to give a full description of his misfortune. Kindly and warmly did his sister sympathise with him. They discussed all the plans for the recovery of the knife; but she could not help fearing that in his anxiety he might become incautious, and fall into the deep water; and begged him to remember how much more valuable his life was than many knives.

"Never fear," he said; "when I stretch forward, I shall get Charles to hold me tightly. I think I shall recover it; I cannot believe it is quite lost."

Lucy feared it was, but she did not like to discourage him by saying so.

"Alfred, if you find it is hopeless, you must tell papa."

"No, Lucy, I never could tell him."

"Why not? He would not be very angry, you know it was only an accident."

"Yes, but it was my own fault; I ought not to have leaned over the water."

"No, you ought not, Alfred; but still, you have been punished by the loss of your knife, and I think papa would forgive you, and I am sure you will try to remember what you are told again."

"Well, it is time enough to talk of telling when I am sure I have really lost it."

"But you ought to tell in any case, Alfred."

"So I will, if I find my knife. I will tell all about having let it fall into the canal, of its wonderful escape, and how unhappy I was about it; but I must have it in my hand to show. No, I never could tell papa that his valuable present was lost, he would think me so careless and ungrateful."

Lucy, finding all her persuasions unavailing, left the room, first begging of her brother to come home early next day after his search, and report to her his success or failure.

Morning came. Alfred left the house according to appointment, and met his friend Charles. The fishing-rods were tied together, and the net firmly fixed on to the end; but, alas! with all their efforts, it would not reach the bottom. The water was deep, and the bank high. They could touch the mud at other places, but not near the fatal spot. After spending a long time in useless labour, they gave up the search as hopeless, and returned to their homes.

Lucy was watching at the door for her brother; she had spent an anxious morning, and now sym-pathised kindly with him in his disappointment. What was to be done? It was at length agreed between them that Lucy should tell their father all, and represent how very sorry Alfred was, not only for the loss of the knife, but for his own disobedience. Nothing more was said on the subject that day, but there were mysterious conversations between Lucy and her two younger sisters, the result of which Alfred could not find out at the time.

Next morning he whispered to Lucy, "Have you told papa yet?"

"No," she replied; "I have a reason for not doing so at present, which you must not ask. I think you had better tell him yourself, but not till to-morrow."

"I can never do it, Lucy; I have told you so before, and I think it is very ill-natured of you not to do it for me."

To his surprise, she only smiled at this speech, and said no more.

That evening, Alfred was wandering about by himself, and looking very sad, when he beheld his three sisters approaching, apparently in high spirits.

"Well," he thought to himself, "surely Lucy has forgotten my misfortune very quickly. I never remember her having been so unfeeling before."

"Alfred! Alfred!" they called out, "what a bad looker you are! You gave up the search too soon."

"Where? where? Oh! you have not found it," he exclaimed; "it is impossible!"

"We have been out a long time trying to get it for you," replied Lucy, "and it appears we have been more successful than you—for look!" and as she spoke, she held up a knife to his astonished gaze.

He seized it with avidity.

"It is! it is really the same! My knife! But how bright it has grown!"

"You know," said Lucy, "water does not rust knives; perhaps it has the effect of brightening them."

"Is it mine? No, it cannot be, it is too new-looking; evidently, it has never been used, but it is the same size and shape, and contains the same number of blades and implements. Tell me, girls, do tell me all about it. Where did it come from? You had not money to get a new one, surely?"

"Yes, we had, between us all; we had just the price of the knife, and we are so glad, dear Alfred, to be able to get it for you."

"But," said Alfred, "Lucy told me she was going, to buy a new book with her money; and you, Clara, have been gathering for a long time for a workbox. Little Fanny could not have had much. Oh, I wish you had not spent all your money on me! It makes me twice as sorry for having been so disobedient and careless. Yet I am so glad to have a knife again. There is papa, now, I will run and tell him all."

And off he set after his father, with the new knife in his hand, to tell of his own faults and his sisters' kindness.

The knife was placed with much care in the leather case of its predecessor, and Alfred, like "a burnt child who dreads the fire," took care never to take it near the canal.

He kept it safely till he became a man; indeed, he has it still, and often tells his own children the story of the lost knife, as a lesson against disobedience.

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, February 1, 1868. —

Drawn by G. H. THOMAS.

"Hallo, sir," I shouts after him; "you've left your dogs."—p. 306.

ANOTHER STORY ABOUT THE QUEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY POWELL."

THE writer of this little narrative, which she believes to be strictly true, is the only survivor of the three interlocutors. She related it once before, but in a form quite unlikely to meet the eyes of the many readers of THE QUIVER, and she thinks it quite worth telling again.

It was somewhere in the summer of 1848 that

I was staying with a friend who lived within the precincts of Claremont Park—that Claremont the name of which is now so familiar to all, but which retains unbroken its royal seclusion, fragrant with historic memories of the loved and lost.

Here I used to stray at will among the pleasant glades and sylvan paths, apparently miles from the haunts of man, often among wild brushwood and tangled thickets, with many a sound of insect and animal life, but none of human vicinage, till, perhaps, just as I was beginning to feel almost too lonely, a sudden turn would bring me to the mausoleum, the lake, a root-house, or boat-house, or I heard a wagoner talking to his horses close at hand in the high road.

At other times, wandering along bowery lanes, or over breezy commons, I came upon the cottages of pensioned retainers of royalty, retired from service. And much did these worn-out servitors cherish the names of good King Leopold and the lamented Princess Charlotte.

One day I was enjoying a brisk walk with my friend along a country road intersecting a picturesque heath, and skirted by plantations and park palings. All at once she said, as we approached a lonely little cottage, with apple-trees and peppermint-beds—

"Come, I will take you in to see my old friend Mr. Butler; he is an original, quite worth your seeing and hearing. He was formerly coachman to the Borradailles, but has long retired from service to live on his savings. He lives quite alone, except that an old woman chafes for him once a week. A female is rarely admitted into the house, but I am a bit of a favourite of his."

Accordingly she opened the little garden gate, and we passed through it to the cottage, at the entrance of which we were greeted by a hale, ruddy, rather whimsical-looking old man, who welcomed my friend cordially enough.

After some desultory chat, which showed him to have a sufficiently comfortable opinion of himself, doubtless partly attributable to his living so much alone, Mrs. M. said, "Mr. Butler, I want you to let this lady see your clock—Pope's clock, you know, that you bought at the sale at Twickenham."

"Oh! she's welcome to see it," said he, leading the way into his little kitchen. "There's the clock; and I think I shall leave it to Prince Albert some of these days, 'cause he and the Queen admired it so."

"Oh, come, Mr. Butler, tell us all about that affair. My friend would like to hear it."

"Oh, well, there isn't much to tell. One Saturday afternoon, a smart spring shower came on, and as I was going by the window, I see a young lady and gentleman run pretty fast for shelter into my outhouse; so I goes to the front door, and hollers out, 'I say! you'd better come in here. So upon that, in they came, and I was a going to show them into the parlour, when the young lady says, 'Oh, I'd rather go into the kitchen, for I see you've a fire, and my shoes are rather wet.' Well, I let her do as she liked; and as the fire was not an over-good one, the young gentleman he begins to make it up, by putting on some turf that lay handy, and by way of saying something goodnatured-like, you know, he says says he, 'This is nice turf you've got.' 'Well, sir,' says I, 'I don't think it very good; they've cut it too deep, quite down into the earth.' So, then he looks about him, for something else to notice; and seeing those cups and saucers on the mantelshelf, 'You've got some old china,' says he. 'No, sir,' says I, 'that's not china—it's delft; and before you were born, sir, people thought a good deal of eating off delft, which being the best ware they could get, they valued as we value china now.' So then the young lady says, 'You've a curious clock.' 'Yes,' says I, 'that really is a curiosity, for it was Pope's, and I bought it at a sale of his effects at Twickenham.' So they both of 'em looked at it with a kind of interest, you know; and the young lady says, 'Is it just as it was when Pope had it?' 'Oh, no!' says I, 'I've had it cleaned, and done up.' 'Ah! that's a pity,' says she, 'for otherwise, I would have bought it of you.'

"Well, I thought this funny; but just then, the young gentleman, who had gone to the front door, calls out, 'It has left off raining now.' 'You can't justly tell whether it has or not, sir,' says I, 'at that door, because the wind sets against the back of the house. If you'll go to the back door, you'll be able to see.' So he goes to the back door, and directly he opened it, out darted his two dogs—a big and a little one—and began rolling themselves on my peppermint-bed. 'Hallo, sir!' says I; 'do you know I sell my peppermint?' So he laughed, and whistled them off, and says to the young lady, 'It really has left off raining.' Then they thanked me for giving them shelter and went away, and I was standing at the door looking after them, when my old woman comes to me all in a fuss, and says, 'Those strangers have left their dogs behind, to dirty my floors.' 'Hallo, sir,' I shouts after him; 'you've left your dogs!' He looked about and whistled, and they followed him. I saw them cut across the common to a little gate in the park paling, and stood thinking to myself, 'Whoever can they be, that have got the master-key of that gate? Why, ten to one, it's the Queen and Prince Albert! To think of that never having struck me! Yes, yes, I dare say it was, for he's tall and she's short, and they do go about with a greyhound and a terrier; but I didn't know they were expected down here just now. However, I'll just go up to the house with a basket of eggs, and then I shall know.' So I went up with my basket of eggs, and, sure enough, the servants told me Her Majesty and the Prince had come down unexpectedly, and had gone out to walk directly after luncheon, and had been caught in the rain."

"Well, but, Mr. Butler, that is not all."

"Oh, no, that it isn't. The next day, they tell me, the Queen and all her party were going out on horseback, when she says, 'Have any of you any money?' 'How much does your Majesty want?' says one of the equeries. 'Oh, five or ten pounds.' 'I have five pounds, your Majesty.' 'Oh, that will do.' So they rode along here," continued Butler, with great complacency, "and as they went by, the Queen said to him, 'Go in and give the poor man in that cottage five pounds for me, and tell him I thank him for having given us shelter yesterday.' So, of course, I was very much pleased; but, you know, I didn't know who he was, nor what brought him; so seeing the gentleman come in and leave the gate open, I thought I should be having the dogs in again, and bawled out, 'Shut the gate after you!'"

"Well, every year since, she has sent me five pounds. Yes, it's very good of her; and I've no way of showing her what I think of it, but by taking her a basket of cherry-pippins, which is not what everybody can do, for I don't know of any hereabouts but mine. I have but one tree, and I always save its pippins for the Queen. You shall have one, though, ma'am. Here's one for ye."

Old Mr. Butler is now dead, and before he died he made his will, and left Pope's clock to the Prince Consort. Alas, the beloved Prince is dead too!—the old man, who perhaps left none to regret him, and the favourite of Providence, just in his prime, mourned wherever the English tongue is spoken, as well as by all in his native land!

I dare say dozens of anecdotes like this, of the Queen's benevolence, might be picked up in that neighbourhood, where she and the Prince spent many of their halcyon days; but perhaps another instance would not readily be found of a more opinionated and self-complacent old humourist, who, before he knew who his guests were, took what he considered the upper hand on every subject that they touched upon. He seemed quite as pleased with having let them see "what was in him," as with anything else.

I don't know that I have seen another cherry-pippin from that day to this. Certainly, I could never have one offered me again without being reminded of the Queen and Mr. Butler.

RELIGION AND THIS LIFE.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

ANY a one confesses that the sinner loses something by-and-by, who vaguely thinks that he is a gainer in this world; and that if both profits could be realised—if one master could be served for eleven hours, and the other for the hour before he pays—that would be a fine stroke of business, and is a speculation well worth venturing. I do not say that people coolly think this out, but they have the idea, and act upon it, nevertheless.

Let us think it out for them; and begin, as is fair, by considering what he gains who neglects God. We must count no joy to be gained by irreligion but what free-hearted, liberal Christianity forbids, or at least forbids under his circumstances—no innocent pleasure, no harmless, inoffensive mirth, no sport after work is done, but only what oversteps the limit of right and of reason.

We may safely tell him, however, that he gains overgrown lusts, a dwarfish soul, and a paralysed spirit: liberty to neglect every one except himself, to blaspheme God, and encourage others to insult their Maker too; the indulgences that give red eyes and trembling hands, and a premature, dishonourable grave: he gains leave to be licentious, false, dishonest, vile; to be empty-headed, and to be revengeful. In brief, he gains the choice of being a moth that every candle dazzles, or a bird of carrion, or a beast of prey. And if he cries out in horror that he wants none of these, then he gains further the necessity of being one, probably somewhat of all these against his will, and of having to fight the Christian's battle without the Christian's weapons. And, honestly, I think that is all; all he has to set against terrible future hazards; all his compensation for the very serious present losses that I am now going to reckon up.

1. Have you ever stepped upon solid land after a voyage in which there was, or seemed to be, pressing danger? Ever, after months of illness, been told that all was over and life was safe? What a relief that was; and although the sharpness of the sensation soon wore off, such a contrast always exists between doubt and certainty, between danger and security. But none is really safe—no, nor really feels himself to be so—until his sins are actually forgiven; until there is no more condemnation, until he passes from death unto life. The sinner (even if he be saved at last) loses meantime that feeling of security. He is a bold man if death and hell never terrify him, and if he would not gladly undergo much to know that sudden death would to him be sudden glory. Surely it is a happy thing to walk this changeable world without fear of anything it can do; confident that in tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword, we should be more than conquerors through Him that loved us; so happy, that considering what we have seen the pleasures of sin to be, we might safely weigh it against them all.

2. Very terrible is the power of conscience. The lady who has made herself a queen by murder, who never feared man, and has everything now that heart can wish, or that can distract her thoughts, feels it, nevertheless, in the dead of night, and stalks about her palace, moaning that "all the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten her little hand." Yes, and our countless offences, as truly as one or two vast crimes, have the power of a dense flight of little birds to obscure the light of day.

And there is none so thoughtless but his conscience sometimes pricks him. "What," it cries, "shall be the end of these things? Is this the end for which God gave you powers, and energies, and hopes? O slothful and shameless, thankless and unjust!—unjust to God, whom you disobey, unjust to man, whom you seduce, unjust, above all, to the God-man, whose blood you trample under foot!"

So he loses the peace which passeth all understanding, born when that old life is blotted out, when the blood of Christ is sprinkled on the heart, and his Spirit renews the life, and Satan is being trodden down beneath the Christian's feet.

It is the best of blessings, the mind at peace with God and with itself,—

"The memory like a cloudless air,
The conscience like a sea at rest."

3. He loses a worthy aim in life. You who know it, have never forgotten the feeling that came over you when school or college was done, and the actual work of life lay at last before you, rugged but yet grand through its intense reality. No more sharpening of the faculties for exercises that might never come; no more drill in time of peace, but the battle itself was now. Now you would be in earnest; now you would strain every nerve, and friend and enemy should learn together what stuff was in you. Alas! it was only the stuff that dreams were made of. You soon found the profession or the trade as monotonous as a routine as the task had been before; you soon learned that it was just as easy to drift along with the new current as ever it had been with the old.

What we want is an object in life so distinct and so absorbing that it will force us to do our best; and when the fresh gloss is off it, the world can no longer give us that. It is sad to learn that lesson—sad to go on toiling because we must or may as well go on, not because anything good or lofty is ever likely to come of it—sad to be like a water-logged vessel on a heaving sea, with tattered cordage and broken masts, pitching forward and back, and to and fro, and settling slowly, helplessly down, instead of spreading a broad sail to the wind, and sweeping to some quiet haven that lies far away. A sad thing, but it is the sure lot of the worldly. How can a man really do his best to win a name or a fortune? and when they are won, what next? Have we not heard of old men dying when their dull routine of duties was struck away—dying from listlessness, because they had made money enough to retire? Yes, that dull round of mechanical duties, and that indolent sloth beyond it, are poor things both of them;—

"Nothing to hope for, or labour for; nothing to sigh for, or gain;
Nothing to light in its vividness, lightning-like, bosom and brain;
Nothing to break life's monotony, rippling it o'er with its breath:
Nothing but dulness and lethargy, weariness, sorrow, and death."

But a grand thing to live like a racer, on full stretch for the crown that ever hangs full in the eye of faith; compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses; watched by heaven and hell; nerved with a strength which nature never gave; laying up treasure where the wreck of nature cannot spoil it; witness at once to God's grace, and to the beauty of holiness; enduring, as seeing Him who is invisible; living, yet not we, but Christ. Then there is a reality in things; then life has a purpose, a unity, and a power; then

"The heart of the toiler has throbbings that stir not the bosom of kings;—
He the true ruler and conqueror, he the true king of his race,
Who nerveth his arm for life's combat, and looks the strong world in the face."

Oh, what a loss! to be capable of this, and to be a weathercock, a tennis-ball, bandied by the hand of fools! or, as a fashionable song used candidly to put it, to "be a butterfly born in a bower!" Men and women, made for better things, is it not high time to awaken out of this drugged and unhealthy sleep?

4. Does the mention of so fixed and definite a purpose sound wintry, lonesome, chilling, to the heart? That is because the affections are injured whenever man sets before him one fixed, unbending purpose for this life. The miser cannot love, the philosopher must wipe from his mind all trivial, fond records, and the conqueror wades to his throne through blood, trampling upon broken hearts. Frost and frozen winds are eternal on those unnatural heights, and we common mortals shiver as we think of them.

It is different with our heavenly purpose. Love is the secret of its very existence, and we cannot love God without loving our brother also. See how he has joined us together in churches, taught us the fellowship of prayer and praise, instituted the Supper, which is nothing if it be not a communion, and bidden us bear each other's burdens.

Here the world loses the sweetener of life itself. It knows not the soothing and elevating consciousness of being banded on the side of God with all who bear his image everywhere; of helping with prayer men whom we have never seen; and of receiving in sorrow, temptation, and bereavement, the solace which a Christian can bestow upon his brother in the faith. Is that nothing?—the gush of kindly feeling, the thrill of responding sympathies, the vibration of hearts in tune! Is it nothing to have a richer training than the earth can give, of those instincts to which the earth itself owes more than half its charms? Why, you cannot expand a man's power of loving, without enlarging also his capacity for joy.

5. But more than earthly love is lost, even as there are chambers of the soul to which earthly love can never penetrate. There is a bitterness which no heart, however dear, can share; and he who drinks that poisoned cup, drains it in solitude and silence. There is also an hour when the soul, about to leave its tenement of clay, is already quite secluded. It does not recognise the dearest voices, it does not hear the prayer that is uttered with sobs by the bedside, its hopes and fears are no longer expressed upon the face, the dense shadow of death broods heavily over the valley into which the lonely journeyer has gone down; and the chances are that you and I shall die thus, isolated among the loving and the true, as much as if we dropped from a ship's side into the dark, bubbling waters, and none missed us until all was over.

Alas for him who has neither companion, nor rod, nor staff, to comfort him in that hour of mortal dread! Alas for him even to-day, who has no sympathising friend, except for the troubles which his tongue can tell out in the shallow words of men! Alas and alas that a heavenly Comforter should offer to abide with man continually! that a Friend, into whose side, and feet, and hands the iron pierced for him, should court his acceptance of unerring guidance and unslumbering guardianship! and yet the infatuated creature should make light of it, and go his ways, to his farm or to his merchandise.

We may have that guardianship, that love, and that consolation always. He will be near us when we climb or fall; near us when the light is low, and the blood creeps; near us when we fade away. He will come again, and receive us unto Himself. He is with His people always, even unto the end of the world.

We need go no further. I will not more than mention the light from expected heaven, streaming upon the path of time; nor the joy of turning others to the Lord, or of conquering old vices and growing up in new virtues, by the power of grace, or of prayer and the Word of God.

Enough has been written to make us feel, if we will feel, which is the better part; and to make the best reader feel, also, that there is still in religion a fund of unexhausted pleasure, delights of which some have never tasted, and others have sipped instead of drinking deep.

Religion is the flower of that heavenly wisdom of which Solomon sang, "She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honour. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her, and happy is every one that retaineth her."

WILD FLOWERS.

I.

“T WAS pleasant in the leafy lanes
To wander 'neath the hedgerow's shade,
My pathway chequered, green and gold,
As through the leaves the sunbeams played.

II.

The honeysuckle, white and pink,
Like to a maiden's blushing cheek;
The sweet white rose o'ertopping all,
In many a wild fantastic freak;

III.

And mingling with their lighter wreaths,
Peered heads of elder, white as snow;
While briony's green satin leaves,
Trailed graceful to the bank below;—

IV.

Not berried, for 'twas summer still,
And flowers of summer's prime were here—
Gold buttercups, "Jack-by-the-hedge,"
And the blue darling of the year,

V.

The tender, trembling speedwell flower,
So fragile, yet so freely spread;
While Robert-herb, geranium wild,
Peeped through the green with leaves so red;

VI.

The ox-eye daisy, tall and fair,
Made dazzling contrast with the rest;
And many a smaller plant lay there,
Half hidden in the blooming nest.

VII.

What tended garden's flaunting pride
Enamel bright as this can show?
Where form and colour matchless vie,
And care and culture never know.

VIII.

How few of those who careless pass
This scene of beauty by the way,
Have eyes to see, or tongue to praise,
Although it greets them every day.

IX.

"Then why," I asked, "were wild flowers made,
Full of sweet scents and beauty bright,
When man disdains their fragile charms,
And finds in them such scant delight?"

X.

It seemed as if each radiant bloom
Lifted its head and answered me:
"We were not made for man alone,
Nor for the butterfly or bee.

XI.

"We care not for man's idle scorn,
The Lord of heaven has owned us fair;
No toil is ours, no vexing strife,
Yet no array like ours is rare.

XII.

"We whisper still, if man would list,
From worldly cares to turn aside;
To seek in simple joys delight,
Nor barter peace for empty pride."

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—VII.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

TELL you what it is," said Archie Scott, "I do not know whether my natural feelings are finer than yours, but so far from finding any pleasure in this style of work, and in witnessing such dreadful distress, which I am sure I had no conception even existed, I must say that I find it only most dreadfully depressing. I don't think I could stand much of it—indeed, I don't. I think two or three months of such work would send me downright melancholy mad, for it's not only the scenes themselves," he continued, naively, "to which I might in time, perhaps, like you, become accustomed, but besides that, I do not at all like the disagreeable thoughts and self-reflections to which they give rise. I am sure I could never reconcile myself to them, and I do not exactly see the use of creating unnecessary pain and troubles for oneself, either moral or physical, which can possibly be avoided. I have quite enough troubles and painful feelings already, without going out of my way to make more. As to saying that there is any enjoyment in this visiting, that is downright humbug; and if you can find pleasure in witnessing such awful distress as we have seen this evening, why, I think you must have a very wicked heart, if you are speaking the truth."

"Well, that is a queer view to take of it, too," rejoined Sydney, good-humouredly, "and one that I should never have thought could enter anybody's head, and that you are candid I must allow; but don't you think that such thoughts and self-comparisons, though, I will grant you, not very pleasant, are wholesome and advantageous to yourself? I quite agree with you in the extreme painfulness of the actual witnessing the distress and misery of our poor fellow-creatures, whom we have to visit, but surely the pleasure is in the attempt to alleviate their wants—in giving them a certain amount of comfort and pleasure, which is reflected back upon the giver, and is real pleasure, and by no means an imaginary feeling, as I know many people think it to be.

"You yourself have told me that you have tried every pleasure which general society or the usual excitements of life can offer, and you have found them all rotten and unsatisfactory; now, take my word for it, and only just try this new task by way of a change. I will engage to say that in positive and actual satisfaction, not relatively or imaginary, but actually I repeat, the thoughts of those few kind words spoken by yourself to poor old Fenton about his son, and the little gleam of comfort which you were thus enabled to shed upon his dismal and monotonous life of suffering, will make you feel a happier man, as you lay your head upon your pillow to-night, than you have been for many a long day past, and that I am sure of, without any cant or humbug, as you are pleased to call it, in the matter.

"However, now, before we go home, having shown you two or three specimens of real and deep distress, you shall, if you like, come with me to unearth what I strongly suspect to be a regular professed begging-letter writer, in which pursuit, I must confess, I always take an almost sporting interest. I must just make sure of the address, from this letter which I have in my pocket, and which was forwarded to our head-quarters by the Marchioness of A., whose known wealth and benevolence have long given her the honour of a prominent place in the regularly-kept lists of all the impostors and begging-letter professionals in London. If we find this old lady at home, I may perhaps show you a little amusement, as a relief to your feelings, after what you have already been through. Yes, this must be the house, let us go in without knocking, for the street-door is, as usual, on the swing, so mind your head and your shins, and follow me up the rickety old staircase."

It was not without some difficulty, and groping about in the dark, that they made their way up to the first floor; then seeing a feeble light coming under a door on the landing, Sydney tapped gently with his knuckles. It was opened instantaneously, by a sharp-looking little girl, apparently of not more than eight or nine years old.

"Does Mrs. Mumper live here?"

"Yes, sir—leastways, all letters and parcels is to be took in here, though she rents the back room up-stairs on the next floor. She has generally left by this time of day; but any message I can give her, or I could send for her round to her other lodgings, if you wanted to speak to her."

"Why, where does she live then, besides?"

"Oh! she has a parlour and bedroom where she always sleeps, over at the 'Bull's Head,' further round the corner; but don't tell her I said so, gentlemen," the child added, as she saw Sydney laugh, and nudge the captain, "or I know she will cut up awful rough with me." After which confidence, she added: "I was in hopes you kind gentlemen was perhaps a coming in to see me."

"To see you! why, what can we do for you, my child? and where is your father and mother?"

"Please, sir, I've never had no father, for ever so long. He died two years after I was born, and mother has got a poisoned thumb, and has gone out to a good lady's, to beg a few tea-leaves, for she hasn't had no work these three weeks, at the wash-tub or charing; and so we, that is, mother, and my two little brothers, and me, has only got now what I earn myself to live upon."

"What you earn!" exclaimed Captain Scott, looking with amazement at the size of the child; "why, that is a good idea, indeed! what in the name of wonder can you earn, I should like to know?"

"Only one-and-fourpence a-day for dry nursing," answered the little one, sharply; "and little enough, too—fourpence a-piece for two babies, and eightpence for that old gentleman, including his firing, which his family won't pay more, because they say he ought to be able to dress himself; though he takes a deal more looking after than the babies do, and as to dressing, it aint much he has got to dress himself in. Now then, Binjam-ing," she cried, as the visitors advanced, wondering, into the room—changing suddenly from a childish, and rather whining voice, to a severe tone, by which she seemed to think it necessary to impress her authority—"Binjam-ing, don't you see these two gentlemen coming in? why don't you stand up, sir, and take off your cap directly?"

The poor old patriarch, thus reminded of his manners, did his best to struggle up out of his chair, looking quite timidly at the little vixen, frowning and shaking her head at him, with her arms set akimbo, as she still went on scolding at him. "I am quite ashamed of you, Binjam-ing, at your time of life, not to know how to behave yourself better. There's little Jim, who is only just three years old, has a deal better and prettier ways than you have."

Thus hearing himself held up as an example, a fluffy-headed, dirty-faced little urchin made his appearance from under a bedstead, which occupied the corner of the room; and then a second one, equally fluffy and dirty, cautiously peeped out at the strangers from the same retreat.

"Are those your brothers?" inquired Sydney.

"Bless your heart! no sir—they's the babies I take care of; my brothers are out: one's gone with mother, and the other is out after no good, I dare say, for he is an idle boy, and never earns not twopence a week—leastways, if he does, he never brings nothing home to mother and me, who keep him."

Here the poor old man began to mumble something, as perceiving him still standing, both Sydney and the captain had begged him to sit down. But she turned upon him sharply, bidding him "be quiet directly, Binjam-ing, while I speak to the gentlemen. One would really think you was old enough to know better."

"Why, how old is he?" they inquired.

"Ninety-seven the twenty-fourth of last month," she answered, without a moment's hesitation, just as any mother might do who was speaking of her own baby. "Ninety-seven—he is, indeed, and I think he ought to be ashamed of himself;" but whether for having lived to that age, or for not knowing better how to behave himself, the premature little vixen did not condescend to explain.

"But, really now," said Captain Scott, "this won't do, you know: it must be downright impossible. It's your mother, in fact, you mean, who is paid to take care of this old fellow—gentleman, I should say; I beg his pardon."

Sydney gave a look of approval at this correction, in accordance with his previous lecture; but the infant virago very tartly replied—

"No, sir, begging your humble pardon, all the same, I always means what I says, and says what I means, and it is only me myself undertakes the charge of old Binjaming, and the two babies likewise, for which I receive the payment, as I've already told you. When mother is well, and all right, she is never at home all day long, but works at the wash-tub; but now her poor thumb is so dreadful bad she can't do nothing; besides, she never could abide babies, even when they was her own; and as to nursing old gentlemen, she says herself she don't feel she could ever understand it at all; while I have, somehow, always took to it natural-like all my life; and now mother is so bad I have to take care of her too. I does all the cooking myself, I does."

"What, do you know how to cook too? what kind of dishes have you learnt to serve up now?" asked Archie, quite seriously.

"Well, sir, we soak stale bread in dripping, and then boil up old tea-leaves with the bits of orange-peel, or any other relish of that sort, which my brothers sometimes picks up in the street; or sometimes we may have a fried sprat a-piece, as a great treat; but all we have to live on now is my one-and-fourpence a-day, and four loaves a-week from the board, while mother's hand is so bad; for the half-a-crown they allow her beside, with another sixpence added on it, goes to pay the rent of this room; and that is the very last scraping of coal left, which I put on the fire just before you gentlemen came in."

"Well, what's your name?" asked Sydney taking out his printed order book.

"Hameliar-Ranner-Rannam," she answered, in a breath, as if it were all one name of many syllables.

"That's a good mouthful, at any rate," said Sydney, laughing, "for a little party of your proportions; but is it all one name?"

"No, sir," she answered, rather indignantly. "Hameliar, is my first, and Hannah is my second——"

"And Rannam is your third," said Sydney.

"Why, it's a regular conundrum," remarked Archie.

"It isn't Rannam—nothing at all about it; but 'Annam."

"Why, how do you spell it, then?" asked Sydney.

"With a haitch, and a hay, and two hens, and a hay, and a hem; and I don't see," she added, rather testily, "how you could well spell 'Annam properly anyhow else."

While Sydney was writing orders for some coal, and a little tea and other groceries, of which he was very particular in desiring that old Benjamin should have his share, Mrs. Hannam, the mother, came in: a decent-looking woman, with one arm in a sling; and Amelia Hannah then volunteered to run round to the "Bull's Head" in search of Mrs. Mumper.

While she was gone, Sydney Welworth took the opportunity of making some inquiries about that precocious young person, and also of venturing to suggest that he did not consider her manners or address either agreeable or respectful to her ancient charge.

"Oh, that's only Amelia's way," said the mother; "why, I assure you, gentlemen, she is as jealous over him as if he was her own child; she scolds him a bit sometimes, and keeps him in order, just to show her authority and special interest in him like; but she never allows nobody else to do so, nor to interfere with him in any way. Why, when the old gentleman was ill, a few months back, that child sat up nights and nights with him, and wouldn't leave his bedside, or allow any one else to give him his food or his physic; and she made him two shirts—every bit with her own little fingers—as a present and surprise for him against his last birthday. Bless you, sir, old Benjamin is as fond of her as she is of him, though she does keep him in such strict order, and he minds her and obeys her like a faithful dog. She is a good, hardworking child, and everything that's dutiful to me, I can assure you; and how I should ever have got on now without her, I can't tell at all."

"She seems an infant phenomenon, and no mistake," remarked Archie Scott; "but there's a bad look out in store for some poor fellow hereafter, whoever she may happen to fix on for the honour of becoming her husband."

At this moment, the little girl returned, to announce that Mrs. Mumper was up-stairs in her own reception-room, having been brought quickly enough by the simple message, delivered exactly as it had been given, to the effect that a "gentleman had come to inquire after her in her distress."

"Now," said Sydney, in a whisper; "if I mistake not, I shall be able to show you, by way of a wind-up, a case of perhaps greater destitution than we have even yet seen;" and up they went.

There was no need to knock, for the door of the back room on the second floor was partly open, and they could already hear the deep-drawn sighs and low moaning of some person, apparently in the greatest distress.

Soul of music, fill me now."—p. 314.

By the feeble glimmer of a small piece of rush-light, the appearance of the low room was miserable in the extreme. Some remains of torn-down paper hung in festoons from the filthy walls, the ceiling was broken in large holes, through which the laths and rafters might be seen, and the flooring seemed equally rotten and dilapidated. Every pane of the window was either crashed all across, or entirely gone, and stuffed with a piece of rag or newspaper. As to furniture, there was none, except in one corner a bundle of rags, and part of a dirty straw mattress, on which was seated a middle-aged female, crooning, with her face between her knees, her shoulders covered with the ragged remains of an old shawl, or perhaps it may once have been a brown blanket, which she clutched more tightly around her as she continued to moan, without appearing to be aware that any one was in the room but herself.

She quite started when Sydney Welworth inquired, in a most sympathetic tone of voice, whether she was Mrs. Mumper; but, even by that dim light, Captain Scott was surprised, when she looked up, to see that, in spite of her rags and tatters, and her grey hair—which in her misery was allowed to hang down wildly over her face from beneath an exceedingly dirty widow's cap—her cheeks were even tolerably plump looking, while the bright colour of her nose, certainly, rather contrasted with the rest of her outward condition.

"We have been requested to come and see after you, in consequence of a letter from you to the Marchioness of A., which has been forwarded to a society of which I am a member."

"Ah, God bless her!" cried Mrs. Mumper, with a deep sigh; "she is indeed a good lady, as I have been told, and always ready to assist the poor in their need."

"Well, Mrs. Mumper, if you could manage to give us a better light, I should like to look over this letter: perhaps your neighbour, Mrs. Hannam, down-stairs, will be kind enough to lend us her candle for a minute or two."

MUSIC.

I.

SOFTEST cadence, lightly falling,
Let me hear thee once again;
Spirit so resistless, calling
Tears from hardened hearts of men,
Call unto the inmost hearing,
Stir the depths of pity, fearing
No repulse, thou all endearing
Sense of rapture, even when
We must weep as if in anguish,
As thy liquid voices languish,
At their saddest, sweetest then.

II.

Sweet, as in far distance dying,
Memories of happy years,
Joys that were and are not, sighing,
Blinding that which is with tears,
Come a present peace defying,
With harmonious, strange, contending
Voice—entreating voice replying,
Now with wedded purpose blending
From the heart's secretest dwelling,
From a sacred shrine outwelling,
Like a flood of waters swelling,
High, and grand, and solemn thunder,
Every passion 'neath thee quelling,
Crushing all emotion under,

Moving with imperious brow,
Soul of music, what art thou?
Soul of music, fill me now.

III.

Reed, that singeth by the river—
River babbling on the stone—
Winds, that in the aspen shiver,
Or, to greater anger grown,
Make the rooted forests quiver—
Music, these, thy varied tone,
With the mingled mirth and moan
Of the ocean, breaking ever,
Matchless in its song, alone,
Unto these thy heart is known.

IV.

Bells upon the night air stealing,
Sweet as sleep to long unrest,
Through the outer senses feeling
For the sense within the breast.
Gentle fingers, full of healing,
On the pained temples prest,
Many, since your faint beginning,
Many miles have ye been winning.
For the weary in their waking,
For the sad heart in its aching.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE CANKER OF COVETOUSNESS.

THE atmosphere in which David Haldane worked was one of high pressure at every point. With the minister of Burnside had originated one of those mysterious religious movements which, under the name of revivals, have been a mark for the shallow scoffer, who can see no deeper than the surface-eccentricities of lives stirred to their hidden depths. So-called "culture" sneers at some of the manifestations of profound feeling among the ignorant and uncultivated; but, hypocrisy and self-delusion aside, the great wave of emotion which strikes human hearts at such a time, is a mighty power for good. Hypocrisy and self-delusion may mingle with it; those twin-children of falsehood are to be found following the standard of every cause that is noble and holy, precisely because it is so; but as far as the influence at work is truly felt by the spirits of men, so far is it a Divine influence. Minds of a higher class than that of the scornor, who yet stand aloof from the movement, see and acknowledge this. They see it exalt the most degraded, and almost transfigure, for a time at least, the most rude of human beings, and they own that it purifies the springs of action as no mere intellectual conviction can do.

The attitude of reverent observation was that which David Haldane assumed. The movement was most active among the print-work hands, and the people were holding meetings, for exhortation and prayer, at all possible and impossible hours of the day and night; and at all times, in season and out of season, Mr. Keith was at his post among them, keeping down weak excitement by the weight of his solemn enthusiasm, obeying every call to added labour, as the call of the Spirit of God, till his face was haggard with watching, and his clothes hung loose upon his gaunt and stooping frame.

For it seemed as if the more prayer there was in the parish, there was also the more drunkenness and blasphemy; the more good, the more evil; the more holiness, the more sin. That this is generally the case, is a strange fact connected with such movements. None within the sphere of their influence remain entirely unmoved; and their influence resisted for good, seems to become a stimulant to evil.

It is true that some good men stand aloof, even as David Haldane did. He appeared once or twice in the midst of the gatherings, but he made no sign; and it shows how he was regarded by his people, that the impressed among them held special meetings on his behalf, and did not scruple to tell him that they did so. And he did not resent the interference, as many in his place would have done, but met them on the simple ground of the equality of souls, and gained over them, in return, a spiritual influence of another kind—gained the right to interfere in their more immediate concerns, to reason down their prejudices and rebuke their follies.

His efforts at social regeneration were deeper and wiser for all this. "From what I see," he would say to Mr. Keith, "I think the spiritual regeneration is at the root of the matter after all. Somewhere or other the Spirit must be at work in order to produce the outward results even of civilised life and social order; but all good moves in a circle, and if I can make way for the higher work by doing the lower—if I can, at least, sweep away the hindrances, the brutalities, and disorders which obstruct the higher work, it is something."

And his friend would answer, "Ah, you want to be greatest among us by being servant of all. And you may, in God's good time." That last utterance was the noble part of his Calvinism, which rendered him infinitely tolerant of what he would have called non-wilful error.

And the other persons of our story moved in this atmosphere too, and were influenced by it in their several ways. The movement had begun before the Grants went up to their last term at college. On Sandie it had only the effect of deepening his doubts and increasing his difficulties, both being mainly intellectual; but it had given Archie the impulse he needed, in order to make him an earnest and impassioned man. Before he went, he had decided on going in for the course of divinity necessary for a candidate for the Church of Scotland; whereas Sandie had sorrowfully given his decision against the same course, which had been proposed to him also. "You won't think me a reprobate," said the latter to David Haldane, "for you are somewhat of my way of thinking yourself; but I can't understand any of it, except the Sermon on the Mount, and it will take me all my time, I'm thinking, to learn that by heart."

Margery Oglivie had been living all her life under a sense of the judgments of God, which no "awakening" could deepen. What she needed far more was an awakening to the sense of the mercy underlying all judgments, but she spent her money freely in what she considered the work of evangelisation, and was, if possible, stricter than ever in her life and gloomier in her views. She frightened poor Mrs. Oglivie, the mother of Horace—a vain, worldly old woman enough—nearly out of her wits by her denunciations of the love of the world, and the things of the world, which the poor little woman felt in her heart she could not cease to love. As for Captain Oglivie, his soul became bitter with an exceeding bitterness against Margery and her favourite minister, and all who thought with them.

Captain Oglivie, though still a young man, had retired on half-pay, and had brought his mother to live with him at Delaube, in order that they might be near Margery. He found old Haldane willing to let the place—though he would not part with it—for a rent which Margery generously paid on the old lady's behalf. But the captain by no means confined himself to the quiet pleasures of a country life. He had frequent absences. He made acquaintance with the fastest men in the neighbourhood, visited with them, sported with them, and, in a general way, lived far above his means. He had had to apply to old Haldane more than once for money for his private pleasures, and the old man silenced his conscience and helped the young one on the way to ruin.

And still living, still dying, the unconscious possessor of the inheritance held the—to him—worthless possession. A terrible cough seemed to hack and hew at the fibres of his life, but still he did not die. Horace Oglivie longed for his death with a longing which would not be stilled, which would not be hidden from himself any longer, but which cried aloud in his heart. When he was on the spot he watched him from day to day, watched for the signs of disease and death with a horrible eagerness—an eagerness which was horrible even to himself. The canker of covetousness was eating into his soul; and as no soul corrupts, even as no flesh that has life in it corrupts, without pain, sometimes the torture was so great that he could no longer endure it, and he would rush away, to get rid of the presence of the desire in scenes of dissipation.

A closer analysis of that corrupting heart would be too terrible, but another feeling had arisen in it of equal force—a feeling which rose into a passion, and intensified the murderous desire which enthralled him: that feeling was hatred of the religious movement going on around him. He was compelled, in order to keep well with Margery, to treat it with a certain amount of respect—to show himself, for instance, in the kirk on Sunday, when Mr. Keith's sermons were more rousing than ever. He felt this becoming an intolerable bondage to him. Even his mother was freer than he was. She had openly rebelled, and gone over to Dr. Grant, whose church was almost deserted in these days. And because he could not show it openly, the hatred rankled the more in his heart, and, as has been said, intensified his desire for the death of Sir Alexander, though then but half the battle would be won, and another life would still stand between him and the coveted inheritance.

More than one ancestor of his would have committed murder—ay, murders—under the same circumstances; but he was not the man to soil his dainty hands with blood: he was not going to commit a crime; the idea never entered into his mind. If it had, he would have laughed at it. He did not think that the desire within him was murder. Does the murderer ever think so, till he sees his hate, or malice, or covetousness, translated into act? Something of the kind had flashed into his mind, on the occasion when he had pursued Sir Alexander to the brink of the river. But his conscience had been hardening since then, for when the circumstances recurred to his memory, he only considered it unlucky that that stupid, plodding young Haldane had been so prompt to rescue the drowning man.

Margery had not only promised, but performed. She had openly made her will, bequeathing all the property of which she might die possessed to Horace Oglivie and his heirs for ever. Peggy's name was not so much as mentioned. She had chosen her own lot: and the letters between Margery and her had passed at longer and longer intervals, and latterly had altogether ceased.

CHAPTER XLIV.

FIRST AND SECOND LOVE.

DAVID HALDANE had done a heavy day's business in Bleaktown, and was returning to his hotel in the afternoon, when he met his friends Archie and Sandie, swinging along side by side, for Sandie could now wield his crutch so nimbly that it scarcely—if at all—impeded his progress. David was often in town, but as it was usually only for the day, and as he was under the necessity of catching the afternoon coach, while the young men were still at their classes, he had never had an opportunity for calling on them at their lodgings. Now, however, their classes were over, and they insisted on bearing him off then and there, or else on his promising to come and spend the evening with them: and as on this occasion he had not finished his business, and must remain another day in town, he consented to the latter.

The young men lodged with two widow ladies in a dull old street. David Haldane had the impression—as people will have impressions concerning those whose names they have often heard—that the ladies were old too, and also dull. The young men were boarded with them, and pursued their studies in the evenings in a room devoted to their special use. They had found themselves comfortable, for they had twice returned to the same temporary roost. Now they were about to come homie, having taken their degrees, and only one was henceforth to return to the halls of learning. Sandie was already a candidate for the parish school of Strathie, about to be vacated by its old master, who had grown infirm, and was, happily, independent.

When the evening came, David found himself in a well-furnished, well-lighted room with two remarkably pretty women, concerning whom he was in considerable perplexity. The elder lady did not look above five or six-and-thirty, while the younger might not be more than half that age, though she looked older from her heavy black dress, and the widow's cap that framed her fair, young face. He would have come to the conclusion that she was a visitor, but that she called the elder lady, also in a widow's cap, "mamma." Could there be three generations of widows? and where was the old lady?

It was very like a family party. Archie had still retained what is called, in the vernacular, "the gift of the gab"—viz., the gift of conversational ability, or agility rather. His talk was soberer than it used to be, and a little sententious perhaps, for he was still young, and the fire of enthusiasm had not yet consumed the straw and stubble of his intellectual fabric. He would probably, at this period of his life, have disappointed any one who had known him as a frank, open-hearted boy. He was still frank and open-hearted, but somewhat conscious. The authority of the vocation to which he was called was making its mark on him, and the burden of it had not yet been borne with its weight of terrible, humbling responsibility. Sandie had gained in the real dignity and humility which comes from earnest, patient thought. "I think if Miss Oglivie had been their companion still, Sandie would have been her favourite now, as I am sure Archie used to be," was what David Haldane said to himself on this occasion.

The evening was passing very pleasantly. They had tea, with the wonderful variety of cakes known only at a Scotch tea-table; and during its progress, Archie awkwardly upset the contents of his teacup into the younger lady's lap—an accident which she took most sweetly, getting up and gliding away to repair it, saying that her soft black dress could not possibly be spoilt, and blushing with a deeper blush than the occasion seemed to require, as Sandie said that the accident was a lucky one, alluding to an old "fret" that it forebodes a wedding. When she came back again to the seat next Archie, David thought the proximity decidedly dangerous.

After tea, Archie begged her to sing, and, without any pressing, she complied, not accompanying herself, though there was a piano in the room, but clasping her fair hands in her lap, and warbling her national ditties, pure and simple, with a voice of no great power, but of exquisite sweetness. Then the insatiable Archie, after a very short pause, began begging again—this time, for the favourite ballad of "Auld Robin Gray;" and David Haldane joined in the request, for she seemed a little reluctant, perhaps from the fear that the rest of the company might have had enough.

Before she had ended that saddest, sweetest story of love sacrificed to duty, her audience were all more or less deeply affected; and the rising in her white throat, towards its close, showed that she herself was under the influence of its plaintive spell. David Haldane was deeply interested in the two women. The mother was looking so sad—looking as if she had done with life, and all that made it sweet, though her heart was still young enough to agonise over the loss, only that the agony was so unavailing. She seemed pleading her sorrow against her youth, while her daughter seemed pleading her own sweet youth against her sorrow, and trying to put it away from her, if possible. But their visitor could hardly believe his ears when he heard, or thought he heard, Archie whisper, "Thank you, Rose."

He had heard quite right, as Archie afterwards explained. He had introduced her as Mrs. Rose; but she bore the name doubly, for she had formerly been Rose Macdonald, now she was Rose Rose. Mother and daughter were more like sisters than anything else—they were, indeed, sisters in misfortune. Both their husbands had been lost in the same disastrous wreck. The one was master, the other mate, in a ship trading with "the Indies," and both had shares in her. The mate had married the master's daughter, a girl of seventeen; and it was the father's last trip, before giving up his post to his tried and trusted son-in-law, and retiring to enjoy the little fortune he had made, when the good ship foundered in a gale, and all hands perished. The little fortune had not all been swept away, but the disaster, besides taking from the two women their earthly dearest and best, had left them in somewhat reduced circumstances; and this was all their history.

Archie, when his friend rose to take leave, insisted on accompanying him to his hotel; but when they got into the street, the night was so fine that they turned to the shore instead, and paced up and down by the moon-lighted waves. It was there that Archie gave him the history of Rose and her mother above recorded. He had dragged him out upon the granite pier, and after some pacing to and fro, he suddenly asked—

"Do you believe in first love, Haldane?"

"I have no great practical experience," laughed David. "Why do you ask?"

"Oh, because I haven't the least faith in it," answered Archie, stoutly. "I think a man may be desperately in love half-a-dozen times before he gets at the true love that will suffice him all his life."

"Have you been experimenting on this extensive scale?" inquired his companion, still laughingly.

But Archie was in deadly earnest, and he replied—

"Jesting aside, Haldane, I am over head and ears in love with Rose there. I never loved any human being so well as I love her."

"At present," David put in; "but you would like to prove that some day you may love somebody else better. Is that what you want a theory of love for?"

"Don't tease me just now, Haldane, like a good fellow, but listen to me. I shall never love anybody better. I know what you mean by that incredulous look, but there never was anything in my liking for Miss Oglivie; you know she never cared for me, and that makes all the difference."

"Does it?" said David, in an absent voice; then, coming back to himself, he added, "Mrs. Rose cares for you then?"

"We are engaged," said Archie.

"Have you not been hasty about it?" said his companion, very grave now. "Does your father know?"

"Not yet."

"He ought to have known."

"That's what Sandie says; but we are going back so soon, and it's so much better to tell than to write, and my father is so good," answered Archie, heaping one reason on another, conscious that none of them were valid. "And, besides, I could not help it," he added; "the opportunity was there, and out it came, before I knew hardly what I was saying."

"But she did not accept you quite so suddenly?" said David, who would have been somehow disappointed in an affirmative.

"No. At first she would not accept me at all, because she said she could never love another as she had loved him she had lost; and now she says that I must let the engagement be all on her side. We have four years, at least, to wait before I get a kirk, and she seems to think I may change my mind. And then I'm afraid she may draw back altogether, if my father and mother object; not that there's anything to object to, except her being a widow, and if she hadn't been a widow I couldn't have married her."

Here Archie went off into a rhapsody on the virtues and graces of Mrs. Rose, which only ended with his arrival at his lodgings again. David had escorted him, instead of his escorting David. As they were parting, the latter said—

"Have you heard anything of Miss Oglivie lately?"

"She has not written to my mother for ever so long," Archie answered, with perfect calmness; "but Jean—you know old Jean—says she is working as an artist. I believe the old woman cried over it bitterly, holding the very name of artist in abhorrence. I fancy she must be rather poorly off, however. We must have been mistaken about the marriage, I suppose. By the way, it was you that told us of it, I remember."

"I had it from my uncle," said David, thoughtfully: "and he had it from Captain Oglivie's own lips."

"But it may have been broken off," suggested Archie. "I never liked the fellow's looks."

"Very likely," was David's answer, either to the first or second statement, or perhaps to both. He was meditating as to whether his uncle knew the truth of the matter, and whether he had concealed it wilfully from him.

He bade Archie "good night," looking up at the still lighted windows of the home-like house, and thinking how happy the young man was under the same roof with her he loved. His own lot was hard and lonely by comparison. His evening with the two women had stirred his heart—stirred it till he felt its greatness and its emptiness. He could not yet go back to his hotel, so he turned again to the shore and walked once more to the end of the granite pier, and stood looking far out into the restless sea, feeling his heart drawn toward the unseen, far distant shore, like its great, heaving, moaning tides. He stood, thinking of Archie's second love; how fair she was, in her youth and her sorrow!—one of the fairest, sweetest women he had ever seen. She came before him like a lovely picture now. But the face of the first rose up on his memory like a living presence, and he knew that for him there could be no second. In that hour all that he had won seemed worthless, all that he had done fruitless and void. And then Hope whispered, "There may be yet another chance for life." And he answered, resolutely, "I will try."

THE BEST JOKE OF THE SEASON.

THE best joke of the season! the very best joke I ever played!" gasped Ned Towers, quite out of breath from toiling up the long hill from the sea. "I don't think young Stokes will set me down again in a hurry."

"Why, what have you done now? Tell us your joke? What fresh torment have you invented for that miserable boy?" cried isolated voices here and there from the nooks of the long schoolroom, almost deserted to-day, from two substantial causes—namely, the absence of the head-master, Dr. Black, and the boon of a whole holiday to the school.

"I set him down, that's all—tit-for-tat, you know—set him down on the top of a high rock out at sea—there, that rock out beyond the island; if you look you can catch a glimpse of his hat with the blue ribbon, just a little way round that corner. Do you see, Markham?"

Two or three boys who enjoyed jokes of this kind rushed to the open window at the further end of the room, and craned their necks in the direction seaward pointed out to them by Towers.

"How did you manage to get either him or the boat out there? I should have thought Stokes knew you too well by this time to trust himself in your hands."

"Not he—the tamest little bird that ever was snared, if you go the right way about it. Why, I just got six or seven small eggs from the cook, and made him believe they were gull's eggs. I told him I had been so moved by the sermon he gave me on cruelty this morning, that I was going to put back some sea-birds' eggs in a nest which I had robbed last night. He believed every word I said, and was all in a shake of delight as we went down the hill, and asked me if I would allow him to put the eggs back in the nest. As to the boat, I found it already half floated, so I had no trouble that way."

"How you did gull the poor little fellow!" laughed Broughton; "but, I say, how long do you intend to leave him there? we are late as it is, waiting for you to come back; all the boys are off already on the paper-hunt, and we shall have to put on plenty of extra steam to overtake them."

"All right, let's start at once, we shall be back in lots of time to take him down from his perch before dinner."

"Did he holloa much after you?" questioned Markham.

"Did not he just! and begged me to take him off, or he would be drowned. I knew there was no fear of that; but his face got so awfully white, I rowed the boat round to the foot of the rock, and offered to take him down, if he'd retract what he said of me this morning; but, fancy the impudence of the boy—he shouted down to me that he would not, and that I was even crueller than he thought I was. So now he may cool his temper in the sea-breezes till dinner-time. Come, let's be off, boys, for we have no time to lose."

There was a general tramping across the school-room as the boys followed their leader, and went out to join the paper-hunt, over the heathery hill into the valley beyond. Only one boy, Richard Campbell, remained behind, who, disabled by a lately-sprained ankle, was unfit for so long and tiresome a chase. His attention during the foregoing conversation had appeared absorbed in the contemplation of his aquarium, to which had been just added some choice specimens; but he rose presently also, and, taking his stick from the window-sill beside him, limped out of the room.

Mount Eagle College stood half way up a breezy hill, whose foot was in the blue sea, and whose head, on this lovely summer day, seemed touching the blue sky. Never was there such a spot for happy school-boy games; its heather and gorse could hide the flying hare, and its woods the chosen band selected to act the part of brave Robin Hood and his companions. A holiday at Mount Eagle was a thing to be enjoyed beyond other and tamer holidays. And such a day, too, as the boys had for their chase: not a breath of wind was stirring to destroy the white tracks of the flying hare, or to drown the sound of hurrying footsteps. The hawk poised in mid-air, watched the excited pursuing crowd come swarming up the hill, while the sea-bird, hovering over the creeping waters, flew scared to land, frightened by the cry of a human voice far out at sea among the rocks.

Poor little Willie Stokes, with blanched face and long white hair, dragged with damp and tears; Was there no one at hand to save?—was there no ear open that could hear? for the sea, though so still and calm, seemed full of a deadly purpose, and the seaweed, which had hung dry and shrivelled on the rocks for many a week, to-day was spreading its yellow palms upon the waters.

Well, the longest hour and the pleasantest hour must both come to an end, and down under a huge boulder of rock, in the midst of a yellow furze-bush, the hare has been pinned. The gong from the college has throbbed up the hill, through the heather, summoning the boys to dinner, and down on the sea-shore the waves are still silently creeping up over their accustomed landmarks.

"Well, boys, had you good sport to-day?" asked the second master, by name Wingfield, taking the head of the table, as the boys trooped in, red and flushed, to dinner; "I heard great shouting on the hill."

"Yes, sir, the finest run we ever had; we tracked our hare right over the steep shoulder of the hill, past the monument, and right away down into the sheep-walk on the other side."

"You were not able to go, I suppose, Campbell?"

"No, sir; but I took a good long walk, for all that—all the way down to the sea-shore."

"Did you find any new specimens for your aquarium?"

"No, sir; it's a spring tide to-day; the rocks are all covered with water, and there is scarcely a rim of dry land to walk on."

There was a sudden start somewhere low down the hall, and a chair was pushed back a foot or so from the table.

"Keep your place, Towers, and don't begin any of your noisy pranks. I say, boys, where is young Stokes? I don't see him here."

"I don't know sir; I suppose we must have left him behind us on the hill," replied several voices, from boys who were evidently unaware that poor Stokes had not formed one of their party. "He is such a small, weak fellow, he loses breath, and cannot keep up with the big ones."

"Some of you big ones ought to have looked after him, then. You must all go up the hill, after dinner, and search for him until you find him."

"I—I—I'll go and look for him now, sir," stammered Towers, again pushing back his chair, and trying to catch a glimpse of the sea through the far window. "I—I'm not hungry. The little chap may have got a spill coming over the rocks. Let me go, sir, if you please, and look for him—I'd like to go awfully."

All heads turned in amazement at this request, proffered as it was by the bully of the school and acknowledged enemy of all small boys; and still greater was the general surprise to see the sudden pallor which had spread over Tower's rubicund, freckled face. Only the two or three boys who had shared his joke in the morning understood the secret of this sudden fear and stranger pity.

"Keep your place till dinner is over; you may go then, if you choose; though you are scarcely the kind of messenger I should select," replied the master, drily.

Towers's dinner remained untasted on his plate, and to the guilty two or three at the table the meal seemed the longest they had ever sat through. But after grace had been said, and they rose from the table, there was a movement towards the window at the far end of the room, and a suppressed groan from Towers, as he leaned out and looked across at the sea, where not a vestige of rock or island was to be seen—nothing but the smooth green waters, with just a dark shadow showing where the rocks lay deeply beneath.

The secret of Stokes's absence could now no longer be kept concealed. Towers's terrified, bewildered manner called for explanation, and those who had laughed with him in the morning, now hurried to explain its meaning. Soon the whole school was in commotion, and parties of pitying, terrified boys trooped down to the sea-shore, to see if they could learn anything of the fate of their companion.

But evening darkened on the search; the moon rose over the hill and sea; the doctor was hourly expected home, and no tidings of the lost boy came to shore, only his straw hat with its blue ribbon, which the tide had carried up to the foot of the cliffs.

Exhausted and worn out with fear and sorrow, Towers sat now in his own room; or rather lay upon the floor groaning with fear and sorrow. The boys, his companions, had all deserted him, and left him to think over, in solitude and darkness, the result of his morning's joke.

Some one opened the door and came in slowly, candle in hand. It was Campbell, his acknowledged enemy—come in, no doubt, to gloat over his despair.

"Well, Towers, what do you think now of your morning's work? are you satisfied with the success of your joke?"

"I did only mean it for a joke. I did indeed, Campbell."

"There are two kinds of jokes," replied Campbell, drily.

"Yes, yes, I know there are; but this is the worst joke I ever played."

Think of his poor mother, and he is her only child," continued Campbell, with apparent cruelty.

"Don't, don't! I can't bear it!" cried the sobbing bully. "When I think of his white face, and his little arms stretched out after me, why, I'd stop a year on the top of that rock to have him safe again."

"Think of his empty bed in the next room, and how you laughed at him the other night for kneeling beside it, and saying the prayers his mother taught him."

"O God! forgive me for it now!" cried Towers with anguish.

"Come in, then, and kneel down in the same spot beside his bed, and ask for that forgiveness."

"I could not—I could not go into that room! don't ask me!" pleaded Towers.

"But you shall," replied Campbell, raising him from the floor unceremoniously.

Towers followed tremblingly; there was a force in Campbell's manner to-night against which he felt too weak to rebel.

The moon was shining faintly into the quiet room; the curtainless beds were ranged orderly round the walls.

"I played a joke, too, to-day—if a thing can be called a joke which only gives pain," observed Campbell, as he blew out the candle, and his voice sunk to a whisper; "but some day you will forgive me for it;" and he pushed Towers forward.

Towers covered his eyes with his hand and stumbled across the room, then fell on his knees beside the bed, and, almost forgetful of Campbell's presence, poured forth his earnest confession and call for forgiveness; but, even while the words still came sobbing from his heart, he became aware of a little soft hand creeping towards him in the darkness, and a child's voice, full of infinite pity, which asked him the cause of his grief.

The shock was almost too great for Towers. He withdrew his hand suddenly from his eyes. The moon was shining full on the bed before which he knelt; but, unlike its silent companions, the quilt was tossed, the pillow was drawn to one side, and in the centre of it, like a piece of the moonlight itself, lay the white face of little Willie.

He was safe, then, poor little Willie Stokes! Out on the far rock in the silent sea, there had been an ear open which could hear, and an arm which could save. God was not willing that this little one, who loved him, should perish.

Towers's joy became almost as overpowering as his grief, and he hugged the restored child with such energy, that Campbell thought well to withdraw him from the room, and walking a little way out with him on the moon-lit hill, explained to him how it all came about.

"You had scarcely left the room, Towers, before I remembered there was a spring tide to-day. I had no time to go looking about for help, so was forced to tell Wingfield of Stokes's danger. We went down to the shore together, and reached the rock just as the water had touched his boots. The little fellow had grown quite silly and confused, and could not say a connected word when we lifted him into the boat; so we thought it wise to put him to bed. Besides—besides," hesitated Campbell.

"Besides what? Go on; I guess what you mean."

"Besides, Wingfield said, and I agreed with him, it was better you should learn for once to feel the kind of pain you so constantly inflict on others."

Towers was silent, but he stretched out his hand to his new friend, and wrung it.

Thus ended, in tears and mortification, but repentance, "the best joke of the season." L. L. G.

SOWING IN TEARS.

CHAPTER I.

"THERE is no joy the world can give, however pure and true, which can be compared to the sweetness of self-sacrifice in a holy cause.' Yes, those were his words; but I cannot—oh! I cannot believe them;" and Lois Dormer let her head fall wearily on her clasped hands, as she knelt at the open window of her room. She had spoken aloud, as if she wished to familiarise herself with the sentence she had quoted; but she was alone—alone in a luxuriously furnished bedroom, which was filled with everything that could minister to the comfort or fancy of a young girl. The view from the window showed the grounds and shrubberies of a gentleman's country house, clothed in all the beauty of the early summer, and the transient glory of the sunset was flooding the whole fair scene in golden light. Lois herself alone seemed out of keeping with the peace and brightness all around. She was dressed in the deepest mourning, and her young face looked wan and sad. Without being absolutely beautiful, she was very winning in appearance; her soft brown eyes were so full of thought, and there was so much of mingled sweetness and strength in the expression which spiritualised her refined and delicate features.

She was evidently at that moment passing through one of those storms of the soul, when the conscience and the will meet in conflict, and there is risk that even the eternal destiny of the weak human spirit, which clings to earth while it aspires to heaven, may be wrecked in the struggle. She clasped and unclasped her hands convulsively, now hiding her eyes from the light, now looking up with an appealing glance to the clear blue sky, where the bright evening star was already beaming out, like a beacon-light guiding wanderers to the heavenly shore. Again and again Lois murmured to herself the sentence she had first spoken; but seemed unable to rest in some conclusion, to which it was evidently forcing her. At last, as if ashamed and weary of her own weakness, she nerved herself to a great effort, and raising her head, she looked fixedly up to the serene sky, while her hands were folded as in prayer. "Yes," she thought, "and he added, 'It was well for us that this sweetness rises from self-sacrifice, like fragrance from a crushed flower; for nothing good or great was ever achieved in the world without it.' Nothing good or great! and what is it I desire to achieve?—the salvation of an immortal soul; can any work be greater? Would not the Son of God, the King of glory, have left the heaven of heavens to save one soul only, had but one been perishing, as surely as he left it to redeem the world? And I hesitate, when every claim of duty calls me to the task, when the sacrifice is only that of my own joy and hope—my life's joy, it is true, but still only the happiness of this little time of mortal trial, weighed, it may be, against the eternal welfare of the father God has given me. No, I will struggle no longer: at the worst it is but a lifetime of pain and darkness, and then I hope—I pray—there may be endless rest for him and me."

She bent down her head, while her whole soul rose up in the solemn offering of herself, for the work to which she believed herself to have been called; and as her will thus passed submissive into union with the holy will of God, a deep peace sank upon her heart, whence the light of joy had faded, sweet as the dews of night upon the earth, when the sunshine has passed away.

It was no light sacrifice which Lois Dormer had decided on making. The words which had so much impressed her had been spoken in the course of a sermon she had heard in church on that day—the first Sunday after her mother's funeral. Mrs. Dormer was the sister of Sir Edward Granville, whose house had been her home, and that of her only child Lois, for some years past. Very early in life, when a thoughtless girl, she had committed a great error, in secretly leaving her father's house, to marry the son of her riding-master, with whom she had been strictly forbidden to hold any communication. He was not only much beneath her in station, but a man of idle and dissipated habits; and the pride of her whole family received a severe blow by what they considered her degradation. Her father shut his door against her from that hour, and never saw her again; but, after his death, it came to the knowledge of her brother that she was leading a very unhappy life, and suffering great privations, in consequence of her husband's extravagance and excess; and being unwilling that one of his name should sink so low, he offered her a home along with her child in his house, but it was on the condition that she would drop all intercourse with her husband, and never either see him or speak to him again. Worn out with trial and disappointment, the same weakness and selfishness which had led Mrs. Dormer to commit her first error, now induced her to agree to her brother's proposal; she secretly left her husband's house, as she had left her father's, and from that day to the hour of her death, ten years later, she never saw him or heard from him again.

During the whole of that time, however, her conscience never ceased to reproach her for her faithless abandonment of her self-chosen duties, for she knew perfectly well that, in depriving William Dormer of the society of his child and herself, she was removing from him the only restraints which had power to check him in his reckless career. He was a man rather weak than vicious, and the wrongs of which Mrs. Dormer had to complain were the results of his intemperance and folly, and not of any deliberate ill-treatment; for in his sober moments, love for her, and still more for his child, made him bitterly regret his errors, and endeavour, though with feeble efforts, to amend. Had his wife been a more devoted and strong-minded woman, she might have reclaimed him altogether; but when she selfishly abandoned him at the very time that he had been specially resolving to conquer his evil habits, his wounded love turned to bitterness, and unable to endure his solitude, he plunged into a life of excitement from which his better nature revolted.

For some years Mrs. Dormer heard no tidings of him whatever, and she often shuddered when she remembered that he was most probably in actual want, as the small income which she derived from her portion as a younger daughter of the Granville family had really been their only means of support, and it was now appropriated entirely to her own use, and was settled ultimately on Lois; nor did Mrs. Dormer find it at all more than she believed she required in order to live as became her station in her brother's house.

Thus Dormer was left with no other provision for his wants than his earnings as a riding-master; and his wife tried to persuade herself that this would be sufficient for him: but she knew too well in her secret heart how often his intemperance rendered him unfit for the exercise of his calling. Not long before she was seized with her last illness, she heard from the old clergyman of the parish that her unhappy husband was reduced to a state of abject poverty, and was in failing health; and it was hard, in the midst of the luxury that surrounded her, even for her selfishness to drown the thought of his condition. When at length death came, and tore aside the veil from all delusions, showing her, in the last dread hour of helplessness, the true and stern aspect of her life as it appeared in the sight of God, she was seized with the unavailing remorse which sometimes makes the final moments of existence so unspeakably awful. Her brother and daughter were both at her side as she moaned and wept in her fruitless despair, and it was intensely painful to them to see the restless misery for which they could not account. At last Lois, bending over her, implored her to say if anything could be done to relieve her mind of the burden which was evidently weighing so sorely on it; and then the dying woman with a great effort gathered up her fast-ebbing strength, and exclaimed—

"Oh, Lois! your father, your poor deserted father—the ruin of his soul will be upon my head. If I might but live, I would go back to him, and save him from himself; but it is too late—too late! Oh, that you would do what I have left undone! Oh, my child—his child—if I could only know that you would go to him, and be to him the blessing I might have been, I could die in peace."

As she spoke, she fixed her eyes, full of agony and eagerness, on the face of her daughter, who had become deadly pale during her mother's appeal. Lois trembled from head to foot, and looked round imploringly as if for succour; but no sound passed her white lips, in answer to the mute entreaty of those dying eyes.

The anguish deepened on the face of the departing, and soon that indescribable shade began to steal over it, which showed that death was even then at hand. With her gasping breath, she articulated, faintly, "Lois, Lois, have pity—promise!" and Lois, overcome by the feeling that she was hearing her mother's last prayer, was about to answer, "At any cost, I will go," when her uncle seized her hastily by the arm, and whispered, "Child, make no promise." As he spoke, the light of life faded out of the pleading eyes of the dying woman, and with one deep sigh she yielded up her soul and passed to her account.

She was gone! and Lois had not promised, but the recollection of her mother's last appeal lay upon her heart like molten lead.

It had, indeed, placed her in a dreadful position. From a child she had been brought up in this luxurious house, and in an atmosphere of intellectual and social refinement, which rendered the very thought of leaving it for her father's squalid and wretched home, intolerable to her; but there was a yet deeper reason for the agony which it caused her even to think of such a step.

Sir Edward had no children of his own, but his wife had a son by her first marriage, whom he had adopted as his heir, and to whom he intended to leave all his property. Lois was, however, his nearest living relative, though without any legal claim to his inheritance, and he was therefore well pleased when an attachment sprung up between her and his step-son Phillip Hervey, which it was decided should end in a marriage when both were a little older than they were at present. Sir Edward was a proud and a hard man, and the disreputable marriage of his only sister had been a source of the bitterest annoyance to him. He had from the first cherished a hatred which was almost cruel against William Dormer, and his motive in offering his sister a home had been the wish to separate her from this man, rather than any compassion for the sufferings she had drawn upon herself. For Lois, however, he felt a real affection, and he had taken pleasure in giving her an education which would fit her for the position he intended her to occupy as the wife of his heir, and the future mistress of his house. His sister's dying appeal to her daughter, to go and live with her father in all his squalor and misery, filled him with the keenest indignation, and nothing but the presence of death prevented him from expressing it; but no sooner was the funeral over than he sent for Lois, in order to set the question at rest for ever.

"Lois," he said, "I am anxious that your mind should not dwell, even for a moment, on what your poor mother said in her last hour. She must have been delirious, I think, or she could not have dreamt of asking you to do what is so utterly out of the question. The wretched man whom she degraded herself by marrying has no claim upon my niece, and I cannot allow you to have the smallest communication of any sort with him."

"He is my father," faltered Lois, feeling that the fact was almost a curse upon her life.

"I forbid you to call him by that name," exclaimed Sir Edward, angrily; "and it is best, Lois, that you should understand, once for all, how wholly impossible it is that you should ever consider him as such. I tell you, as I told your mother, that if ever you see him, or hold intercourse with him in any way, you will leave my house, never to enter it again: and what is more, if Phillip Hervey proposed to marry a girl living with that disreputable drunkard, and calling herself his daughter, I would disinherit him, and leave him without a shilling in the world; so you know what you have to expect if you acknowledge that wretch as your father: you will take leave of your uncle and your intended husband for ever. But, there, you are no fool, child; I have no fear of your acting against my will; let us forget that this disagreeable subject has ever been broached between us: we will not allude to it again;" and, kissing her, he told her to go into the garden and try if the fresh air would bring a little colour into her white cheeks, and so dismissed her without her having found words to answer him.

Lois left the room stunned and bewildered, with the sound of her mother's dying voice ringing in her ears, as it had done ever since the fatal appeal had been made which placed her in such perplexity; yet, to leave her uncle's house—to lose Phillip—it seemed an utter impossibility. Surely, she thought, no law of righteousness could demand such a sacrifice from her. There was, she knew, one friend of whom she might have asked counsel; but the dread of what he might say restrained her. This was the old clergyman of the parish, who had been present when her mother's last words had been spoken, and she had seen his eyes fixed upon her with a mingled compassion and anxiety, which filled her with terror as to what he might think it right for her to do. It was from him that Mrs. Dormer had heard of her husband's sad condition, and Lois knew he had said that her father, ill and broken down, was not now living in any way which could render it unfit for his wife or daughter to be with him. Dreading his advice, therefore, she did not go to him, but she spent the next two or three days in vain efforts to deaden the voice of conscience within her, and feel satisfied that she might leave her father to his fate, and take the happiness that seemed to lie before her. Phillip was absent with his regiment, but he was expected home in a few months, and Sir Edward, anxious to put an end to all uncertainty, told her that they should be married so soon as the year of mourning for her mother was over. Three days passed, and then, on the first Sunday after her mother's funeral, Lois went to church. The old clergyman preached. He took for his text, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends," and his sermon was entirely on the glories and blessings of self-sacrifice for the love of Christ. Whether he spoke undesignedly, or with the view of conveying to Lois the counsel she had not sought at his hands, she found it impossible to escape the impression it made upon her. She went through the duties of the rest of the day in a mechanical manner, and when at last it was evening, and she was free to go to her own room, she gave herself up to a deep, earnest, consideration of the question, which resulted in the decision we have recorded.

Poor child! she was but eighteen, and when she rose up the next morning, knowing that she had slept for the last time in the dear home of her youth, and that she should never more hear Phillip's voice within those walls, it seemed as if to live the hopeless, joyless existence which stretched out before her, would be an impossibility; but she nerved herself to the sacrifice by the thought of the mansions of her heavenly Father's house, where she hoped to rest, when the tyranny of life was overpast, in a pure and sorrowless home. Perhaps, for the moment, the bitterest part of her trial was the announcement of her intention to her uncle. Cold and white as a marble statue, she stood waiting for him in his study, after having sent a message to beg that he would speak to her as soon as he came down, for she felt utterly unable to join him and Lady Granville at the breakfast-table, with this terrible burden on her heart.

In a few minutes Sir Edward came in. "Did you want me, Lois?" he asked, with a slight sternness of tone, as if he suspected her purpose. She had thought again and again of what she would say to him—of how she would explain the necessity that was laid upon her to go and succour her father in his want and misery; but now when the supreme moment of her destiny had arrived—when she was about to give up joy, and love, and home, words failed her; she could only clasp her hands in agony, and say, as she looked up into his face with beseeching eyes, "Uncle, I must go."

"Go! and where? What do you mean, Lois?"

"I must go to my father and save him from himself; I must obey the voice of my dead mother."

Sir Edward came forward and looked at her keenly. "Lois, is this your fixed determination?"

"It is," she answered, with a gasping sob.

"Do you understand that you go, never to return?"

"I do."

"That I disown you?"

"I know it."

"That Phillip Hervey will never be your husband?"

To this her answer was a burst of tears.

"Speak," said Sir Edward, sternly, "do you know that you will never be the wife of the man you love, if you take this mad step?"

"Heaven help me! I do know it," she said, almost writhing in her anguish.

"And you persist?"

"I do—I must. Oh, uncle! the will of God must come before all earthly love."

"Then go!" he said, with a concentrated rage which made his lips grow white as ashes. He threw the door open; "Go, and gratify the low tastes which, no doubt, you have inherited from your wretched father. I give you one hour to make your arrangements; when that time has expired you must leave this house, and I forbid you ever to cross the threshold of my door again."

One hour later, Lois Dormer stood in the old clergyman's parlour, and stretching out her hands towards him as he entered, surprised to see her there, she murmured, feebly, "Take me to my father."

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE POOR IN SPIRIT.

IN reading the introductory verses of the Sermon on the Mount, we cannot but be forcibly reminded of another occasion when the Word of God was spoken from a mountain, and another law was delivered to a nation waiting in suspense beneath; but then the mountain trembled, and the earth did quake at the presence of God; the rocks were rent, and Jehovah descended upon Sinai in majesty and great glory. Now, how different is the scene! God is again as really present—present in the person of his incarnate Son; now again God speaks as really and as truly as he spake then. The law which is given is as Divine as that which came down in the hand of Moses; yet how different is the giving of it! Then, midst thunder and lightning on the hill-top; now, by the gentle voice of Him who is not ashamed to call us all his brethren;—then, by the trumpet of the archangel and the voice of God; now, in the calm words of Him who most truly was a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief. The thunders of the one rolling round the surrounding mountains, and dying away in the distance; but the still, small voice of the other never ceasing while time shall last to echo through the hearts of men. And yet, as it is the same God who speaks in both, so is the one only the spirit of the other made manifest. Christ came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law and the prophets; their word was the word of God, and as such it could never pass away, but the Spirit within them was hidden by a veil. Then was the infancy of the world; then were men but as children, not capable of understanding the mystery of God; and therefore it was that he shrouded himself behind a maze of rites and ceremonies, and manifested himself between the cherubim, and ordained the letter of the law in the hand of a mediator. We remember how Moses, when he came down from the Mount, his face all glorious with the effulgence of Deity, found that his people could not bear to look upon it, and so placed a veil over it. Men in that generation could not bear a clearer revelation of the nature of God; their understanding was darkened, and they needed to be trained, and educated, and brought up, as it were, like children, by means of that dispensation of rites and ceremonies which Moses gave them. The veil, indeed, was not to last for ever, but in the fulness of time was to be rent in twain by Christ. He came to abolish rites and ceremonies, and give access by his blood into the holy of holies, into the very presence of God. The way is open now to all; all, both high and low, rich and poor, may know God in Christ; for, says our blessed Lord, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father;" for "I and my Father are one." This Sermon on the Mount, as we call it, is a summary of our Lord's teaching, which seems, as it were, to culminate in the wonderful command, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." The words with which it opens seem to be placed at the head of so grand a discourse, as if they were intended to teach us in what way we must come to the study of the Gospel. Even in our earthly studies, we know well how much depends upon the way in which we set to work; how much more then will our success, as we endeavour to grasp Divine truth, depend upon the state of mind in which we make the attempt! So our Lord would seem to be guiding us here, and teaching us how we must train our minds, ere we can dare to approach his presence. And what is it that he teaches us? Does he tell us to train our minds by abstruse study, and so become fit for the contemplation of so great a subject? Does he tell us that, unless we come with our minds stored with all the wealth of ages, and our memory crowded with the heaped-up wisdom of bygone generations, we can do nothing? Does he tell us that it is a subject suited only for the wise, or the rich, or the learned? that the poor, and the ignorant, and the unlearned can only look on at a distance with admiring awe? No! he says the very reverse of all this. He tramples upon the pride of the rich and the self-conceit of the learned. He cries, "Away with all external and adventitious props! I want no learning, I want no wealth, I want no store of classic knowledge; I am not come to call the wise, but sinners to repentance. He that will seek me, must cast aside all thought of his own strength, all thought of his own riches, and must come 'poor in spirit' to the cross of his Redeemer." And to those who come in such a spirit—to them, and to them only—will he say, "Blessed are ye, for yours is the kingdom of heaven."

How beautifully is this very lesson taught us in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican. "The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself." What is his fault, but that he makes himself rich toward God—that he wraps himself up in the threadbare garment of his own righteousness, and thinks it can bear the inspection of God? How different the publican! Here is one poor towards God, "poor in spirit." The Pharisee was making himself rich, yet having nothing; the publican, confessing that he had nothing, was, by that very confession, laying up for himself such a store of wealth, that he might really be said to possess all things. Here, then, is the true spirit of prayer—the very spirit which we should ourselves demand from our own supplicants; not pride of learning, or arrogance of wealth and worldly advantages, but humility and poverty of spirit. Alas! that the prayer of the Pharisee should be so often prayed now-a-days! that we should be so much more ready to congratulate ourselves, and thank God for what little good we conceive ourselves to have done, than to offer the prayer of the publican,—than to come "poor in spirit" to the throne of God, willing to eat of the crumbs which fall from his table, rather than leave our never-dying souls to perish for lack of food.

There seems to be a peculiar fitness in the reward promised to this heavenly temper of mind. It is, as it were, the protest of our Lord against the pharisaic doctrines of the day. The kingdom of heaven should not be as they imagined, the reward of a precise and exact observance of their traditions; it should not belong exclusively to the high and the noble, or the rich and the learned, but its very password should be "poor in spirit." At the very head of his great discourse, our Lord places the apparently strange beatitude, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven;" and, in considering this announcement, let us observe more especially that the words are not "shall be" but "is," as if the very existence of that temper of mind in a man formed of itself the credentials which admitted into the kingdom of God. The promise was so sure that it needed not lapse of time for its accomplishment. He who would humble his pride, and bend low in the dust before his Saviour and his God, passed by that very act into the membership of that kingdom which is so often described in the New Testament as "the kingdom of heaven."

As we try to realise the fact that this kingdom of heaven is something now present upon earth, we cannot but remember the words of the Baptist, as he stood in the wilderness of Judea, and cried, saying, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and we take these words in their literal sense. We understand by them that St. John conceived himself to be the forerunner of some new and striking event, which he described as "the kingdom of heaven." And so, whenever our Lord himself uses the words, we understand him to refer to something then present upon earth, which was established by his coming in the form of man, which has since then so existed, and shall so continue to exist till time itself shall be no more, and the kingdom of heaven upon earth shall itself be absorbed in the eternal majesty of God.

Let us go back, in thought, to the times of the old Jewish theocracy. The particular distinguishing mark of Israel had been that, while all the nations round them had bowed beneath the yoke of earthly kings, God himself had been their king, and had vouchsafed to guide his own peculiar people by peculiar manifestations of his will. He chose out Abraham, and made of him a mighty nation; he called that nation out of captivity, and gave them a law; that law to be carried out by inferior officers, commissioned in his name. This was the work which God himself had done, as King of the Jews. This was emphatically "the kingdom of God," and this was as emphatically "the kingdom of heaven" which Christ came to re-establish, not, indeed, now over one peculiar people, but over all the nations of the world. He did, indeed, claim to be king, but not exclusively "King of the Jews." It was the misunderstanding of his claims which caused that title to be placed in scorn above his crucified head. He had expressly declared that his kingdom was not of this world, and so, on all occasions, he declined to execute the office of an earthly judge. "Who made me a judge and a ruler over you?" The Jews, indeed, would have had him restore the kingdom of David rather than that of God. They would have had him restore their temporal prosperity, and reign over an earthly kingdom wider than that of Solomon; but such a Messiah as they expected, was the creation of a human not of a Divine intelligence, and would have been little better than Moses, little greater than David. The true Messiah raised himself far above all such earthly potentates; he left them far behind, and his kingdom, the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of God, has spread over all lands and all countries, and has attained to a magnificence, beside which the loftiest aspirations of the Jews sink into utter insignificance.

Let us observe especially the wonderful parallel between that which God did for his people of old, and that which Christ does for his kingdom now. As he chose Abraham from among the nations, called his descendants out of Egypt, and gave them a law to guide them, so Christ chooses his people from the world, calls them to leave its pleasures, and obey his law. As it was said to Abraham, "Get thee out of thy kindred, and I will make of thee a great nation," so now Christ says to all of us, "There is no man that hath given up father, or mother, or home, or children, or lands, for my sake and the Gospel's, but he shall receive an hundredfold more in this present life, and in the world to come life everlasting." These were the two calls. From the first, to Abraham, sprang the Jewish Church; from the last, to his descendants, sprang the Christian Church. And as God gave his people a law, so also did Christ—even that law which is contained in the Sermon on the Mount. So did our Lord fulfil the prophecies relating to him; so was he set as a king upon the holy hill of Zion; so did he obtain the heathen for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession.

And yet, in all its grandeur, in all its Divine magnificence, in all its vast extent and unlimited duration, this kingdom our Lord declares to be the property of those who are "poor in spirit." The entrance to this kingdom is not to be gained by him who masters all the learning of the world, nor by him who treads under foot the armies of nations, nor by him who amasses the wealth of all four continents; but it is to be gained by him who attains to the greatest of all victories, the victory over himself; by that man who sees himself as he is, and, bending low in the dust before the cross of Christ, comes to him poor in spirit, and, therefore, fit for the kingdom of heaven; by that man whose constant prayer is, "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner," and so, midst all the temptations which the world can offer, is constantly training himself for heaven, and learning the truth of those beautiful words of the "Christian Year"—

"Still to the lowly soul
He doth himself impart,
And for his cradle and his throne
Chooseth the pure in heart."

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—VIII.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

BY the additional light placed upon the mantelshelf, the abject state of destitution of the room was, of course, more fully disclosed. There was neither chair nor table; a couple of plates and an old broken pie-dish were set on the floor; and in another corner, a small heap of cleanly-picked bones, which one might have expected to see in a dog-kennel, two or three dry onions, and what looked uncommonly like a dead rat.

As Archie Scott was looking at this collection with some amazement, and perhaps with some of the uncomfortable reflections in his mind of which he had already complained, "Ah, kind sir," said Mrs. Mumper, with a melancholy smile and shake of her head, "hunger is very, very bitter; and little did I ever think to come down to this, or to live thus, when my poor dear husband was alive."

"Your poor husband was a sergeant in the army, was he not ma'am?" asked Sydney, suddenly, and in rather a sharper tone than he had yet spoken in; "at least, this letter of yours"—referring to one of two which he held in his hand—"says so."

Mrs. Mumper hesitated for a moment, and then replied, "Yes, sir; he was a soldier, was my poor William, in the 20th Hussars."

"How long has he been dead?"

"Twelve years, sir, last November."

"Well it's very odd, Mrs. Mumper, that there should be no such name as William Mumper on the lists of that regiment in the books at Chelsea, and they go back for a great many years beyond the time you speak of."

"Ah, perhaps, kind sir," said Mrs. Mumper, "I may be mistaken in the right number of his regiment; my memory is not good."

"So it appears, Mrs. Mumper, for I see that you make your petition to Lady A. upon the strength of your husband's having been in his lordship's old regiment."

"You have not been married more than once, have you?"

"Oh, no, sir; my respect for the memory of my poor dear James—that is, William—was too great——”

“Oh, James was his name, was it? Ah, I see; perhaps it is I who am making the mistake. You are the widow of Sergeant James Needham, are you? and I have been making a confusion between you and another old lady I shall have to look after. There is Mrs. Mumper and Mrs. Needham, now which are you, if you please, ma’am?”

The poor widow seemed confused, and then, after seeming to make up her mind, answered, “Well, sir, it is Needham, if you please.”

“If I please!” said Sydney; “but I wish to know distinctly which it is, Needham or Mumper, as I suppose I must have been wrong in addressing you in one of those names, though you have answered to both of them. I am afraid that I sometimes do get confused in my lists; but, now, am I right in understanding that your name is Needham, widow of Sergeant James Needham?”

“Yes, sir; Needham was his right name, sergeant of the 20th Hussars.”

“Very well: now, then, let us see,” referring again to the letter, “now I understand clearly. Where are your three children then, Mrs. Needham?”

“Children, sir!—oh, they are out, sir—at school.”

“What! at this time of the evening? They must be very industrious children.”

“So they are, indeed, sir; and it is a great blessing to me to think they are so.”

“Ah, indeed! Perhaps you will tell me their names and their ages, that I may put them down in my list; all under seven years old, as I see by your letter.”

“Yes, sir; there is John, and Richard, and William.”

“The youngest named after his poor father, I suppose,” said Sydney, in a voice of condolence, “who I see died just as he was born.”

“Yes, sir, three days only after that blessed babe saw light my poor dear Mumper was taken from me.”

“Needham, you mean to say,” suggested Captain Scott. His friend did not notice the interruption, but looking up from the letter which he had been deciphering in the light of the candle, he remarked—

“That blessed babe must be a wonderful child, Mrs. Needham, to be at school at his age. Why, I thought your distress was in consequence of having lost your husband, only two months since, and having had to bury him, and get yourself decent mourning.”

The woman looked thoroughly dumfounded, and Archie Scott, fairly puzzled, was blurting out, “Why, it’s you yourself, my dear fellow, making a hash of it, and jumbling two distinct cases into one;” when Sydney, giving him a look, only remarked, “Well, I suppose it must be my mistake; but it doesn’t signify; I quite understand all about it: a most distressing case; and I shall be able to tell Lady A. that we have seen you, and are quite satisfied. Good night, Mrs. Mumper—Mrs. Needham, I should say.”

“But won’t you give me a trifle to-night, sir, just to get a bit of food for my dear children, or some coal to make a little fire this bitter cold weather? you can see yourselves, gentlemen, that we haven’t anything of the sort about us at present, and not a soul to help us.”

“Well, you see, we only came to inquire after you, on the part of Lady A. Good night, Mrs. Needham—or Mumper, whichever it is.”

“N. or M., as the case may be,” said Archie, almost involuntarily, as they came down the stairs, “but why on earth didn’t you give that poor wretched creature a ticket, as you did the others? It seemed to me to be really the case of greatest misery we have yet seen; and how you kept on blundering about her name, until you puzzled the poor woman so much, that she at last could hardly herself tell which it was.”

“Exactly so, that was what I intended, and succeeded in doing,” answered Sydney, laughing outright. “The fact is, I have in my pocket two different begging-letters, forwarded on to our head-quarters by two different ladies, though, as a rule, we rather repudiate taking up the special business of the Mendicity Society, whose proper function it is to detect such cases of imposture; but it immediately struck me, when these two letters were handed over to me by our secretary, as both being in my district, though purporting to bear different names, and different addresses, that the handwriting was one and the same; the one to old Lady A. was from Mrs. Needham, the widow of a sergeant in the 20th, killed in the Crimea; the other, to Mrs. P. from her most dutiful petitioner, Mary Mumper, with three fine boys, and their dear father only just dead of diphtheria. Her memory evidently was not equal to serving her distinctly as to which of her cut-and-dried stories she had sent to Lady A. or to the other benevolent old lady; and as I purposely kept shuffling and mixing up the two letters together, she could not exactly make out which character to stick to, both of which, I have very little doubt, are equally false; but now, if we make haste—as she will probably give us a little time to get quite clear of this neighbourhood before she comes down from her fictitious, or, as it might be called, her official residence—which that filthy den evidently is—for her other home, we may, perhaps, in the meantime have a look at that domicile, and there leave a message for the Widow Needham, from her poorer neighbour and more lately bereaved Mrs. Mumper."

"Is Mrs. Needham up-stairs in her room?" Sydney inquired at the private door of the "Bull's Head."

"No, she is not," shrieked a voice from the basement storey; "she has just been sent for over the way, but I don't think she will be long. If that is you, Mr. T., she told me to say so, and if you came before she was back you was to walk up, please; you will find a good fire, and the tea is ready."

"Oh, that's all right," said Sydney to his companion; "come along, it is pleasant to think one is expected, anyhow," as they stepped into a cheerful, tidily-furnished little room. There was a nice fire burning brightly, with a kettle singing cheerfully on the hob, a lamp lighted on the table, the curtain drawn, and everything as comfortable and snug as possible, perhaps striking the two visitors all the more so as being in such strong contrast with the miserable and squalid state of the place from which they had just come across. One end of the table was occupied by a neat tea-tray fully laid out and prepared for two, while at the other there lay a blotting-case still open, by the side of which was a pile of perhaps a dozen and a half of newly-directed envelopes; on a book-shelf, close within reach, might be seen at a glance Mrs. Needham's select literature, consisting of an old peerage, a Court Guide, a well-thumbed copy of that most useful work which gives an account of all the public charities of London, two or three greasy railway novels, a small Johnson's dictionary, and a book of texts or quotations from the Scriptures. On the blotting-book itself was a sheet of paper, on which the widow had evidently just commenced a letter when interrupted by the summons of Amelia Hannah.

Kind and Benevolent Lady [it began].—To such a sincere Christian as your ladyship is universally known to be, it is needless to remark that it has been pronounced to be more blessed to give than to receive. I therefore venture humbly to beg your ladyship to take into your kind consideration the case of one who has, alas! seen better days.

So far had she written, and Sydney, taking the pen from the ink-stand, wrote underneath:

So no more at present from, yours truly,
MARY NEEDHAM OF MUMPER—just whichever your ladyship pleases.

"I have half a mind to put that lot of letters in my pocket," said Sydney, on the first impulse; but Archie, suggesting doubts as to the legality, or at any rate strict defensibility of that proceeding, he compromised the matter by throwing them all on to the fire. "Now let us make ourselves scarce before she comes in, or Mr. T., the expected guest, who I suppose goes shares in the profits of this nefarious correspondence, and if I don't put the police on her track by to-morrow, it's a pity. It's not for the protection of the rich and benevolent, whom these rogues thus rob and cheat, that I care so much, but for the really poor and deserving, who suffer by the rascality of such wretches, which hardens people's hearts, and disgusts the upper classes from giving any help at all. There are hundreds and hundreds, both men and women, in London, who live entirely by begging-letter writing, and some of the clever ones make a considerable annual income by it, as I have been told on good authority. But now it is getting late, and we must be making our way homewards. You had better come home with me, Archie, just as you are, and dine, and afterwards we will talk over what we have seen, and I will show you how I keep my books and lists made out, according to the different beats of my district." (To be concluded.)

BETWEEN THE LIGHTS.

IN the streets and houses
All the lamps are bright,
But for dreary musing
One needs little light.

I can hear the children,
In the room above,
Shout the noisy music
Of their childish love;

And I almost wonder,
Does the evening pay
To the patient mother
For her weary day?

Is she quite contented
With the homely bliss
Of returning footsteps,
And a quiet kiss?

Such a life I looked for
In the years gone by,
Then it had a glory,
Now it has not—why?

Just a common story,
Though 'tis always new;
Youth will dream for ever
Dreams which come not true.

Then, I watched at gloaming
From afar to see
One whose very presence
Was a joy to me.

Now, I watch at gloaming,
Patiently resigned
To the loss of treasures
Life can never find.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XLV.

A STEP-MOTHER.

MWICE in the course of his worthless life had Louis Oglivie made what the world would call a mésalliance. Once, with one whose goodness was a better inheritance than had ever fallen to any of his race; whose blood was purer, in the truest sense, in freedom from the hereditary taint of physical or moral disease; who was the flower and blossom of generations of strenuous, hardy, God-fearing, labour-loving men and women; and who, if she had lived, might have done something toward raising him to her level, when, in the eyes of the world, she was being elevated to his. But the second time, he mated himself with one whose moral nature was on a par with his, own, while in birth and breeding she was far beneath him.

Louis Oglivie's present wife was the daughter of a Paris bourgeois, who had amassed an exceedingly modest little fortune in a glove-shop of the Faubourg St. Denis. He had retired early from business, and was possessed with the insane desire which pervades a portion of the respectable class to which he belonged, to affect a higher social position than that to which he was entitled, either by nature or fortune, an affectation which has afforded the richest field for the keen-witted satirists of his nation.

The only son of M. Latel, therefore, instead of stretching gloves, stretched his own and other people's consciences as an avocat; and his daughter, instead of serving in the shop, an able and efficient book-keeper and saleswoman, as her mother had been, sat in a highly-ornamented and highly-artificial boudoir, in which every article was an imitation of something grander than itself, and did, or pretended to be doing, nothing. In spite of sundry domestic matters, performed in the strictest privacy by mother and daughter, such as making of beds and dusting of rooms, Clementine Sophie Latel was sufficiently idle to be thoroughly miserable.

The son, who was the mother's favourite, and who was endowed by nature with a double portion of her spirit of getting and sparing, had married a good dot, and was very comfortably off; but the dot of Clementine Sophie was very small, and, in spite of her black eyes and her fine figure, she did not go off early.

Her father's ambition and her mother's parsimony were both against her. If her father had been less ambitious, she might have married well in the circle they had quitted. If her mother had been less parsimonious she would have married, well or ill, in the circle into which they had moved. She herself inherited both qualities, and loved to shine and loved to save at one and the same time. She was gay with a Frenchwoman's peculiar gaiety, and vain with her peculiar vanity. She considered herself ill-used if she was not taken to the theatre two or three times a week. She loved to dress, and promenade, and take excursions, and on these things she was willing to spend to her utmost; but then she would have the utmost pleasure that the expenditure would bring, and would have compassed Paris to save a franc to-day, to be spent in folly on the morrow.

So with her black eyes, and her fine figure, and her voluble French tongue—French etiquette to the contrary—Clementine Sophie Latel courted the English gentleman who lived in furnished apartments on the second étage. She constantly met him on those convenient stairs, well dressed—and she dressed remarkably well, and made her own dresses too; then she walked with him and talked to him, and made herself agreeable to the chill-blooded, lonely, and already sickly man, as a good fire is to the shiverer in an easterly wind. And her friends thought she was doing a very good thing for herself, for Louis Oglivie had not then sunk so low as he was afterwards destined to do, and payed his way in the family as a wealthy Briton was expected to do. And the boudoir was opened to him on state occasions, all satin, and gilding, and lace, and china, until Clementine Sophie Latel became Clementine Sophie Oglivie.

And for some time the newly-married pair modestly occupied the same second étage that had been occupied by the husband alone; but shortly Madame Oglivie and mère, who had led a cat-and-dog life in the house together, desired a further separation. Instead of moving into smaller apartments, as they ought to have done, they moved into larger and finer ones. This was hardly the wife's fault. Louis Oglivie was one of those men who never will be open about money matters, and at this time she did not know his means.

In the years that followed they had sometimes been forced to economise—that is, not to spend when there was no more to be spent, which a good many people take, or rather mistake, for economy. Then they would go into retirement in a mysterious way—sometimes pretending to be out of town, in reality lodging in some meaner quarter. And again they would as mysteriously re-appear, and live as grandly as before. In these periods of retirement Madame Oglivie neither visited nor was visited by her relations. They knew only one side of her life. She could not bear them to see the reverse.

Then her father died, and another small portion fell to her, while her mother took what was hers, and went to live with her son. This portion had set them on their feet again, at a time when they had fallen low. Once before, when they were thus sunk, Louis Oglivie had applied to Margery, and her purse had furnished the means for another cast of the gambler's dice. It was the wife who urged the husband to gamble, and she would spend thriftily as ever the money thus recklessly won. She would still make her own dresses and cook her own dinner, if need was, and there often was need; but she had entered into the gambler's spirit, and was eager for every day's run of luck. As a last resource she could live on the interest of her dot, the principal of which she would not allow to be touched, though shortly after their marriage she had persuaded her husband to sell his commission.

She knew, also, that he had expectations, and, having convinced herself that they were realities and not mere shams, she had learnt to share them. Her heart, too, had gone hankering after the inheritance of the Oglivies. In the course of their twelve years of married life, Louis Oglivie had twice returned from England with a considerable sum of money. England was in her eyes an El Dorado, and it had been a great source of disquiet and separation between her and her husband, that he would never take her there, and allow her to influence his relatives, as she thought she was certain to do if allowed a chance. But on this last occasion she more than once suspected that the sum he had received was larger than he had stated: and she was right. Margery Oglivie, like many who are strictly economical in their own concerns, gave like a princess when she had to give. She had given Louis five hundred pounds with less thought about it, probably, than she would take in expending the next five shillings. Part of it he had contrived to dissipate by the way, and another part he kept back for his own uses. And in this he treated his wife unfairly, and she knew and resented it, almost to hatred.

The clash of these two selfish natures was all the more terrible, because the one was vulgar and the other refined. When Louis Oglivie lost at play, or kept back part of what he had won, his wife would come down upon him like a dark-eyed fury, getting more and more terrible to him as she grew older, from her increasing unloveliness under the phase. And he would shrink from her with jarred nerves, and an unconcealed loathing, which was worse to bear than violence in return, and which roused her almost to madness. These conditions were, of course, only temporary, otherwise they would have been too intolerable, and the bond between them would have been broken: but selfishness secured as well as strained it. And Louis Oglivie would give up, at times what he had withheld; and she, on her side, would dress herself and prepare a delicious little supper, and peace would be restored. But Louis Oglivie feared the outbreaks with a fear which grew upon him daily.

Vain and boastful, as well as selfish, he had boasted to his wife of his daughter's beauty and future fortune, and even of her wish to accompany him to Paris; till, between the restless desire for novelty of situation in her poor and barren life, and a wish to establish some hold upon the probable heiress, nothing would satisfy her till Peggy was sent for.

On her arrival Peggy found them living in what seemed affluence. There was no sign of the poverty which her father had pleaded, though the sickness was real enough. He had been made ill by the constant scenes between him and his wife, on the subject of sending for his daughter. But her speedy acquiescence had restored peace, and the surface of their lives looked smiling enough to the new-comer, who had however, a keen, trembling sense that all was not right beneath.

Her step-mother insisted on her seeing all that was to be seen in Paris, on condition of her companionship. She was never left alone with her father by any chance, though he often left her with his wife. Her love of gaiety seemed childish and absurd to the grave Scotch girl, whose gladness was unstirred by garish crowds; though that same gift of gladness lay deep in her heart, ready to well up in overflowing streams at the touch of natural joy. It seemed strange, too, that wherever they went, it was she who had to pay; and her purse was very slender, for she had not taken advantage of Margery's proffered bounty, as many another would have done.

At last, when she was getting tired of sight-seeing, though she was full of delight at the treasures of memory which she had amassed by it, she was left one day alone, and her father, who had been watching the opportunity, came to her. He was looking more haggard and wretched than she had yet seen him.

"Did you bring any money with you?" he asked, anxiously. "I thought Margery might have given you some, you know."

Peggy frankly stated how much she had brought with her, and, taking out her purse, reckoned before him the little all that remained. It was only a few sovereigns and some change in francs and cents.

"You had better keep it," he said, looking wistfully at the gold. "You need not let her know you have it."

"Do you want it?" she asked, divining his look, and holding out the gold.

He took it eagerly, but with a muttered apology. In exchange, she gradually and gently drew from him the knowledge of the precarious life he led—gathered from his weak complaints that his wife was urging him on in the wretched career of the gambler, and that often, very often, the luck was against him. And she knew then that she was standing on thin ice, which might give way at any moment and precipitate her into unknown depths. She besought him to retreat at any cost of effort; but he only shook his head and became irritable under her entreaties. For herself, she was resolved to act.

CHAPTER XLVI.

SUR LE TOIT.

WITHOUT loss of time, Louis Oglivie's daughter began to carry out her plan of action. With her father's help—and she was glad that he entered into her plans, though he exaggerated her powers in a way that was painful to her—she took advantage of the aids which Paris affords, and has always afforded, to the art-student. Close to the house in which they lived she managed, for a small weekly sum, to hire a little empty garret, in which she could pursue her labours; and she had not been a fortnight in Paris before the grey dawn of the summer morning saw her stealing forth to her attic studio. It was only by a special arrangement with the concierge that she accomplished this; and very soon she found it more convenient to sleep there, and so had a little bed put up in it, which, with a single chair and table, and the materials of her art, completed its furniture. Her father, with great exultation, had returned to her the value of her few sovereigns, telling her that they had brought him more luck than he had had for many a day; and she did not tell him, in return, that she almost shuddered to touch the gold, knowing how miserably it had been gained.

Her little room was five storeys high; but then the light came from the north, clear and bright, and unobstructed. Her window opened on a little square bit of flat roof, about the size of a table-cloth, surrounded by her own and her neighbours' chimney-pots; but her neighbours were, happily, great economists of fuel, especially in the summer-time, and she could sit out there, sur le toit, even in a white dress, without much fear of blacks. But for this out-of-door, or rather out-of-window, work, and for her walks to and fro to the galleries and the school, she adopted a black gown, a sort of costume almost like that of a Sister of Charity; and in this nun-like dress she would be out on her roof in the summer mornings, working out her latest sketch in the fresh, still air, when the great city lay at her feet unawakened, like "a dream in stone," with its spires and towers catching the mystic lights of the dawn.

It was her favourite place of resort, that little nest on the house-top, screened on both sides by chimney-stacks, and in front by a parapet almost breast high, where she could sit unobserved, save by the sparrows, the outlook of her opposite neighbours being to the other side. She was not, however, so lonely as she at first imagined, and she often wondered what her neighbour on the other side of the chimney-stack could be about, to create, at periodical intervals, such mysterious and appalling noises. More than once there was an explosion, which threatened to bring down the partition between them, and which covered her with a shower of dust and mortar. Every variety of squeaking, and squealing, and barking was to be heard occasionally; at other times there was the most perfect silence.

On the occasion of the second explosion she had uttered a little scream of dismay, and then retreated into her room, having almost made up her mind to remonstrance. After listening for some time, and hearing nothing, she stepped out again to reconnoitre, and looking up, there peered over the chimney-pots a childish, almost girlish, boy's face. It was about to disappear again, grinning and begrimed, but Peggy saw it all now, and called her young tormentor to a parley. She understood boy-nature, and begged humorously, in her very imperfect French, for she was only beginning to talk the language, that she might not be blown up into the air.

"Shall I show you what you have done?" she said, and stepped in and brought her drawing-paper covered with sooty stains.

The little gentleman apologised with evident sincerity, and seemed greatly to enjoy talking to mademoiselle, standing, as he affirmed, "upon nothing," and hanging by one arm round the neck of a chimney-pot. He informed her that he was a student at the École Polytechnique, and that he spent his holidays there with his uncle and aunt, and, finally, he made her a proffer of a guinea-pig, an explanation of one of the mysterious noises. Peggy did not understand guinea-pigs, and declined, because the little creature, which he produced by a dive to terra firma, might die on her hands.

"Oh, never mind," he said, "I will get you another. Mine are often dead when I come back, because no one has fed them."

"Then they suffer," she answered, in dismay. "It is dreadful! I would rather climb over the chimney-pots and feed them myself." After this, she had many a chat with her young neighbour, and took charge of a cageful of white-mice for him, six days out of the seven.

Most lives have their periods of monotony, whether of doing or of suffering; and it is in such seasons that the life-work of man or woman is accomplished, or the spirit shaped for its accomplishment. Two laborious years passed thus over the head of Peggy Oglivie in her new home, if home it could be called, for the Oglivies had no fixed place of habitation in the great gay city. They moved from street to street, and from quarter to quarter, while she kept on her little garret studio, and lived with her father and step-mother, except in the hours devoted to work and sleep.

From the first her aim was to earn money, and to earn it immediately; and, therefore, she quietly laid aside any dream of ambition if it came to her. She worked steadily, even when studying higher things, at the fairy little flower-pieces which she was mistress of sufficient skill to make saleable at once; and for these she found a steady market in the print-shops. Her aim was not a lofty one, and there is always danger to the artist in taking a low aim; and if she had tried to please by copying conventional prettinesses, she might indeed have lowered her art, and have ended in producing those hideous staring groups of artificial flowers, which almost put one out of love with the fairest things in nature. But something within her kept her true to herself, and true to nature; kept her painting the things she had seen and loved, just as she herself saw and loved them; and because her heart was in them, her little water-colour paintings became dear to many, who never asked the artist's name, nor thought that fame should follow the representation of such simple and common things. But in truth, the heavenly purpose of saving by pure unselfishness one who was wholly absorbed in self, shone out of the eyes of her flowers—out of the “little speedwell’s darling blue,” or the white-frilled daisy’s baby-face. She had often to paint the same things over and over again, as they were in demand, but she always did it with a difference.

It was one set of pictures that made her early success. They were called “The Seasons,” and consisted of four circular paintings. Spring represented by a nest of primroses; summer, by a group of the speedwell and the daisy, overhung by sprays of the pink dogrose and a tangle of woodbine blossoms; autumn, by the bramble blossom and berry at once; and winter by a bit of bank covered with soft, white snow, overarched with holly, out of which peered the bright eyes of a robin. But through those simple subjects shone a rare spirit of truth and tenderness. A little bit of sky and background would let in all the season to the soul, and this hidden harmony of touch and tone gave them a charm even beyond their intrinsic beauty.

Her studies in crayon took a wider range, but were less successful in a money point of view. They were as yet imperfect in drawing, though full of genius in conception. A favourite subject was the old fir-wood at home, with sunset effects taken from her housetop studio.

The money which she earned she made over in great part to the step-mother for the household expenses. Her father was not to be trusted; to this extent her step-mother was; only she began to look upon it as a right that she should receive the whole of her step-daughter’s earnings, except what she might require for her own simple needs. It all went for the support of her father, murmured the step-mother, all and more than all; for there came no other turn in the steadily-ebbing tide of Louis Oglivie’s fortune. And his daughter saw with mournful commiseration that in his misfortune he was less and less considered by his wife, sometimes even treated with a rude contempt which galled and then depressed him.

When he came to her with the request, growing more and more timid and pitiful, for a little money, concerning which nothing was to be said at home, Peggy could not find it in her heart to refuse, though she knew how unavailing was her prayer, that he should spend it on some needed comfort. More and more he took refuge with her in her studio, while his wife stormed or murmured through the domestic duties, which once more fell to her lot with the straitening of the common purse. And more and more Peggy noticed with alarm a certain strangeness in his manner which was new to her,—a dreary fixedness in the eye, and an inclination to unnatural and startled slumber. Once he sat staring at her so wildly that she rose and went to him, asking tenderly if he felt ill. And he burst into tears at her touch, and answered, “I don’t deserve it! I don’t deserve it!”

“What is it?” she asked, half thinking it was some self-reproach at her kindness that had touched him.

“I don’t deserve to be such an unlucky dog,” he answered, and laughed, looking at her with eyes in which there was no sight, no outlook of a reasonable soul. Then he would call her by her name, not by the familiar Peggy, which he never used, but by her own stately name of Margaret, which suited her better than the other now, and when she went to him he had nothing to say. And she began really to tremble for his sanity.

One day she was out visiting some of the shops where she had found such a ready sale for her little pictures, and had been told by more than one master, though with perfect kindness and politeness, that there was a great slackening of the demand for such things at present, owing, perhaps, to the unsettled state of the public mind. There was just then growing that dissatisfaction with the ministers and the policy of Charles X., which, as everybody knows, ended in the revolution of 1830. All sorts of rumours were afloat, occupying people to the extent of causing a stoppage of trade. Indeed, many, either quicker-sighted or better informed than their neighbours, were already leaving Paris for the coast.

More dispirited than she had ever felt before, even at the first failures she had encountered, she turned to go home, having left a fresh drawing, which a shopkeeper kindly consented to put in his window. On the way she had to pass a church, into which she had often turned before, and now carried the burden of anxiety which was weighing upon her so heavily. “If I fail,” she thought, “what is to become of us?—what is to become of him?” and just then failure seemed so easy, success so difficult, so unattainable.

When she rose from her knees, she started to see, standing cap in hand, as if in attendance on her, her young friend of the École Polytechnique. He saw that she had finished her devotions, and, without word or sign, he turned and went out before her. When they stood on the steps outside he turned again, and said, “I came to seek mademoiselle: will she come with me speedily?”

“How did you find me?” she asked, in astonishment. “I am fond of tracking,” he answered; “pardon me for finding out where you go; it is of much use—you cannot think how much. There is to-day—I never could have known where to find you if I had not tracked you, and the poor gentleman is so ill. I found him sitting on the stair, and I thought he was dead!”

From the lad’s description, she knew it was her father who had been found nearly dead.

“I think I know what’s the matter,” he added, as she hurried on by his side; “he will come all right again, but he must be looked after now.”

She looked up inquiringly.

“Opium.”

Yes, this was the explanation of his mysterious malady; Louis Oglivie had become an opium-eater.

(To be continued.)

THE BASKET OF CHERRIES.

SUSAN, my dear child, do put your work away before you go out. Look, it is strewn all over the floor."

"Yes, mamma dear, in one minute; I am only just going to pick a lovely rosebud I have been watching for some days, and which yesterday's rain has brought out."

Out flew Susan, before her mother could enforce her wishes on her little daughter. She fluttered like a butterfly from one pretty flower to another, and returned laden with them; throwing them down, all wet as they were, on the drawing-room table, amongst all her mother's knick-knacks and gaily-bound books.

"Oh, Susan, Susan! take care. Why did you bring in so many flowers? the vases were filled this morning."

"Oh, true, mamma; I forgot. Well, I will go and fetch the large china bowl; that will hold them nicely, and one can't have too many flowers about."

Off she went; but whilst away something else drew her attention, and the flowers would have been left to perish, had not her mother sent them down-stairs to be arranged. In the meantime, a small Scotch terrier, which had hardly outgrown its puppyhood, a recent gift to Susan, amused itself gnawing the work which had been left lying on the floor. It was the cover for a stool, which she had asked to be allowed to work for her father, but which made but small progress; for whenever, during her leisure hours, Susan had a fit of industry and wished to work, half her time was spent looking for wool, thimble, scissors, or her needle, which she was always quite certain she had left in the work; and probably, whilst searching for all these various articles, some new fancy would seize her.

It will easily be seen that Susan was a very untidy, careless child, a habit which was increased by her being accustomed always to have a maid to attend on her, and put everything straight for her. Now, however, that she was growing older, her mother thought it high time to correct a failing which was rapidly becoming a very serious fault, and would be a cause of misery to herself and all around her.

Susan liked to have everything nice and pretty, but she disliked the trouble of keeping them neat. She was always quite certain that if she had baskets and boxes, like somebody she had seen, she would not lose her things in the way she now did. A pretty workbasket was procured for her, all well fitted up, but the only thing one could be quite certain of was, that in Susan's workbasket Susan's work would not be found. So with other things, pencils, India-rubber, &c., never were they to be found when wanted; and as for gloves, ribbons, neckties, pocket-handkerchiefs, a small haberdasher's shop might have been stocked with the articles she lost every year.

She was now quite convinced, if she had only a room to herself—she had hitherto slept in her mother's dressing-room—that she would keep her things in better order; but that Mrs. Harris, her mother's maid, was always what she called "tidying" her things, and that she hid her books because, she said, they made the room look so "in a litter," and left no place for her mamma's things, &c. &c. Her parents had, therefore, amused themselves fitting up a pretty little room for her, in which she was to be installed on her twelfth birthday, and where she was to reign supreme, uninterfered with by the austere Mrs. Harris.

On the morning of the eventful day, Susan ran into her parents' room for their accustomed morning greeting, and was a little disappointed at not receiving her usual gifts; but her delight was all the greater when, after breakfast, her mother led her into the pretty room the preparation of which had been kept a profound secret from her.

"Is this lovely room for me—my own self?" exclaimed Susan, and her eyes danced with delight as they wandered from the toilet-table, on which stood a neat little dressing-case, to the pretty little white bed, and then again rested on a writing-table, furnished with blotting-book, envelope-case, and all other necessities.

"It is, indeed, my darling. Papa and I have had a great deal of pleasure in arranging it for you, and you are to have the sole care of it; and, Susan, I expect it to be kept very neat and tidy."

"Oh, mamma!" broke in Susan, "no one can help being tidy in this lovely room. One couldn't make it in a mess; and there is, I see, a place for everything."

"Yes, my dear, and I hope everything will always be found in its proper place. But now, my darling, I want to say a word to you. Papa's and my great object in giving this room, has been the hope that, by letting you have all things neat and pretty around you, we might correct you of those untidy and careless ways, which, if allowed to continue, will soon become incorrigible. You think, Susan, that it does not cost much to replace a pair of gloves, a ribbon, or a spoilt book. It is true these trifles do not cost much individually; but you would be astonished at the sum they amount to in the course of the year: and it is waste to spend money in procuring things which a little common care would obviate the necessity of replacing. You have visited amongst the poor with me, and know how thankfully a small sum has been received, and how many blessings it may procure. You have hitherto been in the habit of coming to me for money for any charitable purpose; but that is not real charity on your part. Your father and I have therefore determined on giving you a certain allowance, which will be more than necessary to supply all your wants, and we hope you will employ the surplus in relieving the wants of others. But, Susan, you will have from henceforth to repair all damage or losses caused by your carelessness yourself; and I warn you that, unless you mend your ways very considerably, you will find, instead of having a surplus, that your allowance will not cover your expenses. But now go and examine your new property, and get ready to go to your grandmamma's."

Susan's birthday was this year to be celebrated by a morning party at her grandmother's, who lived a few miles off, and who happened to have collected round her at this time several of her sons and daughters, with their respective families. After her entertainment was over, the whole family were to dine with Susan's parents.

There had been prepared for Susan a lovely embroidered muslin dress, which had been sent her by an uncle from India. Just as she had finished dressing, the daughter of the bailiff, a girl of her own age, and a constant playfellow of Susan's, came up to wish her many happy returns of the day, and to bring her a basket of ripe cherries—the first of the year. The basket was prettily decorated with wreaths of the dogrose, and the shining, deep-coloured fruit peeped from amongst the leaves and flowers.

"Oh! how pretty! how beautifully you have arranged them, Annie," said Susan, taking the basket. "How good they are," added she, as she tasted them. "We have none ripe in our garden yet."

"No, miss, I know it. These are the first cherries the tree my father was given by a foreign gentleman has borne, so, as they are just ripe on your birthday, I made bold to bring them to you."

"It is very kind of you, Annie, and they shall be put on the table this evening with the dessert; but look at the pretty new room mamma has given me."

Drawers, boxes, were all turned out; but in the midst of the exhibition her father's voice was heard calling her, and desiring her to be quick. She had neither handkerchief nor gloves, of course. In the disarranged state of her toilet and furniture they were not to be found immediately. The basket of cherries, which stood on the dressing-table, was turned into the arm-chair, and a few stray garments thrown over it. The missing articles being at last found, Susan ran out of the room, locking the door after her, putting the key in her pocket; "For," said she, "if Mrs. Harris once gets in to settle it, I shall never find anything again. I shall have plenty of time to put things tidy when I come home."

The children spent a merry afternoon, playing games, and it was getting dark when Susan and her parents started homewards to prepare for their expected guests, who were to follow in the course of an hour. Susan was very tired, and her mother desired her to lie down for half an hour; but she knew full well that she would have as much as she could do to get her room tidy before her cousins arrived. She ran up-stairs quickly, and rang her bell for lights; but seeing her arm-chair standing invitingly near, she sank into it to rest for a few minutes whilst waiting. Great was her horror on feeling something crush beneath her weight. She sprang up hastily, fearing that it was her little dog, and, putting her hand on the chair, she only felt a something soft, pulpy, and wet. Had she indeed crushed the poor animal into this shapeless mass? She could see by the twilight that her fingers were wet with some dark-coloured liquid, and on her white muslin there was also a dark stain. "It must," she thought, "be Frisk's blood." Poor Susan, overcome with fright, gave a piercing shriek, which speedily brought her parents and the maids with lights. They found her kneeling before the arm-chair, crying and sobbing hysterically, her face hidden in her hands. "Oh! mamma, mamma!" she cried, "I have killed him—he is crushed all to pieces—I can feel nothing but his bones."

Her mother began to fear that the pleasure and excitement of the day had been too much for the child, and had brought on some illness; but Frisk himself, who had been spending a very pleasant day in the kitchen, now trotted in, and seeing that his little mistress was in some trouble, attempted to console her by jumping on her and licking her face and hands.

The dog's caresses roused the poor child, "Frisky here! then what have I crushed?" exclaimed she.

A frightful scene of destruction was indeed revealed, though not so tragical a one as Susan expected. The basket of cherries, the wicker-work of which Susan had taken for Frisk's bones, lay on the chair squashed out of all shape; the juice had run over the new chintz, and completely obliterated the pretty pattern of rosebuds and blue ribbon, and was now dropping on the floor, where it was forming a little pool; the frock Susan had thrown on the chair in the morning was utterly ruined, and on the lovely Indian muslin were numerous indelible stains.

The fright and crying had given poor Susan so violent a headache, and made her feel altogether so ill, that she was quite unable to receive her visitors, or take part in any of the evening amusements. She lay in her bed pondering how speedily her good resolutions of tidiness had been broken, and determining for the future to endeavour to cure herself of her heedlessness.

The next morning she went to her mother with a sad and humble face, and begged that nothing might be done to remove the traces of the accident, but that they might be left to remind her always of it when she was in a hurry, and inclined to do something else instead of putting her things away tidily.

Susan did not cure herself instantly of her fault; but she was really anxious to do so, and that goes a great way towards improvement. Whenever she was inclined to say, "I will do it presently," her mother used to whisper, "Susan, the basket of cherries," and she no longer delayed; until, at last, she became as tidy, neat, and careful a young lady as she had formerly been the reverse. The cherry-basket was, however, carefully preserved, and often, in after years, served as the text of a sermon to her own children.

SOWING IN TEARS.

CHAPTER II.

A FEW days more, and Lois was finally settled in the squalid home, where she found her father languishing almost in a state of starvation. It consisted of two rooms at the top of a crowded lodging-house, and no words can describe the contrast to the luxurious abode she had left.

At first her father's delight at having her with him, and the blessings he showered on her head for having come to rescue him from want and suffering, seemed almost to compensate for the unspeakable sacrifice she had made for him; but soon the dreadful realities of her position forced themselves upon her, and she entered on a dark period of trial and misery, the details of which may be summed up in a few words, though it seemed to her like a century of anguish. Not only had she to endure the loss of all that made life dear, but the father for whom she had renounced her happiness, was himself a source of grief and terror to her. His habits of intemperance had greatly increased in his solitude, and when he gave way to them he would fall into paroxysms of rage, in which he would vent on Lois all his anger and bitterness at his wife's desertion; and often she trembled, not without reason, before his ungovernable violence.

But her worst trial was the fear that the one hope of leading his soul to God, which had prompted her to her noble sacrifice, would never be fulfilled. His wife's conduct, in the face of her pretensions to great piety, had confirmed him in the belief, which suited well with his own want of principle, that religion was mere hypocrisy on the part of most persons, and a vain dream in the case of others. And often Lois' heart would sink, and she would wonder if, indeed, her great effort for his salvation was to be unavailing, and her whole life sacrificed in vain; but she would check herself with the remembrance that God would accept her offering, even if he did not permit her to see the results she hoped in this world, and that beyond the grave, if not here, those who had sown in tears would surely reap in joy.

After a time, cares of a kind she had never before experienced began to press upon Lois. Dormer's habits of extravagance had returned upon him in full force when he found himself with money in his possession, and he had exhausted all Lois' available resources long before the time when her little income would again become due. It was with utter dismay that Lois had found herself unable to prevent his squandering in a few months their sole means of support for a year; and at last her worst fears were realised, and want stared them in the face.

When she was obliged to own to her father that their last shilling was gone, he told her, somewhat roughly, that she must at once write to her uncle to ask him to send her a hundred pounds.

"It will be nothing to him, with his thousands," he said, bitterly; "and I suppose he would not like his niece to starve, though she is my daughter."

Lois clasped her hands together in bitter pain.

"My dear father," she said, "it is impossible—my uncle is the last person from whom I could ask money. He has forbidden me to hold any communication with him, and I do not believe he would grant my request—certainly, I have no right to make it."

Dormer was half intoxicated at the time, and his sole answer was to order her with such cruel threats to do as he desired, that she could only obey in trembling, though it was very galling to her to be obliged to plead for help of this nature from the uncle who had formally denounced her, and cast her off.

Two days later an answer arrived. Dormer had been drinking just enough to rouse all the evil of his nature without stupefying him. He snatched the letter out of Lois' hand before she had time to look at it, and tore it open. The envelope contained only a cheque for five pounds, with a single line from Sir Edward, to say that he sent her this for her mother's sake, but it was the last penny she should ever receive from him, and that any future letter from her would be returned unopened. At the sight of this insult, as Dormer termed it, his excitement and fury rose to a height beyond anything Lois had ever witnessed. With an oath he swore that Sir Edward Granville should give them the money they required, in spite of himself, and, taking the cheque from Lois' hand, he altered the figure to a hundred and five; then, opening the door, he pointed to the stair, and ordered Lois to take it at once to the bank.

"Your uncle will not prosecute you, even when he discovers the fraud," he said; "therefore you shall take it instead of me, for he would be glad enough to see me rot in a gaol."

Lois looked at him for a moment in utter amazement, and then, with an indignation she could not repress, she asked him if he were mad to propose to her to commit so great a crime.

"How dare you answer me in that manner?" he exclaimed: "you will do as I tell you, without another word, or I'll find a way to make you."

He dragged her towards the open door; but she resisted, and, drawing herself out of his grasp, said, "No, father, you shall not force me to do wrong. I cannot—I will not."

"Do you mean to say that you will not do as I order you?" said Dormer, coming towards her in a threatening manner.

"I cannot commit a sin," she said, trembling in every limb, as she saw that he was working himself up to one of the paroxysms of rage which sometimes possessed him when he was intoxicated.

"Ah! you set yourself up to be better than your father," he said. "Now, look here," he continued, with a concentrated fury which made her heart die with terror, "if you don't go and do as I tell you this instant, I'll give you such a lesson as you won't forget in a hurry. You shan't disobey your father for nothing, I can tell you. Will you go?" and he came closer to her as he spoke.

It was very dreadful—the cruel, threatening face of the infuriated man—the conviction that he was very likely to kill her in his unreasoning, ungovernable rage. He repeated his question in a yet fiercer tone. Her knees shook; her voice almost failed her; but the true, brave heart was firm.

"I cannot sin against God," she said.

"You defy me, then!" he exclaimed.

"It is better to die than to sin," she articulated, faintly; and instantly, with an oath, he struck her a dreadful blow, which sent her reeling towards the stair, and before she could recover her balance she had fallen down a flight of six or seven steps, and lay a motionless heap on the landing-place below.

The sound of the fall brought out John Brett and his wife, the tenants of the next room, and they lifted up the poor girl with many expressions of regret and dismay as they saw that she was quite unconscious. Her head fell back, and her sweet face seemed so deathlike, that they both feared the worst had befallen her. They carried her up-stairs and placed her on her bed, and Brett then called out to Dormer to go for a doctor as quickly as he could, though he doubted if a regiment of doctors could save the poor child's life.

The wretched father had been thoroughly sobered by the shock, and, overcome with horror at the thought that he had perhaps killed his gentle, loving child, he flew rather than ran for the parish doctor, with whom he soon returned. He could not face the sight of his victim, however, and he remained outside till the medical man reappeared. The doctor at once told Dormer that he could do nothing; the girl had received fatal internal injuries, and was even then dying. She might linger a few hours, but not more; and having delivered his verdict, he hastened away.

Stupefied with anguish, the unhappy father stood motionless, till Brett and his wife came out and said that Lois wished to see him. Then with shaking knees he slowly went up-stairs, dreading unspeakably the sight of his dying child. Yet when he entered the room, even his agony of grief and remorse was stilled, at the aspect of ineffable peace which brightened as with a radiance from heaven itself the sweet pale face of the dying girl. They had propped her up on pillows, and her soft brown hair streamed over them, bringing out into strong relief the tranquil countenance, more lovely in the pallor of death than even in her fairest days. Her large eyes had acquired that unnatural brilliancy which is so often seen in the last hours of life, and they were turned towards the open window with a look as if she were listening to sounds unheard by others. Her delicate hands were folded on her breast in an attitude of calm submission, and a faint smile touched her white lips as with a gleam of sunshine.

She turned a bright look on her father as he entered, and feebly held out her hand to him. He came and flung himself on his knees beside her.

"Oh, Lois—oh, my darling! can you forgive me? I was mad! I never meant to hurt you. Forgive me—oh, forgive!"

"Dearest father," she said, in her faint, sweet voice, "so far as I am concerned, I do indeed forgive; the accident would not have killed me, had not God willed to take me home. And I am thankful to go—thankful that the struggle of life is over—the struggle with sin and with temptation. Oh! it will be such a blessed change!" and she lifted her bright face almost with a look of rapture to the fair blue sky, which she could see through the open window.

Dormer looked at her in amazement; even his bitter remorse was for the moment forgotten in his astonishment, and involuntarily he exclaimed, "But, Lois, do you not grieve to die so young?"

"Oh, no," she answered, "I am very glad; this life is but the preparation for the real, the true life, and they are happiest who are soonest ready. Think—think what it will be to meet the blessed Saviour face to face! to be with him for ever!" She remained silent with a look of adoring love in her eyes, while her lips moved as if she were speaking softly to one unseen.

A sensation of awe passed over Dormer; instinctively he exclaimed, "There must be truth in this religion!" and then, not daring to disturb her, he continued to kneel by her side, till gradually the white lids fell over the clear, beautiful eyes, and she sank into a gentle sleep.

Some hours passed, during which Mrs. Brett came several times to look at her with ever-increasing anxiety, for the good woman was a tolerably experienced nurse, and she had sufficient knowledge to detect that the pulse was growing feebler, and the snow-white face more cold and death-like; yet they dared not interrupt that calm repose, the reflection, as it were, of the deeper rest to which she was hastening. Late at night, the old clergyman came, having travelled with all speed to London, on receipt of a telegraphic message, which Brett had sent him by Lois' desire. Dormer went to speak to him in the other room, leaving Mrs. Brett to watch over Lois. Without attempting to excuse himself in any way, he told the whole truth to the clergyman, seeming to find a relief in pouring out to this compassionate hearer some of the depths of the remorse that was consuming him.

"Oh, sir!" he exclaimed at last, "do you think the world contains a more miserable wretch than I am? I have killed the only being I loved—yes! and the only one who ever truly loved me. Lois left her uncle's luxurious home to come and share my poverty and degradation, and now, because she would not do what seemed an awful crime to her religious faith, I have killed her! Sir, I have often said that religion was all hypocrisy; I cannot say so now."

"No," said the clergyman, with a grave sternness, "nor would you have ever said so—in the case of your martyred child, at least—had you known the extent of the sacrifice she made to her religious convictions, when she left her uncle's house for yours. Do you know that she yielded up for ever, that which was dearer to her than all the wealth or luxury the world could give?"

"No—what?" exclaimed Dormer in a shaking voice.

"Nothing less than her whole hope of happiness on earth. She loved Phillip Herve, her uncle's heir, with all the love of her pure, true heart; and he loved her far better than the titled lady he has married now. Lois would have been his wife, the pleasant house which was her home so long would ultimately have been her own; but the voice of Him who pleased not himself called her to follow Him on the rough road of self-sacrifice, and she left all that was precious to her in this life, to bring a blessing on your godless home."

"And I killed her!" said Dormer, groaning, as he covered his face with his hands; "I requited her with blows—with death!"

"Dormer," said the clergyman, laying his hand on his bowed head, "you have dared to scoff at the Christian religion, to doubt its truth and the sincerity of those professing it; can you any longer disbelieve the Divine power of that faith, which could nerve a young girl to empty her life of all its joy, and accept disgrace and suffering for His sake, who bade her seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, before all earthly good?"

"No, I cannot—indeed, I cannot. Oh, that I had such a hope beyond the grave as she has!"

"To lead you to such a hope was the one longing of your daughter's heart," said the clergyman; "and she will consider her life cheaply given if it brings your soul to God."

At that moment Mrs. Brett entered hastily to say that Lois was awake. "And, oh, sir! I fear she is going; she is so awfully changed."

Dormer started up and hastened to his daughter's room, followed by the clergyman. She was indeed changed! the shadows of death had gathered over the lovely face, childlike in its innocence and candour, and the sobbing breath came faint and hurried over the lips, quivering as it seemed with some last irrepressible emotion. The bright, beautiful eyes wandered restlessly from side to side, and the cold, white hands clutched at the bedclothes with a spasmodic movement.

"Father, father! I want my father!" she gasped, with an eagerness which it was painful to witness.

Dormer advanced and bent over her. "I am here, my child—my darling!"

She put her hands round his head and forced him to meet her earnest gaze. "Father," she said, "I have already almost passed from earth; I can see the lights gleaming on the eternal shore. All things divine and human are made clear to me in this supreme moment, as they could not be to one still belonging to this world, and I tell you the Christian faith is true, even as God is true, and I tell you there is nothing that avails to any mortal man, but to secure the everlasting hope it offers. Father, I cannot die and leave you to destruction; let me win, in this last hour, that for which I have prayed and striven through so many weary months. I cannot go into the heavenly, sinless land, to meet the smile of Christ, and leave you here to perish in godless darkness. Tell me that you will go to Him who loved you to the death, and loves you still, to fling yourself upon his pity—to ask from him the repentance, the faith, the hope he never denies to those who seek them; tell me that you will follow him in life, and he in death will guide you to the peaceful mansions of his Father's house; tell me that you will be his, as I am his, and I shall be blest beyond all words, and ever through eternity will I thank God who brought me back to you, that he might crown me in the hour of death with the precious gift of your redemption."

"I do, my child," cried Dormer, with tears raining from his eyes; "I do believe in the Saviour, whose grace has made you what you are. If his infinite love can look with pity even on such a rebel as I have been, I will seek no other joy in life but to sit at his feet and learn of him how to adore his wonderful goodness throughout the endless ages; and if my sins seem too great for his mercy, Lois, I yet will pass my days in penitence and prayer, and leave my poor soul in his mighty hands."

"Do you remember what he said?" asked Lois, her face lighting up with unearthly radiance—"None shall ever pluck them out of my hands." He will not cast you out, dear father. Now, God be thanked for ever, for his wondrous love, for the sweetness of this death is more than all the sweetness I ever found in life."

As she spoke she fell back gently on her pillows, but an answering smile brightened her face as the old clergyman bending over her said, softly, "Dear child, your sacrifice has been accepted; your light affliction, which was but for a moment, will be lost in the weight of eternal glory, which will surround your father and yourself in the realms of light—you have sown indeed in tears, but you will reap in joy.”

As he spoke, her eyes opened once more, clear, bright, and joyous, gazing intently upwards; then slowly they closed. A few moments she lay, her breathing growing fainter and fainter, till it seemed like the sigh of one far off, and then while the clergyman said the last prayers in a low, calm voice, the pure and gentle spirit floated out into the unseen, and the price of her self-sacrifice was sealed, as her father sank upon his knees and poured forth his first repentant, heartfelt prayer to the Divine Redeemer, in whose blissful presence his child was even then reposing.

REMINISCENCES OF WELLINGTON, WITH ANECDOTES OF HIS STAFF.

BY LORD WILLIAM LENNOX.

NECDOTES of Wellington are “plentiful as blackberries;” and books have been written to record his “sayings and doings,” many of which will remind the reader of a reply made to a compiler by a celebrated critic: “Your book, sir, contains much that is new, and much that is true; but that which is new is not true, and that which is true is not new.” Let the following be taken as specimens:—

“Of the duke’s perfect coolness on the most trying occasions,” writes Mr. Rogers, “Colonel Gurwood gave this instance: He was once in great danger of being drowned at sea. It was bed-time, when the captain of the vessel came to him and said, ‘It will soon be all over with us.’ ‘Very well,’ answered the duke, ‘then I shall not take off my boots.’”

Collected as Wellington was in danger, he was never guilty of so irreverent a remark at such an awful moment. Another instance will suffice: “A lady of rank once asked the duke whether it was true that he had been surprised at Waterloo by Napoleon. ‘I never was surprised until now,’ was his characteristic reply.” Now these are very amusing stories, but they lack one great feature—truth; indeed, many of the anecdotes told of Wellington have been gleaned from jest books, and call to remembrance the epigram:—

“There are jokes in your volume which, looking it o’er,
It struck me I’ve met a good many before:
Joe Miller, for instance.” “Well, well,” muttered Pat,
“I suppose you don’t think them the worse, sir, for that.”

In what I have undertaken I am anxious, as much as possible, to avoid egotism, for it is of my former chief, upon whose personal staff I served three years, that I am here to speak, and not of myself; but having been immediately connected with many of the incidents I have to relate, it is impossible entirely to avoid the offensive pronoun I. In my introduction to the great duke will be seen the truth of the old saying, that important events spring from trifling causes. Newton’s discovery of the principle of gravitation was brought about by the fall of an apple; the origin of gunpowder is attributed to the accidental friction of a piece of charcoal upon which salt had been dropped; and steam, which has aptly been termed water in an extraordinary state of perspiration, owes its discovery to the over-boiling of a tea-kettle; and for the honour that was conferred upon me by Wellington, I am indebted to a feat of agility, a mere pantomimic trick.

It was during the Christmas holidays, some fifty-five years ago, when my father was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, that I first saw Sir Arthur Wellesley, at that time Irish Secretary. A brother of mine and a few young Westminster School friends were anxious to display our histrionic powers, and we prevailed upon my parents to allow us to get up an amateur performance in a large room at the Castle, admirably suited for the purpose. Our ambition was to shine in tragedy, so we selected Rowe’s somewhat lachrymose “Jane Shore,” and a comic performance to follow. One morning, Wellesley entered the room, during a rehearsal, while I, as Lord Hastings, was ranting away, pleading the cause of “Shore’s unhappy wife.” He remained a few minutes—a very few minutes, and as he was about to leave, he remarked to my mother, “I fear that the laughter of the audience will be so excited by the tragedy, that they won’t have a smile left for the farce.” This remark, though not very flattering, produced its proper effect, and we compromised the affair by announcing scenes from the “Lady of the Lake.”

All went off well during the rehearsals, when, unfortunately, a day or two before the performance was to take place our nimble harlequin sprained his ankle. To act a comic piece without the spangled hero, would be like performing “Hamlet” without the Prince of Denmark, and to find one at so short a notice was next to impossible. An Irish youth—“a regular broth of a boy,” as he was called at college—volunteered to take the part, “barring the leaps,” and we gladly accepted his services. Losing no time in ordering a spangled suit, and having my motley garb made so loose that I could easily put it on and off, I soon drilled the volunteer into the work required of him, which was to throw himself into graceful attitudes, and belabour me with his wand, while I was employed in stealing sausages, pilfering legs of mutton, and knocking every one down that came in my way, according to the approved plan of Christmas entertainments. The eventful night arrived. I pass over the scenes from Sir Walter Scott, in which, I am bound to say, we were far from perfect in the words. Indeed, Sheridan's remark was painfully applicable to us, for that celebrated author and dramatist, being asked which actor he liked best at an amateur performance, replied, "The prompter, for I saw less and heard more of him than any one else."

The entertainment went off well until towards the end, when an untoward event occurred. The feat of the evening was a leap through a huge painted transparent clock, through which I was to take the double leap. When the scene came on, I, in my motley garb, took the leap. Then succeeded sundry attempts of the others to follow, which went on until I had changed my dress and reappeared. In the meantime, the clock had ascended, and when I took the leap the applause was immense. No one was more vociferous than Sir Arthur Wellesley, who, from his earliest years, was a supporter of athletic games. "Bravo, bravo!" he exclaimed, "I never saw a higher leap." Elated with success, I was again dressing myself when the event occurred to which I have alluded.

Our temporary scene-shifter, in removing the clock, did not give me sufficient time; and when he drew it off, a scene presented itself that baffles description. In one corner sat the volunteer, enjoying that schoolboy's treat, a glass of wine and some cake; while I, in the other, half in one dress and half in another, my attendant assisting me in the transformation, was indulging in the less aristocratic luxury of a pint of Dublin porter out of the pewter pot. Some of the audience fancied it was a real scene; but the quick eye of Wellesley at once discovered the device, and loudly applauded it.

"Clown and harlequin in one," he said, in his usual quick manner. "Capital!"

During supper I was taken up to Sir Arthur, who complimented me warmly; then, turning to my mother, said—

"Duchess, you ought to send William to Astley's."

"I hope better things for him," she replied. "He looks forward to getting a commission in the army."

"Well, well, I'll see what can be done; there's plenty of time," responded Wellesley.

No further allusion was made to the subject. It was not, however, forgotten by the secretary, though it did not produce any result until he had long left behind him the pleasant scenes of his Irish official duties, and had commenced his grand career in the Peninsula.

I pass over a few years, when, one morning, I was called up by Dr. Cary, then head-master of Westminster—and conscience, which makes cowards of us all, gave me a pang, for it reminded me that on the previous day I had been out of bounds, a crime always attended, when discovered, with punishment. Whether Dr. Cary imbibed the love of flogging from a celebrated predecessor, I know not, but he certainly never spoilt a child by sparing the rod; and it was said the system at that time pursued at Westminster School was founded on the practice of Dr. Busby, who was so notorious for his Spartan discipline, that he flogged his boys every Monday—because he knew they would deserve it during the week! However, on this occasion I was wrong in my opinion, for, with a kindly smile, Dr. Cary showed me the Gazette, in which I found myself appointed to a cornetcy, without purchase, in the Royal Horse Guards (Blues), the duke having recommended me for the first vacancy which occurred after he was made colonel of that distinguished corps.

From this period, all I had heard of the admirer of my early efforts was through the public journals, which in due course of time announced the reception of the duke at Dover in June, 1814.

I, with a view of being prepared for the army, had left Westminster, and was at a private tutor's near Newbury. Among other letters which I found one morning on the breakfast-table, was one franked by Wellington. As in those days peers of the realm and members of the House of Commons had the privilege of franking letters, it did not at all follow that the enclosure was from the same pen as the franker, I therefore read my other letters first, which consisted of scrawls from Old Dean's Yard cronies. I then turned to the franked letter, and, upon opening it, great was my surprise to see "Dear William" in a hand unknown to me, and greater still was it when I read as follows:—

The duke and duchess have consented to your accompanying me to Paris. You must lose no time in getting ready for the journey. When you arrive in town, call here.

Yours affectionately,

Hamilton House, Piccadilly,
July 24th, 1814.

WELLINGTON.

At first I fancied it was a hoax, but showing the letter to my tutor, he pronounced it to be genuine, for he had heard to the same effect from my father; so, taking leave of my young companions, I lost no time in proceeding to London, where my preparations for the journey were soon made, and on the day appointed I drove up to his grace's temporary residence in Hamilton Place. I was most kindly received by the duke, and punctual to the moment, he entered the carriage followed by the late Colonel De Burgh, afterwards Lord

Downes, and myself. During the drive, Wellington conversed upon a variety of subjects. He told us that in the morning he had been honoured by an audience with the Prince Regent, much to the annoyance of a German tailor, who was busily employed in sewing a coat upon the prince, that not a crease or wrinkle might appear on his royal person. He mentioned that, upon the previous day, after reviewing the Blues at Windsor and dining with the officers, he had a narrow escape from a very serious accident. In returning through Brentford at night, the linchpin came out of the fore-wheel of his carriage, by which it was upset. "I did not much mind that, or being detained at Brentford," said his grace; "my only annoyance was that the populace would insist on drawing me to London, and I had great difficulty in preventing them."

On reaching Coombe Wood, the Earl of Liverpool was in attendance to meet the duke, and a small party were assembled for dinner. Nothing could exceed the good humour and affability of the great man, who told anecdotes of the late war, laughed, jested, and kept the whole company in a state of delight.

One anecdote I well remember. The conversation turned upon field-sports during the Peninsula campaign. "While in Portugal," said his grace, "I was at the Villa Vicosá, the family seat of the Dukes of Braganza, and shot with ball ten head of deer in three days. The park in which they were is immense, and I dare say did not contain less than 5,000 head, many of them red deer."

From shooting he turned to hunting, describing the excellent runs his fox-hounds had in Spain and Portugal, and dwelling upon the great advantages he had found from having his officers well mounted.

"Felton Hervey, of the Fourteenth," he continued, "who had lost an arm when in pursuit of the enemy flying from Oporto, always mounted himself and his orderly upon English hunters, so as to make his escape should he at any time be unexpectedly surrounded. Upon one occasion, when reconnoitring, Hervey rode up, by mistake, to a small detachment of French cavalry. Fortunately for him, the men were dismounted, and busily employed in cooking their rations; but no sooner was the colonel discovered, and his rank recognised, than the order to mount was given. Hervey and his orderly, finding the odds greatly against them, immediately started off at a tremendous pace to reach our lines. The French dragoons were quickly in their saddles, for the prize was worth gaining, and amidst wild shouts, and loud halloes, gave chase to their flying foes. The noise attracted the attention of some of the enemy's lancers, who, being posted nearer the English forces, were enabled to cut off the retreat of the fugitives. The clattering of the horses' hoofs, who had thus joined in the pursuit, sounded like a death-knell to the two gallant soldiers. 'Your only chance, colonel,' said the faithful orderly, 'is to make for that ravine.' Hervey followed the suggestion; the ravine was narrow, with only room for one horse to enter. No sooner had he gained it than, on looking round, a terrible sight presented itself. The devoted soldier, knowing that the life of his commanding officer could alone be saved by the sacrifice of his own, had placed himself across the narrow opening, and was literally pierced and cut to pieces. The delay thus occasioned, enabled Hervey to pursue his flight. Gaining the open he charged a stiff fence, and was soon out of sight of his pursuers."

A WORD UPON FICKLENESS.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

THINE own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not." Good counsel that. Many pleasant novitiates in your companionship may have something much more sparkling and sprightly about them, but, depend upon it, your old and well-tried friend is one of the rarest and choicest blessings in the whole universe of God. There are many come-and-go friends, and there is one popular song which especially seems to suit our circumstances when suffering from fickle friendships, and it is this—"When the swallows homeward fly." That is very pleasing when sung with a piano accompaniment at an evening party; but, as a parable of common life, it reminds us, in a chilly sort of way, of what the cold weather of adversity does to mere superficial friendships—in one word, it starts them off to a more congenial clime, to return perhaps when the warm weather does, if we are ever fortunate enough to secure a new summer-time of prosperity.

Apart, however, from the friendships of life, there are some people who are fickle in business and in duty. They oscillate in everything; they will, they won't; they won't, and they will; and after some half-hour's debate with you, concerning who's to be there, and which is the nearest way, and what's the number of your house or the name of your square, they leave you with the most indeterminate sense of what they really intend to do: they have so conditioned their visit, by their vacillating remarks, that you may equally rely on their presence or their absence.

Now, fickle comes from the old Saxon "ficol," which simply means not fixed, and a fine word it is, despite the Americanism derived from it, of your "fixings," &c. To be fixed in principle and purpose is a great boon to others, as well as a very blessed thing for ourselves. April weather is all very well, and beautiful enough in its season; but it's only one month, and you know how to treat it. If you want it to be fine, take an umbrella; if you want a shower for your flower-beds, take a heavy umbrella out with you, and it will be most probably very fine and very hot. April is April, moody but beautiful, like a lovely maiden smiling through her tears; but April all the year round would be too much of it, and yet it is a symbol of many characters one has sometimes met in life—given to sudden smiles and tears, to varied chances and changes of things—fickle as an April day.

To come back, then, to our opening remark: an old friend is a fine thing, and to meet a friend of your boyhood, especially one who stuck to "young master" amid all the early escapades of life, is one of the real enjoyments of life. Never forget an old friend! I remember a middle-aged gentleman telling me that one day, as he was walking to Westminster Abbey, he passed the Horse Guards, and looked, as we all do, with pride upon the two stalwart sons of Old England, caparisoned, in the guard-boxes;—fine horses, fine trappings, fine men; but his eye rested particularly on one of these fine guardsmen. He scanned him well, till their eyes met. What a rush of feeling came over him when he saw in the grown man the companion of his childhood!—the youth who had saddled his pony, larked with him in the fields, and helped him out of many a boyish difficulty. He didn't forget him that day, I guess, in more respects than one. He had found an humble but honest friend of his childhood not to be forgotten. Fickle people change everything about them very often—houses, horses, servants, furniture, friends. Depend upon it that, as a rule, what a man is in one department of life, he is tolerably likely to be in another. You may not quite believe in that philosophy of life, but I do. Commend me to the man who sticks to his father's old watch, and to his mother's old arm-chair; I feel pretty certain that he will faithfully stick to an old friend.

Who does not love to think of stability in English character? Why, certainly, "hearts of oak" ought to be as unbending as they are enduring: and such, upon the whole, taken as a type, is the English character. It is a pleasant thing to pass through an English village, and to find old Squire So-and-So's family still living, through the new generations, in the old hall, and occupying the same old square pew in church; it is pleasant also—

Now, I know what you are going to remark, says the quizzical reader;—amusing to go into church and find how other than fickle the parson is, in that he sticks to the old sermons. It is too bad of you to suggest that, and to spoil my illustration, for, in the first place, it isn't true; and, in the next place, the grand character of that dear, devout old clergyman is the real point I was coming to. His residence there through the long years has given him a marvellous personal influence, more eloquent and powerful in its operation than any sermon, however eloquent, he could ever preach. I should not have blamed him for accepting a deanery if he had been offered one, or a bishopric either, but I still say the stability of his character has been a special blessing to the place.

Whilst I am on this point, as divines sometimes say—though we would think a point is not the thing to rest on long—yet allow me to say that fickleness in matters of church and chapel-going is a monstrous evil, especially in great cities. The peripatetic hearer, always on the tramp to listen to some new divine, is about one of the most contemptible characters to be found; he tries to glean in every field—but then those gleanings, what are they?—clevernesses and prettinesses of speech, &c.—these are his gettings, not the real gold of piety. The fickle hearer may be seen coquetting with half-a-dozen churches in succession; one preacher is too argumentative, another too imaginative, another too sympathetic, and another—who was such a dear man at first—is so very doctrinal. All honour to those noble fathers, many of whom have entered into rest, one of whose noblest characteristics was the fidelity with which they worked and helped the church where God had given them a place of duty, and who might be found, for half a century, always in their place. Right noble men they were, and who shall say how much the churches of to-day are indebted to their influence and their prayers?

It will scarcely be expected of me that I should say anything of fickleness in love. My critical friend tells me I shall be sure to offend some one. Perhaps the young man reading this, a regular reader, who is in desperate love with his seventh fiancée, will be disgusted, and never read a paper by me again. But I must risk that, for the luxury of having a smash at a being so utterly obnoxious. Flirting may be very funny, but I have no notion of mankind playing with the God-created faculties of human interest, and trust, and love; and the young man who has spent his earlier years of maturity in fickle friendships, which have been engagements understood of all, is neither worthy of other men's respect, nor capable of feeling the loss of self-respect. I would have a "Coventry" like that of school-days kept up, to which such characters should be sent; instead of which, it is sometimes thought an amusing theme to brag about, and talk of sotto voce. I question very much whether in our ways of talking about the so-called flirtations of the young, we do not lose that sharp edge of feeling in such matters, which has much to do with the virtues of stability and honour.

Fickleness is the sign of a very weak nature. No truly great end was ever gained by a fickle man. The generals who have won lasting laurels in war; the engineers who have successfully tunnelled mountains, and bridged vast torrents, have been nobly bent on one purpose, and with unswerving energy kept to their purpose. Palissy the Potter stands before our thought at once as fixed in the determination to pursue his plan. Columbus never vacillated for an hour; and Carey, when he went to India, in the face of a hostile government and a hostile press, never wavered in his plans. Nor can we forget the great Example who set His face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem; who said, "I have a baptism to be baptised with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!" If we desire to drink into the spirit of Christ we shall endeavour, above all, to "finish our course" as did St. Paul, who followed so closely in his Master's steps.

Moreover, the disciple of the Redeemer need never fear change in him. Whoever may change, he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever! In his prophet Isaiah he says, "My kindness shall not depart from thee." Sooner shall Galilee embosom Lebanon, or the surrounding hills of old Jerusalem be swallowed up, than the protection, love, and sympathy of Christ ever be taken away. "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth and even for ever." The kindness of some is but the handmaid to their own selfishness, or the impulse of their over-indulgent fancy—deceptive and dangerous as the thin ice on which the unwary tread; or as the marsh-land light, which but allures our steps to destroy our lives. We have no fickle Saviour; but one stable as the everlasting hills, and more enduring than the most imperishable work which his hands have framed! Never has he once dashed his pen through the handwriting of the covenant, for even to this day not one tittle of it has been broken! Whilst the years have rolled on with us all, and the love of some has turned to indifference, the love of others been like the waning moon, and the love of many more waxed cold, he has loved us with an everlasting love, and will love us to the end.

And now let me remind you, so far as human friendships are concerned, that you need not wonder much why the stick in your father's study-corner is so precious to him—it's a well-trying one; nor why the friend your mother knew when they were young together, has such hearty preparations made for her visit. The cable which holds their friendship together has kept "taut"—through the gales of adversity; and it is a rare treat to meet again and feel that the friendship has been cemented, instead of having been severed, by the storms of life. No new friends can equal old ones, remember that. School friends, college friends, early home friends—these should be cherished by us with a warm and hearty love.

Of course, I need not make much of a reply to my critical friend, when he asks if we are always to be the same,—if we are never to be exalted or depressed—never to be cheerful or dull—never to have anything plus or minus in our manner—because variety of states of mind is not the same thing as fickleness of heart and instability of character. Perhaps our great English classic has depicted fickleness better than any uninspired writer when, in "Romeo and Juliet," he says,

"More inconstant than the wind, who woos
Even now the frozen bosom of the North,
And, being angered, puffs away from thence,
Turning his face to the dew-dropping South."

And again, in the "Two Gentlemen of Verona,"

"O Heaven! were man
But constant, he were perfect: that one error
Fills him with faults—makes him run thro' all sins.
Inconstancy falls off ere it begins."

It is manifest, therefore, that fickleness is no new-world fault, but has belonged to every generation of men—even as far back as the days when the inspired words were written, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel."

Not to be fickle, then, is to be fixed, to be fixed in our friendships, our principles, our pursuits. We may gain some passing notoriety by changefulness and jugglery of principle, but we shall gain no real reputation. There is an old, old proverb—When God loathes aught, men come presently to loathe it too; and as the Lord hates the vain, the fickle, and the false, so in the end men abhor them too. In the long run, as men say, nothing succeeds like truth and honesty. The fickle can be neither of these—they play with principles as people play with dice, and if they do not lie in wait to deceive, they deceive without the previous lying in wait at all. Of all tantalising experiences in the desert journey, that is the most so when the worn and jaded camels press towards the desert palm-trees, and approach with weary steps the well—only to find it dry; and of all the bitter experiences of human life, to believe some friend, and when the needed sympathy is sought, to find the cistern of human consolation empty, is bitterest of all.

But the friends of the Saviour never need dread failure in him—he is evermore the same—he is in us a well of water, springing up into everlasting life. He is a Friend who sticketh closer than a brother.

TEMPTED.

WOFUL world I was born to—
A woful world of pain,
Which the cold winds bring their scorn to.
Or their grief in a bitter rain.

So dimmed my eyes with sorrow,
And so my grief runs o'er,
That it seems to me each to-morrow
Is darker than that before.

The season chills, and colder
My faint heart beats within;
But my spirit waxes bolder,
And hunger points to sin.

And what is life but a trial
Which the hardened safe pass through?
But conscience's cold denial
Will the cautious souls undo.

And why should some have plenty,
Some hunger day by day?
I am young—I think scarce twenty Sad years have passed away—

Ah! God forgive and pity,
These wild thoughts drag me down;
In the flood of this great city
I gasp in vain, and drown!

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVII.

OLD SWEETHEARTS.

JEAN was now a widow. Poor old Tammas was dead, and his wife missed him sadly; chiefly because she had no one to scold and no one to serve, and both were necessary to her as her very breath. She was quite a prosperous woman too, which made her isolation all the more unendurable. Her little shop wore the aspect of a perfect paradise to the youthful population of Burnside; but, as she dealt out its sweets, her temper grew more and more bitter, and her words sharper and sharper.

Jean was sitting one day behind her little counter, waiting upon her customers, two of whom were in anxious consultation outside the window, as to the most economical expenditure of a bawbee (halfpenny, called a bawbee from its having been the first coin which bore the baby-face of the hapless Mary Stuart). They were as yet undecided as to whether "Gibraltar rock" or "sugar bools" would "pairt best," that is, go furthest on an equal division, when old Mr. Haldane drew near.

It was shortly after his nephew's return from Bleaktown, on the occasion of his introduction to Mrs. Rose, that the old man found a pretext for the visit with which he was about to honour Jean. She had more than once repulsed him already, but he had special reasons for this particular visit, and was not a man to suffer from such repulse as hers. His nephew had taken the first opportunity he could find, to tell him that he must have been deceived by Captain Oglivie on the subject of his marriage; and if there was one thing more than another which the old man detested, it was the supposition that it was possible for him to be deceived at all. He was, therefore, bent upon knowing the true state of the case.

"Good day to you," he said, in his blandest tones, as he entered the little shop.

But Jean, stiff and unrecognising, looked up at him, and asked if there was anything she could serve him with.

"I cam to ask whether there was anything you wanted in the way of repairs," he answered, with a smile at the old woman's independent manner.

"Naething, I thank ye," she answered, shortly.

"Rents hae been risin'," he went on; "only last term Lucky Simpson offered my agent twa pund mair for this bit place, but I told him ye were a steady payer, and bade him refuse the offer."

"It's an ill-dune thing to tak a hoose ower a body's heid," she broke in; "I never kent it prosper."

"It hasna prospered in this instance," he answered; "ye may hae the place as lang as ye like to keep it."

"It's dootless kind o' ye," said Jean, "but I winna be beholden to you, David Haldane."

There was a toss of her grey head and flash of her grey eye as she said this, which recalled a high-spirited lass to his memory, whose beauty and brightness had been the load-star of his early manhood; and he stood looking at her, and wondering at her freedom and spirit, in half-amused surprise.

But the old woman's tongue had been loosened, and ran away with her, thenceforth. "If it hadna been you, I would have had a bein hoose bye (besides) this ower my heid, and my kindly auld man would hae been livin' yet. He jist pined away in the back-shop there."

"I don't see how I can be held accountable for that," her hearer interrupted.

But Jean paid not the slightest heed to the interruption, but went on boldly. "An' the bairn I nursed on my knee, and that was like my ain, though she was an Oglivie, ye hae driven awa to get her livin' in a foreign land, because ye coveted the heritage o' the orphan."

Like other and greater rhetoricians, Jean was unmindful of the stricter meaning of words; she forgot that Peggy's father was still alive. But she had hit hard, and her hearer winced a little.

"Ye're a changed man, David Haldane, since I first kent ye; the siller's hardened yere hert."

Again that flash of resemblance, this time extending to the tones of the voice. Perhaps she was related to her whom she thus strangely brought to mind.

"Ye're a bauld woman to speak in that way to ane that can tak the bread oot o' yere mouth. Where do ye come frae?"

"Frae 'yont the hills," said Jean. "Ye hae nae mind o' me. I have often thoct ye maun mind, but didna' care to let on since ye had grown a grandee; but I see ye hae clean forgotten, or ye wadna speak o' takin' the bread oot o' my mouth. I wadna like to stand in your shoon in the day of judgment gin ye daur to do 't."

Mr. Haldane had had enough. He held up his hand to deprecate further words, and said quietly—he could afford to be calm, for the other was unjust—"I came here in kindness, woman, and I hardly understand how we have come to this. Ye mind me of some one I knew; will you tell me your maiden name?"

Jean rose from her seat, still tall and stately, and looked straight into his eyes. "I'm Jean M'Duff."

"Surely no!"

"I tell ye I'm Jean M'Duff—the same ye wranged lang syne, and threw away, when ye had wooed and won, for a jealous fancy o' yere ain."

"Ah, weel, Jean, I never thoct to meet you in this world again. We maun let bygones be bygones, for the sake o' auld lang syne;" and he held out his hand, tamely enough, though he was in reality deeply moved.

"I'll do nae sic thing as let bygones be bygones," said Jean, ignoring the offered hand. "I was true as steel, an' ye treated me like a false quean (damsel). I was innocent as the babe unborn, and ye threw me off like a foul thing. Delaube brought me the bit kerchief, and tell'd me it was frae you, and that ye had tauld him to tak' a kiss for't. An' I took it, and he gat naething for't, for I kent he was jokin' An' for that bit joke ye spoiled my hail life."

"And in a sense mine has been spoiled too, Jean," he answered, softly; "I have never married, and I suffered long and sore. What for did ye never try to set me richt?"

"I thoct ye ought to hae kent me better than ever to hae put me in the wrang. Father and mother mistrusted me too; but I wouldna' be at the pains to set ony o' ye richt, and I left their hoose on the head o't."

"And went to serve him?" said the old man, with an interrogative more stern than before.

Here, however, they were interrupted by the entrance of the two purchasers—their purchase finally decided upon—and during the time devoted to their service David Haldane turned his back to Jean, and to the world in general, lost in a flood of softening and yet painful memories.

When they were gone, Jean had somehow softened too. "I had come through the hard first," she continued, finding a keen pleasure in telling her story, and telling it to him. "I went back to where my folk had come frae, and took a place there; but I had the small-pox on me, and being a stranger, they sent me away. If it hadna been for Tammas's mother, I might hae deed like a dog; but she took me in and nursed me, and trusted me baith for siller and guid fame. An' Tammas was drawn for the militia, and Colonel Oglivie's regiment was the one he was 'listed in. One day I met the colonel, and told him my story, and he was for goin' to you wi' t at ance but I gar'd him promise never to mention it; and he keptit his word, like the gentleman he was. An' he made Tammas his servant, and when my poor man's mother deed, he sent me to nurse Mrs. Oglivie. Poor leddy! she was o'er delicate to lead a wanderin' life. I stayed wi' her till she left the world, and I hae brocht up her bairn, and her bairn's bairn, at the auld place."

"And your own folk, Jean?"

"They were clean gane by the time I cam' back. A sore, sore hurt it was to me, for it was time then to forget an' forgive."

"It's aye time for that, Jean," said her old lover; and now it was Jean who held out her wrinkled hand, and it was not refused.

"I would never have kent you," he said, "if ye hadna been in an ill tune (ill temper); and then I only half made it oot. Ye minded me o' my Jean, but changed."

"It was the illness that changed me; it didna mark me much, but it turned my colour to this deid white. I grat (wept) when I saw 't first, for I didna ken myself."

"I would marry ye yet, Jean, only it would be a mockery."

"That would be a marriage!" she snarled, in contempt.

Then the two old people resorted to the back-shop, or parlour, and Haldane drew from Jean the recent history of Peggy Oglivie, as far as she knew it.

"She's goin' about from place to place, paintin' pictures. The places are Rue this and Rue that. They a' begin wi' rue. It's an ill trade, I fancy." (Jean's only idea of art was taken from the works of a roaming artist, whose performances in profile, in which she and Tammas were represented black as ebony, adorned her parlour.) "I'll let you read her last letter, an ye like."

So David Haldane read Peggy's last letter, never meant for his eyes, and somehow it touched him strangely, with its brave, confiding trust in an untried world.

"She's a brave lassie, and a bonnie," he said, when he had read it. "And you tell me there's no a word o' truth in the report that she was to marry Captain Oglivie?"

"No a word, or I would hae heard it. To tell you my mind, I would hae thought it more likely if it had been said o' your nephew, David. But these things are best left unmeddled wi'."

David Haldane thought so too, as he went his way home. "I'll tell the lad," he said to himself, meaning that he would tell his nephew what he had heard, and how he had, even though too late, changed his mind on the one vexed question between them.

Another resolve he made, and that was to rid himself of Captain Oglivie: and he lost no time in intimating to that gentleman that it was desirable to close the account between them.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

ORDEAL BY FIRE.

Owing to the increased traffic between Burnside and Bleaktown, an evening coach had been put upon the road, starting from the latter place at eight o'clock on the summer evenings, and reaching its furthest point of destination some three hours later.

It was a fair though moonless night in July, and David Haldane was returning from Bleaktown, satisfied that at last he might achieve his longed-for holiday. He was not, as usual, returning alone, but with two companions for the pleasant little journey, an elderly gentleman and a lady, whom he helped carefully to their seats on the roof before he took his own. The elderly gentleman was our friend Dr. Grant; the lady was no other than Mrs. Rose.

There had been strife, for the first time in its history, real and bitter strife, in the minister's family, concerning Mrs. Rose. When Archie announced to his father and mother the fact of his engagement, the latter was highly, and, as she considered, justly, indignant; while the former, with all his generosity and unworldliness, was far from pleased. "You ought to have considered," he said to his son, "that you are still in a dependent position, and may be for years to come, and that you had no right to bind any young woman to a future so uncertain;" language at which Mrs. Grant was more indignant still. That her son had been entrapped by a designing woman, was her view of the matter; and the simple course to pursue was, to break the engagement and defeat the design.

In accordance with this conviction, she wrote a letter to Mrs. Rose's mother, setting forth her grievance. It was a hard, cold, but not unreasonable letter, in which she treated Archie as a mere boy, who had no right to make engagements which he could not fulfil, his future being still in his father's hands.

This letter was sent, notwithstanding her husband's warning that harm would come of it. "You know, my dear," he remonstrated, "that we have done all that in us lay to form the boys' minds and tastes; and I can't think that Archie's judgment and taste would be so sorely at fault, on such an important matter, as to allow him to fall in love with an unworthy, scheming woman; and if, as Sandie says, she is all that's good and excellent, we have no call to interfere, however much we may regret the step he has taken."

But the good man's mild wisdom was overruled. Mrs. Grant did interfere, and harm came of it. Rose wrote to her lover, giving him up at once and for ever. Her letter was full of gentle dignity. She could not bear to do anything which would displease her own dear mother; and therefore, she said, he must not ask her to displease his, by coming to her as an unwelcome wife. All that his mother (Mrs. Grant) had said was true, and she would not complain of it. She would carry the memory of his generous affection with her through life—an affection which gave so much and asked so little. It was better that he should be free to marry one who would bring no sad memories of a former love to his home, on whose joy in his happiness there should be no shadow.

And the letter roused Archie to indignant wrath, for it showed, by the old wound's fresh bleeding, that the heart of the writer was wounded anew. And the young man rose up, pale and resolute, and asked his father's leave to pack up his few belongings, and go away at once to make his own life. Then there had been remonstrance, and entreaty, and passionate upbraiding in the family circle, till Dr. Grant took the matter into his own hands, and effected a compromise by offering to go himself and see Mrs. Rose.

And he did go, and saw, and was conquered. He was also conqueror, for Mrs. Rose would not have yielded to the son as she yielded to the father. But for him, she would have persisted in her first refusal. As it was, a general pacification had ensued, and only the doctor knew with how little cordiality his wife agreed to it.

And now here was the infatuated man bringing Mrs. Rose back with him, quite unexpectedly, for a visit to the manse, when he had only promised to call upon her, as he happened to be in town.

They had had a pleasant journey among the little hills and the sunset splendours lingering long in that northern region, and were nearing Burnside in what seemed scarcely darker than a dawn, though it wanted little more than an hour of midnight. They had reached a bit of high-level ground a little above the village, and the whole party had sunk into silence, when David Haldane uttered an exclamation, and half started from his seat, making every one of his fellow-passengers turn in the direction in which he was looking.

He was looking in the direction of the Forest House, whose chimneys he could have seen in the daylight, but which were not distinguishable from the surrounding trees just then. But there was a lighter belt of sky over in the direction of the house, and against it rose a trail of smoke, licked now and then by a slender tongue of fire.

Again and again at intervals darted out the snake-like tongue of flame, and exclamation followed exclamation as one and another caught the thrilling sight.

"Whose place is it?" asked a stranger.

"A Miss Oglivie lives there," replied the coachman. "There's a friend o' hers inside," he added, cautiously; "we'd better let him ken. It's a lone house, and little water about, and the only man a fule, purr fellow. I shouldna wonder if he had set the place on fire."

"Drive on," said David Haldane, "we may be of use;" and the horses went down-hill at a gallop.

Meantime Captain Oglivie was dozing inside the coach. He had come up too late to secure an outside seat, and had had the inside entirely to himself the whole of the way.

When the coach reached what was called "the cross-road," leading to the Forest House, it came to a stop, and the coachman, tapping with his whip on the window, roused the half-sleeping occupant by calling out, in a stentorian voice, that the Forest House was on fire.

The shout and the stoppage roused Captain Oglivie, who called out, rather ill-humouredly, to know what it meant. Two of the passengers had already dismounted, David Haldane and a young man belonging to the village, with the intention of hastening to the help of the inmates of the burning house. The latter informed the captain of what they had seen on the hill above.

Then Captain Oglivie sprang to his feet, and was on the road to the house in a moment, without a word, or a look behind to see who followed. David Haldane had lost a few minutes saying good-night to Dr. Grant and Mrs. Rose, and he was therefore last in the race, though all three kept close behind each other. It was dark and still down there among the trees, but as they ran and neared the house they could hear the peculiar windy rush and roar of fire, and see the glimmer, which burst into a glare as they emerged from the wood and came on in front of the house.

The servants were all out; there were but four of them, an old woman and a young lass, an old man and a boy. They stood in front of the house, half-dressed, their teeth chattering with fear, doing nothing and attempting nothing, looking on fascinated by the serpent flames which darted out of more than one window, and drew themselves in again from the hard granite to find fitter food on the wood-work within.

"Where's your mistress?" cried the captain, dashing on the affrighted little group.

"She was here a' safe a minute syne," said the old woman.

"She's in again," said the boy.

Captain Oglivie was about to follow; rapid and resolute, and perfectly self-possessed, his face yet looked ghastly in its paleness and eagerness in the dismal, distorting light. He showed his white teeth as he spoke, scarcely dividing them to hiss out the words, "Why do you stand there, staring like idiots? Come and help me to get her out again: she must be suffocated there;" and he made for the open door, out of which the smoke was now issuing.

David Haldane and the stranger came up just then, and followed Captain Oglivie into the hall, which, being in the centre of the burning house, while as yet the fire was confined to one of the sides, was still unlighted by the flames, though filled with dense clouds of smoke. It was rapidly becoming impassable, and they were all about to retreat, when a cry from Captain Oglivie caused David Haldane to spring forward.

"Help here!" he cried, himself half stifled. He had stumbled on the body of Margery, prostrate at the foot of the stair, and the two men half dragged, half carried her to the open door, where the others gathered round her still breathing form.

In the fresh air she revived—it seemed almost by force of will, for the first words she uttered were—"The back stair—try the back stair."

"There is another life in danger," said David Haldane; and for the first time Captain Oglivie heard his voice, and looked in his face. At that moment a thrill of repulsion ran through the two men, not to be accounted for by the attitude of either up to that time.

"We can leave her now," added David, quitting his hold and resigning his place to the women. "Captain Oglivie, you know the house; lead the way."

"Perhaps you will go round," said the captain, addressing the stranger, and not deigning to notice David Haldane, "and I will direct you from one of the windows."

It seemed the best thing to do; trying to save the house was altogether out of the question. A few bucketsful of water, drawn slowly from the well, would be mocked at by the now raging flames. They must try, at every point, to save that other life.

They hastened round the burning end of the house, and Captain Oglivie passed on and into the interior by the kitchen entrance. The rush and the roar was increasing every moment. The red glare of the fire was thrown upon the trees, which seemed to reel and dance with its fitfulness, like a crowd of dark and dreadful creatures exulting in destruction and mocking at misery; and up there, at one of the still untouched windows, appeared a human figure, horror of horrors, behind iron bars!

"We can do nothing from without," cried David Haldane, in despair.

It seemed an age was passing, and no Captain Oglivie appeared.

The man and boy had followed them.

"Can you get me an axe," he called out.

The boy ran and brought one from the tool-house close at hand.

"We can drive those stanchions out, and let him down through the window, if we can only get into the room."

Another window burst, crackling into flame: still no Captain Oglivie.

"We shall be too late," cried David. "Let us go in."

"Perhaps he has been choked back," replied the stranger, hesitating.

"Is there a rope to be had?" was the next question; and the boy having answered, "Ay," and gone off for it to the tool-house again, David asked the stranger to take charge of it, and hastened to follow where Captain Oglivie had disappeared.

The back staircase was clear when Captain Oglivie entered, as far, at least, as the first flight. At the top of the second flight a door shut it off, with the rooms belonging to it, from the remainder of the house, but this door and the landing leading to it were on fire already, only an open staircase window kept the downward flight almost free from smoke.

It was therefore not the smoke that had overpowered Captain Oglivie, who was leaning on the lower stair rail like one deadly sick. David Haldane, whose shouts had rung through the house, had seen him issue from the door of a room close at hand.

"This is not the room," said the former, breathlessly. "Where is it?"

"Beyond," replied Captain Oglivie, pointing to a barrier of fire. "It is not possible to reach it."

"Have you tried?" They looked at each other fiercely.

"You are no coward," said David Haldane. "We must try together," and he was half way up the stair as he spoke. But they were saved the trial, for all at once, with a terrible crash, the landing gave way. The fire had eaten away its supports on the other side. David Haldane had only just time to spring back to the place where Captain Oglivie was still standing.

The well of the staircase was now filled with burning material, and the door by which they had entered was blocked. Together they retreated into the room from which the captain had issued, and shut the door. Escape was easy. The window was but one storey from the ground. They were soon standing in safety beneath it. On reaching the ground, David Haldane stumbled on something in the grass which he could see resembled an old-fashioned escritoire; but he did not stop a moment to consider, as he afterwards did, that it had been saved at the sacrifice of a human life, but ran on to the spot where he had left the others. He was hailed with a shout. They had two short ladders, and were lacing them together, in order to reach the window from without.

The ladders were laced at last, and David Haldane mounted with his hatchet, the others giving place to him. With a few ringing blows he drove the old rusty bars out of their wooden frame, and crashed through glass and woodwork. Then out of the window came a dense smoke, which drove him, for a moment, down some rounds of the ladder. At the same moment the dark room shot into a blaze of light, and, on venturing up again and looking in, he saw the form of Sir Alexander Oglivie lying prostrate by the window within his reach. Another breathless moment, and he had entered and dragged him out, and with the help at hand succeeded in lowering him to the ground.

The fire had not touched him. The dense smoke that filled the room from the heart of the burning house had clouded his brain and stolen away his breath, but had left no trace of parting pain upon the still white face: and they bore him gently to a little distance, and laid him down upon the cool dewy grass.

A MINUTE'S DELAY.

TAKE this letter to the post, my son. Make haste, or you will be too late. Don't lose a moment."

While his father was still speaking, the boy hastily put the letter in his pocket, and set off at full speed. The post-office was about half a mile off. Bob ran all the way as far as the New Road, at the further end of which the pillar-post stood. In less than two minutes he could reach it, even if he slackened his pace to a steady walk. He pulled out his watch, and found it wanted nearly three minutes to the time when the letter-box would be closed, or rather emptied of its contents. He thought he should just have time to stop a minute to speak with his playmate Jem Hall, whom he saw running across the road to meet him. In their eagerness for a little chat the boys ran up against each other, and almost pushed down a little child who was passing near.

"I say, Bob," Jem began, in breathless haste, "I was afraid I should miss you, you were going up the street at such a rate."

"Well, Jem, it's true, I'm in a great hurry; I've got a letter to post before four, and it only wants about three minutes to the hour."

"Oh, I see," said Jim; "I shan't keep you a minute. I only want just to show you this jolly pair of new skates; my Uncle Fred sent me them yesterday."

Bob took them in his hands to look at them closely, and he so much admired them that he said, "I only wish the pair I have got was half as good as yours. They are real stunners! But never mind, I can skate well enough with my old ones."

"That's right," said Jim; "we are both satisfied then. Now, all I want of you, old fellow, is just to promise to meet me this evening, about seven o'clock, at the miller's duck-pond. It will be quite moonlight, and we shall have some capital fun."

"But are you sure the ice will bear?" said Bob, doubtfully.

"Sure it will bear! of course I am. I was on it this morning before breakfast, and where it was broken near the edge for the ducks, I saw some big blocks of ice, not less than three inches thick."

"That will do then—I'll come if I can; but I must be off now," said Bob, pulling out his watch, and seeing that it wanted less than two minutes to four.

Jim went home with his skates, and Bob ran off with the letter, which he took out of his pocket and carried in his hand, ready to pop it into the box. As he was hastening along the middle of the road, he stumbled over a large stone which was lying in his path, and fell down. He hurt one of his knees severely, and after he had raised himself with difficulty from the ground, he was obliged to creep along at a snail's pace. At last he reached the pillar; but, half a minute before he could do so, the mail cart had carried all the letters away, and had got almost out of sight, though he could still hear its wheels rattling over the stones some distance away.

Bob put the letter in the box, and felt much vexed that it was too late to go that night. He was afraid of meeting his father, lest he should be asked about the letter, and be blamed for his disobedience. But when Bob went home, he was glad to find that his father had gone out, and was not expected back till very late.

After tea he took his skates with him to meet Jem; but his leg being still rather stiff through his fall, and his spirits down about the letter, he did not enjoy the skating.

Three days later, when Bob was at breakfast, a postman's knock was heard at the door, and presently three letters were brought in, and handed to his father. One of them was a returned letter. This was opened first in great haste. It was the too late letter which Bob had posted the other evening. His father dropped the letter down on the table before Bob, and with a look of anguish said to him, "How is this?"

Bob turned red and white by turns. He knew not what to say. His father understood his silence and confusion, and said, "Oh! what mischief you have done, by neglecting to put that letter in the post in time. I shall be a loser of more than fifty pounds by it. But that is not all. I expect to hear to-morrow of far worse consequences to another."

"Oh, papa!" cried Bob, "I am so sorry! I was only a minute behind time. I ran all the way, and fell down when within a hundred yards of the pillar. I hurt myself so much that I could scarcely crawl along, or I should have managed to be in time."

"But," his father replied; "if what you say is true, why did you not tell me the next morning about it. If you had done that, less trouble and loss might possibly have happened than must now take place."

"I was afraid to tell you," answered Bob; "because I knew you would be very angry with me for being too late."

"Certainly not, if you have not disobeyed me, and stopped on the road, which I am afraid you must really have done."

Bob looked still more confused. "Oh, papa," he cried, covering his hot, red face with his hands; "the truth must out, and you have already guessed it. I stayed just a minute, which I thought I could well spare, to speak with Jem Hall about his new skates; and then, to make up for the delay, I ran along the middle of the road in such violent haste, that I struck my foot against a big stone, and fell down, as I told you before."

"You have been a very bad boy indeed, and deserve to be well punished for your disobedience; and punishment enough will come upon you. You will suffer by my loss; but more than that, you will have yourself to blame for it all."

Next day a letter came from the same person to whom the returned letter had been addressed. It was dated from Liverpool. In it the writer stated as follows:—

"Not finding any letter at the Scarborough post-office on the day when it was due, I was obliged to leave word there that should it come the next day, it must be returned to the sender as too late. Whether it came then, of course, is now known to you, as in that case you must have got it back by this time. I hardly need tell you that I am ruined by this cruel disappointment and delay. The bill was dishonoured through default of the cheque for ten pounds which you were to send me. I had all the rest; but what was the use of it? I could not meet the payment of £100 with only ninety. My character is gone as one sad consequence; and another is, that I have lost an employment worth £200 a-year. Your own loss, as surety, will be £50, and I am very sorry for it; but what is that to mine?—mine is, I fear, quite irreparable. As I shall be on my way to America when you receive this, I must wait long enough for an explanation of the cause of my bitter disappointment and grievous loss."

Bob's father was thrown into the deepest distress by this painful letter. It was not his own loss—though he could ill bear that—but the suffering of his poor friend, which he felt so much concerned for. That was overwhelming. With some difficulty he raised the money, which he was called upon to pay immediately as one of his friend's sureties; and Bob suffered the consequence of his father's loss in a double manner, as his father told him he must: he forfeited the beautiful gold watch-chain his father had promised to buy him as a new year's gift; and what was far worse, he for a long time lost his father's confidence. Bob now saw what immense mischief a minute's delay had done; and bitterly he reproached himself for not obeying his father's injunction, "Don't lose a moment."

HARROW SCHOOL CHAPEL.

BY SIDNEY DARYL.

THERE is a bon mot recorded of the Merry Monarch to the intent that, on one occasion, when his royal patience and temper had both been severely taxed, by the inordinate length to which a discussion as to the relative claims of religious sects to the title of the visible church had been pursued in his presence, he suddenly put an end to the controversy by declaring "that the visible church was the parish church of Harrow, for that could be seen anywhere." And true enough; the ancient, weatherbeaten house of God, with its lofty spire, that some ill-omened croakers declare will come down one day with a mighty crash, stands on a gloriously elevated position, where it is visible for miles and miles around, and whence one of the most varied and extensive views of English rural scenery may be obtained. It is hardly possible to conceive a more lovely spot than the old churchyard, by which it is surrounded, where may be found the famous tomb on which the author of "Childe Harold" used to recline, dreaming away the summer afternoons, when he was a boy at the old school hard by. Thus he sings of it in after-years—

"Again I behold where for hours I have pondered,
As reclining at eve on yon tombstone I lay;
Or round the steep brow of the churchyard I wandered,
To catch the last glimpse of the sun's setting ray."

The place of which he speaks was just such a one as a poet would delight in, with a natural panorama of meadow, wood, and water, stretching away as far as sight can reach. But the stone upon which Byron reclined, revelling in day-dreams, with the music of his genius floating in his brain, and thoughts and words jangling already in silent melody, presently to burst forth and entrance thousands, exists not as he knew it. Little by little, piece by piece, it has disappeared, carried off in tiny morsels by those eager searchers for interesting specimens, who cannot resist chipping and pilfering wherever they go, and by whose polite and assiduous attentions many of our most cherished relics are disfigured and defaced. Certainly the fancies of some people to possess particular things are unaccountable. Who could have believed it possible that the rope with which William Palmer, the Rugeley poisoner, was hanged should sell at five shillings an inch, and yet leave many disappointed to find that the quantity of twisted hemp necessary to take a man's life was far from being sufficient to satisfy all those whose morbid cravings to secure so ghastly a curiosity made even the executioner for the nonce a tradesman to be bartered with? It is a wonder that the bones of William Peachey, which are deposited within "Byron's tomb," have not risen up in indignation and vengeance at the insults and ill-usage to which their stony coverlid has been subjected, or cried aloud to barbarian aggressors to hold their destroying fingers. However, it is no use grumbling now; the mischief is done, and cannot be repaired. But stay, here I am wrong; it has been repaired—with Portland cement, and the couch the poet improvised for himself in days gone by has had to be patched up with stucco. Rather prosaic this, though Robert Buchanan has gathered inspiration even in the bricks and mortar of our great Babylon, and could, I believe, if necessary, find poetry in an omnibus.

Byron, so it is said, was not a particularly popular boy. When he was at school at Harrow he does not appear to have possessed that contented mind which is a continual feast; but, like many other geniuses, he was restless and unsettled in disposition, and could not bear the restraints that were of necessity imposed upon him. Dr. Drury, who was then head-master, was particularly disliked by him, nor was he slow to evince his feeling in regard to him; but in after-years he grew wiser, and regretted the impetuous expressions of his boyhood, as not a few less intellectual people than he have done, before and since his time. The short poem, from which I have quoted a verse, was written on an occasion when he re-visited the scenes of his youth, and renewed his acquaintance with the favourite resorts of his schoolboy days. It is difficult to understand what he means by talking about the "streams where we swam," as I am unaware of any river within convenient proximity, unless it be the Grand Junction Canal, and it requires a great deal of allowance to be made for poetic licence, to conceive it possible that it was that stagnant road of water to which he referred. In some respects it has been one of the chief drawbacks to Harrow that it is not provided with a river; but the boys manage to get on very well with the artificial swimming-bath that has been provided for them, which is christened in the school vocabulary and familiarly known as "Duck-pond." Besides, it is just whispered that the reason all, or most, Harrovians are such capital cricketers is, because there is no boating or rowing to act as a counter-attraction to the bat and ball, or, as at Eton, to split up the youthful republic into "dry" and "wet bobs." Certain it is, that all lads who have passed, or are passing, through their educational course at the old grammar-school, founded and endowed in 1590 by John Lyon, must, whether they like it or not, learn something, however little that may be, of the noble game, as lovers of cricket delight to term it. For by the school code—which, like the Common Law of England, though unwritten, is equally binding—every boy has to pass through a period of probation, during which he is compelled to take part in a certain amount of cricket and football; and if found absenting himself on occasions when he is ordered to be present, the monitors, who regulate all such matters, visit him with condign punishment.

On a fine summer evening, when practice is going on down on the cricket-field, a passer-by will find himself much amused by watching the proceedings, and noticing the way in which the various fags perform the task imposed upon them. Some are lively and active, and seem to enjoy their work, which, like sensible fellows, they think it best to make light of; others look melancholy and wretched, slouching idly along after the ball, as if they felt themselves miserable victims to a cruel destiny in the shape of the captain of the Eleven, who has to see that the cricket fagging is properly carried out, and to administer physical correction to those who attempt to shirk it. I promise you he does not spare his hand, and quite right too; if boys have not the sense to accede to the regulations which have existed for so many years with universal approval, they deserve all they get. Cricket and football fagging were ordained for the purpose of forcing idlers and loungers to stir themselves to take exercise, without which they can neither hope to preserve the mens sana nor the corpus sanum.

I have not graduated in medicine, nor am I experienced in anatomy, but I am possessed with an unalterable belief that the human constitution, unless physically weak or sickly, demands a very large amount of walking, and such-like exertion, to keep it in order—a fact which does not appear to be very generally appreciated. Artificial means of locomotion have been so much adopted by all classes of late, that it is not very wild to speculate as to the ultimate possibility, nay, probability, of the legs becoming superfluous appendages. Football takes the place of cricket during the winter term at Harrow, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, the half-holidays, the street of the village—I beg pardon, town; for, like all suburban localities, it grows in size and bricks and mortar daily—is crowded by boys of all ages, in shirts and caps of all colours, representing the houses of the various masters to which they belong. Here and there one may be seen with a fez on his head, and a long tassel attached to it, by which we know that the owner thereof has the honour of belonging to his house football eleven, a distinction which in some of the larger establishments is highly prized. This general turning-out occurs about two o'clock, soon after the names have been called over, and then all find their way down to the big field, which is situated on the road to "Duck-pond," and just at the bottom of the hill. A little before four, "clang, clang," goes the bell on the top of the old schoolhouse, and soon the coloured shirts and caps reappear, accompanied by red faces, muddy boots, and not unfrequently equally grimy trousers. Then there is such a hurrying and scurrying to get clean, and into respectable and fitting costume to appear before the master and answer to your name, and such a rush to get into your place in the old fourth-form room, where that ceremony is performed.

I can heartily recommend a trip to Harrow, if only to see this curious old place, with its walls of oak panelling deeply cut into and embellished with the names of boys, who afterwards became famous in the history of their country. The youthful hands that carved them, slowly and by stealth—for I believe it was as much contra leges in old times to perform such operations with the pen-knife, as it is now—were, hereafter, some of them, to wield the sword to the glory and honour of old England in far-distant lands, while others were to preside over the pen, with which her destinies are guided and directed at home. Little did those lads, scratching their names in characters larger in size than regular or elegant in shape, think that presently the wooden panel they had defaced would become an interesting memorial of their connection with the old school, and be preserved with tender care and veneration long after they had passed away. So thoroughly covered are the walls with these strange autographs, that of late years those boys who have wished that some record should remain behind them of their Harrow days, secure the services of one of the school officials, who bears the title of "custos," and he, for consideration, cuts their name and year of entrance upon certain boards, which are placed round the fourth-form room for that purpose. This is, of course, a very business-like proceeding, and destroys all those interesting associations which were originated in the old days.

The school chapel is a charming little place, perfect in form and detail, both without and within, and admirably suited to the purpose for which it is intended. It is quite a modern building, and no doubt, in an architectural point of view, contrasts unfavourably with Eton College Chapel. I hardly think, though, that the two should be compared one with the other, as the style of both is so utterly and entirely different. Outwardly the Harrow School Chapel is an unpretentious and, I might almost add, plain structure, but its interior only has to be seen to be appreciated for the exquisite taste with which it is ordered, and the lightness and elegance of its framework. Go there some Sunday evening in the summer time, when there is service, and I promise you a scene that will remain indelibly impressed upon your memory as one of the pleasantest you have ever witnessed. Some five hundred lads, well bred and born, many with the best and proudest blood in their veins, are kneeling, and sending up their petitions to Him who, be it man or schoolboy that beseeches, watches over the destinies of all, and to whose dwelling-place their youthful prayers, floating upward through the lofty roof out into the mellow evening's glow, ascend as in a cloud of vapour. "When two or three are gathered together in thy name, thou wilt grant their requests." Such is the promise of the Omnipotent, who alters not his word, nor departeth from his promises; and as each young heart turns to him and begs for pardon and forgiveness for the past, and for guidance in the future, the gloom and darkness depart, and a soft and gentle feeling of peace and hope supervenes. See there that fine tall lad, who now steps out from one of the front seats and walks up to the reading-stand. He is one of the monitors, whose turn it is to read the first lesson for the day. When the end of the term comes, he will have done with Harrow; and even now his voice falters a little as he remembers that this is the last time he will perform his present duty in the dear old chapel, with every inch of which he has become familiar. Far behind are the seats on which he sat when he was a new boy, and in the lowest form, where to construe Cæsar was a matter of no mean difficulty, and the chief object of life was to do as little work and get as much play as possible. They are as landmarks in his existence, to which he can never travel back, but which cannot fail to awaken many and mixed reflections, even when the journey of his life is well-nigh accomplished, and the time for rest is coming. As each quarter has found him taking a fresh seat in chapel, to mark his upward progress in the school, so has he learned to appreciate his responsibilities; and now, when he has reached his present position, and a few days more will terminate his Harrow life, behind the tear of regret that rises to his eye there is an awakening to the fact that the past has been but child's play after all, and that the serious realities of life are only now beginning. No wonder that by-and-by he will speak with enthusiasm of his school days, and love to recall them to mind, for they are pleasant places in the road over the desert—green spots in life's wilderness that are refreshing and lovely to think of and remember.

There is not much room in the school chapel at Harrow for visitors, nearly the whole being required to accommodate the masters and the boys. There is a small space set apart for the masters' wives, and they occasionally introduce friends, but the chief portion of the auditory is, as I have said, composed of the school and those closely connected with it. One side of the chapel is dedicated to the memory of old Harrovians who, for Queen and country, perished during the Crimean war. And a long list is there of heroic names, engraved upon small brass memorial plates, that are fixed round the aisle immediately beneath the painted windows, and are read over and over again, Sunday after Sunday, till they become as familiar as those of the living, breathing comrades around. How short a space since they too were merry, light-hearted boys, roaming about the village in shell-jackets and straw hats, canvassing the chances of the Eleven against Eton at Lords, and wasting their substance at the "tuck-shop;" and now they are sleeping the sleep that knows no waking, in the English graveyard on Cathcart's Hill, in a stranger land, with none but strangers to watch over the sanctuary, and see that it is preserved from injury or insult; for they are in the midst of their old enemies, with the turf of the foe resting on them. But I must have done, though not without adding that many a day may be less enjoyably spent than one occupied in a pilgrimage to Harrow, to inspect the school and its belongings, where Robert Peel and John Temple (afterwards Viscount Palmerston, the dear old idol of the English nation) spent their boyhood. Besides these, hundreds of great and good names are to be found on the past lists of John Lyon's school.

MEMORIES.

WAVES of trouble, ever breaking
O'er the Christian's shingly way;
Winds of sorrow, ever shaking
Hope's best blossoms from life's spray;
Sands of memory, ever shining
In the moonlight of the soul;
Flowers of fancy, ever twining
Round some far Elysian goal;
Dawn of promise, ever peering
Through the night-wrack of despair;
Imps of pride, for ever rearing
Babel schemes in folly's air;

Bows of malice, ever winging
To and fro pain's venom'd dart;
Hooks of self-love, ever clinging
In the seaweeds of the heart;
Stars of genius, ever fighting
'Gainst the Siseras of caprice;
Sword of faction, ever smiting
Hearts of love and homes of peace;
Skiff of evil, ever mooring
In the vacant spirit's bay;
Pipe of pleasure, ever luring
To the world's deceitful play;

Dove of comfort, ever skimming
O'er the lake of human pain ;

Cup of trial, ever brimming
With the beads of future gain ;

Stones of anguish, ever hiding
In the ruts of sin's morass ;

Dupe of passion, ever sliding
Down destruction's mountain pass ;

Light of beauty, ever waning
Ere its fulness be reveal'd ;

Lap of patience, ever gleaming
Ears of joy in duty's field ;

Eaves of mercy, ever dripping
With the dews of sympathy ;

Cliffs of time, for ever slipping
Into the eternal sea ;

Storm of tumult, ever rushing
Through the unregenerate breast ;

Lull of surance, ever hushing
Lowly spirits to their rest ;

Beams of glory, ever gilding
Adoration's halcyon face ;

Arm of faith, though ever yielding,
Yet that conquers all through grace—

If, amid the bliss of heaven,
Memories of what they were
Shall to Christ's redeemed be given,
May there not be treasured there
Scenes from earth, by angel finger,
Pictured round the throne of God,
Where, in thought, the saint may linger
O'er the paths the sinner trod ?
May not, then, his hallow'd gazing
Rove o'er kindred scenes with these,
Blent the while his grateful praising
With the seraph minstrelsies ? S. A. H.

RELIGION IN THE HOME.—No. 1.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

THE house in which a family dwells is usually designated "home;" but it implies more than mere place of residence. They may live in a house for years without ever feeling it to be their home. Emigrants, who fix their permanent abode in a foreign land, all turn their eyes with fond endearment to their dwelling in the old country, and always talk of that as their home. Home is the dwelling of our childhood, the scene of early pleasures and prospects, endeared to the memory by years of happy associations, chastened by early sorrows, and enriched by teaching and discipline which mould the character and prepare for the duties and developments of both worlds.

"Home is the resort
Of love, of joy, of peace and plenty ; where,
Supporting and supported, polished friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss."

Whatever may be thought of the fond conceit of the divine right of kings, few will question the divine constitution of families. Some wild theorists have dreamed that they could improve upon it, and that the social organisation would be relieved of its selfish tendencies if family barriers were thrown down, and society resolved itself into one heterogeneous community where the relationships of parent and children are unknown. Such revolting schemers, tolerated in no community, are barely permitted to make the perilous experiment in the woods of Central America.

Home life is invested with all the sacredness of a primary law in God's government of the world. The marriage union, "instituted by God in the time of man's innocency," is the centre from which other relationships radiate, circumscribed by the circle of domestic life. Beyond that circle is the outer world, with its temptations, conflicts, perils ; within it lies the scene of home life, its duties, endearments, blessings.

It is essential to social progress. Society instinctively, and without direction of any kind, assumes this form. Everywhere, and in all ages, mankind settle themselves into separate homes. All history, sacred or secular,—all the discoveries of social life, whether in the ruins of Pompeii or the notices of modern travellers, add fresh testimony to the universal prevalence of homes. In fact, society can hardly exist, much less prosper, without them. One element that has made the condition of slavery destructive to social progress is, that it annihilates domestic relationships. Slavery recognises no marriage vows, and, without a look of compassion, tears parents from their children, and children from each other. It disintegrates the elements of social life. And other modes of life too, military or monastic, that infringe the home constitution, engender so many evils, that no such community ever becomes permanently prosperous or happy. It was a profound saying of Bonaparte's, when adverting to the secret causes of national disorder, "France wants homes;" and wherever the evils of social disorder abound, the secret spring will invariably be found in neglected homes, and the palpable violations of the duties and affections which form the happiness of home.

Homes, like other earthly things, are subject to change. Our Anglo-Saxon forefathers, in their plastered timber dwellings, where families and servants were seated at the same table, present but a rough specimen of homes; and though the Normans curtailed their excesses, and introduced more abstemious habits, yet, under the eye of proud feudal barons, the comforts of domestic life but slowly advanced. The homes and habits of England were manifestly improved in the stirring times of the Plantagenets. Their dresses became costly and decorative; tables were spread with luxuries, and a taste for the elegancies of life began to be cultivated. Home comforts multiplied still more during the times of the Tudors. Bishop Latimer speaks of his father, a yeoman, having a farm of £3 or £4 a-year, of which he tilled enough to keep half-a-dozen men, with pasture for 100 sheep and thirty cows. He kept his son at school till he sent him to the university; gave to each of his daughters a marriage portion of £5; lived on terms of hospitality with his neighbours, and gave alms to the poor—all betokening great progress in the comforts and duties of home. From the Reformation till now, the domestic character of the English people has been progressively developed and refined; nor can any well-wisher of his country render greater service than by detecting and removing evils which weaken home attachments, by cherishing home duties and promoting home comforts.

The education of the people is become one of the foremost questions of the day; men of all characters are anxiously turning their thoughts to devise the best method of school management and support. But, whatever may be settled, be it remembered, schools are not homes, and schools never can do the work of homes. Schools impart knowledge, but character is formed at home. Schools, where the learning is sound and religious, are an invaluable blessing to a people, but influences are lacking in school life which can only be supplied at home. It is an immense relief to parents, and lightens their every-day burden, to entrust their children to the educational care of able and conscientious teachers; but teachers and scholars know quite well that school is not home. Many teachers strive diligently to make it like home, and often with much success; but, after all, the maxim is true in many senses, "There is no place like home." It may be imitated in the free and cordial tone of intercourse, in the duties of oversight as diligent as that by the parents themselves, and in the sacred observance of religious exercises; but compare the aspect and spirit of the school-room just before the Christmas holidays, with that on the scholars' return, when the holidays are over, and it is intelligible enough that home has attractive endearments, exceedingly strong in the formation of character, which are missed among the educational advantages and companionships of schools.

Perhaps our noble institutions for orphan children bear the nearest resemblance to home. It is impossible to over-estimate these monuments of public benevolence, where the "pains of death" are in some measure mitigated, and the precious treasures of broken homes are carefully housed again. There, children wrecked in the great and sudden storms of life, and left, as one often fears, to float awhile in peril among its rough waves, find a home where nothing is wanting which a gentle heart and open-handed liberality can supply. But the main elements of home are wanting even here. It is a home without parents. Filial endearments lack their proper objects. All the fond affections which cluster round the honoured name of father have nothing to sustain them, and droop, like unsupported tendrils, on the ground.

Home is the appropriate sphere for woman. Her strongest energies of mind and heart find full scope in her administration of that loved community. Entrusted with treasures of untold value, and interests that stretch throughout two worlds, she feels herself invested with responsibilities which every day require loving counsel and sympathy, aided by direction and wisdom from above. Many a mother, seen and known only among the unobtrusive duties of domestic life, shows that she commands an amount of inventive sagacity, of administrative wisdom, and adaptation of means, which equals and often surpasses the boasted achievements of public life; and noble-minded men who have risen to eminent distinction, are not slow to acknowledge their obligation to the wisdom and discipline which reigned over their earlier life at home. Few could pen an epitaph to equal the immortal lines with which Cowper welcomed his mother's picture; but many, when surrounded with the duties and honours of successful labour, recollect, as vividly as he did, how much they owe to the wise counsels and gentle diligence with which their mothers bent their wayward wills, and with judicious care lopped off their too luxuriant desires—

"All this still legible in mem'ry's page,
And still to be so till my latest age,
Adds joy to duty, makes me glad to pay
Such honour to thee as my numbers may;
Perhaps a frail memorial, but sincere,
Not scorned in heav'n, though little heeded here."

Home relationships and duties occupy a central position in the Divine Decalogue itself. Preceded by the Four Commandments of the First Table, which enjoin our duty to God, and followed by the Five Commandments of the Second Table, which prescribe the duties which we owe to the person, property, and reputation of our neighbour, the Fifth Commandment stands significantly in the centre. To believe in God, to fear, love, worship, and honour him, commanded in the First Table of the Law, is the great foundation of our safety, welfare, and happiness; but the streams of home virtue and social comfort flow from their spring-head in the Fifth Commandment. Human legislation touches these duties with a trembling hand, wisely reckoning that such responsibilities are too delicate and sacred to be invaded by civil enactments; but the evils of neglected homes extend beyond the limits of the dwelling. Children trained to nothing will soon apprentice themselves to crime. A child who was never taught obedience to the Fifth Commandment is very likely to violate, without a scruple, the five others which follow it; and then the law must step in to arrest his criminal career. If parents neglect their children, and children grow up in rebellion against their parents, such ungoverned households soon become lawless and ungovernable, prey upon the interests of others, and demand the costly interference of civil power. A blow is struck at the root of these expensive evils by every movement which promotes home discipline, and practically recognises home virtues to be essential elements in national prosperity.

And this is now beginning to be felt, but not too soon. All schemes for popular education,—for bringing the ordinances of religion to bear upon the working classes, or abating their acknowledged disadvantages, must end in disappointment, unless facilities be liberally afforded for increasing home accommodation and multiplying its real comforts. We are naturally the most home-loving people in the world. Let everything be removed that checks the growth and expansion of this inherent virtue. Nothing is more engaging—ay, and ennobling too—than to see a working man stretching out his brawny arms to carry his little children home when his day's work is over,—spending his evenings among them,—listening to their tales and school lessons, equally joyous for them to repeat and him to hear; and then to see them on Sunday seated by his side in the house of God; and if to this be added something like Burns's scene of household worship in his immortal "Cottar's Saturday Night," with its inimitable devoutness, its Bible reading, its simple worship, and patriarchal blessing, so much the better, a thousand times over; but, alas! it is to be feared that we are approximating but slowly towards this standard of home prosperity. Our streets of demolished dwelling, not yet compensated by an equivalent amount of new building elsewhere—consequently, our overcrowded population in which fevers flourish luxuriantly, but modesty wastes away,—our increasing rents with reducing accommodation,—our glittering enticements and deteriorating moralities—such things operate as a great discouragement upon efforts to multiply the solid comforts of home, and recover the brightness of its virtues.

No doubt the question of the homes of the people is beset with difficulties palpable enough to every one at all conversant with every-day life. Still, in other things, difficulties are not allowed to supersede duties, but stimulate to their resolute fulfilment. These home duties lie embedded as veins of virgin gold seldom explored, and still less worked, in the deep mine of the Fifth Commandment. If its golden counsels were valued and largely circulated, many of the current maxims of every-day life would be condemned as base coin, and by-and-by rejected altogether. Uncomfortable homes make the heart of the people sick. Anything that tends to make home so attractive as to supply recreation as well as comfort, affording relief from care and toil by its unfailing endearments, and ministering bright hopes for time to come, is an axe laid at the root of a thousand evils. If you can gain such confidence in the old proverb that "Home is home, be it never 'so homely,'" that any one will resolve to make the experiment for himself, you have taken a step in the right direction to "save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins."

As we pass through the streets the reflection must often occur, How different the condition of these various homes! Some are the dwellings of the poor, others the abodes of wealth and splendour; while many are evidently the "modest mansions," where neither riches tempt to luxury, nor poverty borders on want. Yet, could we glance inside to mark the spirit that prevails in these various homes, we should discover still greater diversities. Some would be found "like a little heaven below," pervaded by the atmosphere of contentment and holy love; others the prey of restless murmuring and corroding care; some closed in sorrow, and bearing the well-known marks of "the house of mourning;" others glittering in ostentatious vanity; some knit together in the bonds of holy endearment, "considering one another, to provoke to love and good works;" others distracted by conflicting interests, and alienated by mutual unkindness or studied neglect; in some, honest industry is struggling with straitness and want; in others, reckless folly, maddened by intemperance and domestic profligacy, opens the door to every form of wretchedness and ruin.

Such is the variety of home life almost at our doors. To furnish some practical counsels for management, and fix a warning light upon some of the rocks that make sailing difficult,—to whisper some hints that may be useful to beginners, or to sound an alarm to such as may, perhaps, unconsciously be drifting among dangerous currents,—to repeat some wholesome instructions, well-known once but now almost forgotten, and encourage the conscientious striver after a better standard of home duty and home happiness—this will be the purpose of a few papers which from time to time may appear in the pages of THE QUIVER.

THE ECHO OF THE EAGLE'S NEST, KILLARNEY.

NOT a breath of sound parts the air around,
As we lie 'neath the eagle's nest;
And the bird of Jove
On its rock above,
Unwatchful, takes its rest.

With features hid, with drooping lid,
We wait for the signal note;
Our hearts out of time,
Beat a hurried chime,
As we crouch in our silent boat.

Full, loud, and clear, from the copsewood near,
Rings out the expected call;
Our hearts stand still
With a sudden thrill;
E'en a leaf might be heard to fall.

Like a sunbeam at play, or the ocean's spray
Darting upward, it lightly rebounds;
And the spirits of air,
From their shadowy lair,
Re-echo the magical sounds.

Now far and now near—now there and now here,
Rushing madly from cavern to crag;
The eagle on high
It awakes with a cry,
And startles the timorous stag.

Waxing fainter, it dies: then with glistening eyes
We turn to the glorified sky,
To whose holy retreat,
With its shadowy feet,
It has passed with a whispering sigh.

In this brief space of time we have noticed a chime
Rung out from celestial choirs;
Where the angels above,
To sublime hymns of love,
Ever sweep o'er their heaven-strung lyres.

One star now appears, as the night grows and nears,
And thought takes the aspect of prayer;
As the dark bird of Jove,
From its eyrie above,
Floats forth on the ocean of air.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIX.

REMORSE—NOT REPENTANCE.

WHEN they laid the body of Sir Alexander Oglivie down upon the grass, it was Margery who raised the head and rested it on her lap, to see if it was even yet possible to restore the life that had fled. She herself had been rescued so rapidly from her perilous position, having only fallen insensible the moment before she was picked up at the foot of the stairs, that every breath of fresh air, as she came to herself, revived her strength and courage. She was fully dressed, for the reason that she had not yet gone to bed when the fire broke out; and she was very soon on her feet again, a spectator of David Haldane's unsuccessful attempt to rescue her brother. At the time, she did not notice that Captain Oglivie was absent when that attempt was made. She seemed conscious of the presence of no one there, so intensely were all her faculties occupied with the action of the moment. Not a cry, not a murmur, did she utter throughout the whole.

Now, by the light of the burning house, she and those around her could see that every effort was vain. Still, she made no outcry for the dead, no womanly lamentation escaped her lips; but she crouched on the ground supporting his head in silence, till the little crowd about her fell back a few paces, and stood uncovered in mute respect.

Then a vehicle was heard driving up rapidly, out of which the indefatigable little doctor of Burnside and Strathie leapt, and came running toward the group, with a volley of breathless exclamations. "This is dreadful—dreadful! Not dead!—not dead, I trust!"

This last was uttered as he knelt down by Margery's side; but a grave silence succeeded. It did not need his solemn whisper to tell that all was over.

The fire had roused the village, and the village had taken upon itself to rouse both pastor and doctor—the two who were ever ready to help in time of trouble. Mr. Keith advanced more slowly, and spoke a few words to his friend and parishioner, concerning submission to the Divine will; and she laid down her burden gently on the earth, and rose, and gave him her hand in silence.

Captain Oglivie then came forward, and he joined in the entreaties of her two friends, that Margery should allow herself to be driven from the scene of the disaster; but she would not stir: and, by her glance at the form on the ground beside them, they saw that she wished to stay till it could be moved; and, seeing how calm she was, they acquiesced without opposition.

At the same time, David Haldane advanced, and whispered to the doctor, "I can be of no more use here, I suppose, so I had better go."

"You here!" exclaimed the kind-hearted, impulsive man; "what a pity you did not come a little sooner! You saved him from the water once; you might have saved him from the fire."

Their little "aside" passed unheeded, except by Captain Oglivie, who had listened intently to every word; while, without speaking to any one else, David Haldane had stolen away.

Then the active little man attacked the captain. "What have you been doing, my dear sir? Over-exertion, eh? You look wretched—wretched! never saw a man more shaken in my life," he said, turning to Margery.

But at this Captain Oglivie rallied, and offered to go and prepare his mother, who, he said, would be in a state of great alarm at his continued absence, for Margery's reception.

As for her, she was the last to leave the scene of devastation. A light cart had been procured, and had taken the servants down to the village for rest and refreshment, so their mistress had ordered, and only the boy had refused obedience: and for the dead, a door had been taken off its hinges, and four stout men of Burnside had volunteered to carry him through the forest and up the hill-side to Delaube.

The fire was still burning, though with a dull, half-dying glare, when the little procession started. The bearers went first, the body decently covered with a snowy sheet, brought from the store treasured by some village home-wife for the occasion of her own or her guidman's laying-out. Margery followed slowly, with Mr. Keith and the doctor, in the gig. The light of the early dawn was breaking through the eastern clouds, and the wood was alive with the twittering calls of the awakening birds, as they passed along.

As they ascended the little hill the shadows of the night were melting rapidly away, and at length a glorious sun burst over the horizon, and bathed their faces in morning light, which fell dazzlingly on the white drapery of the dead man.

Captain Oglivie was at the gate to meet them. He staggered about like a drunken man, and another man would have been in the condition of such, who had drunk as much brandy as he. But again he rallied, directed the bearers to a room already prepared to receive the body, and took Margery to his mother, who was waiting for her in a state of feeble distress. The doctor laid injunctions on all three to seek repose, and after refreshing themselves slightly, they separated to their several rooms, and obeyed him as far as it was in their several powers.

The morning was far advanced when they met again, Mrs. Oglivie complaining of a dreadful headache, Captain Oglivie evidently suffering, but not complaining, and, strangely enough, Margery doing neither. The heavy years that had rolled over her had tempered both body and spirit. To the fire of suffering she presented a front of steel. The calamity had not broken, and it could not bend her. The death of her gentle sister had unnerved her far more than this. The shock seemed almost to have strengthened her.

Captain Oglivie would have taken the funeral arrangements into his own hands. He seemed to think that the sooner they were over the better. But Margery would not allow him to manage for her, and rejected with displeasure the advice to hasten the obsequies. So long as she was there to watch over all that remained of Sir Alexander Oglivie, so long should every honour be paid to the full. So six days were to elapse before the funeral, when the poor body was to be laid among the dust of generations of kindred, in the burial-vault of the Oglivies.

Six days, and during all that time Captain Oglivie must live under the same roof with it—with him whom he had detested living, and in whose presence, dead, he sickened with an unutterable dismay. He dared not go away from the house; such a step at such a time would be inexplicable, and would damage him most with the person with whom he desired to stand best. He could not forget—not for a single moment did the object he dreaded remain absent from his thoughts. He sat down to his meals, and there it was before him, borne in and laid upon the table, a formless phantom under the white drapery, just as it lay in the next room, and he could not touch a morsel. His mother lamented over him, and drew attention to his wan looks and bloodshot eyes, and he flashed up at her with fierce impatience. He left the house in the morning, and again in the afternoon, and each time when he returned it seemed more horrible to have to enter and abide there. Why should he be forced to do this? What had he done that he should be so tormented? His will rebelled against his conscience. In a more subtle form he repeated the defence of Cain, "Was I this man's keeper? Ought I to have risked my life to save such a life as his?" He tried by an effort of will to rid himself of thought altogether; but the more he tried the more persistently the one thought presented itself, and always with some added horror. He enacted again the whole of that night's work, with certain ghastly additions, the work of his imagination. The poet speaks of "that inner eye, which is the bliss of solitude;" its bliss, but its torture too; when there flash upon it, not the fair pictures of innocence, but the fiery visions of remorse. Captain Oglivie ground his teeth as he muttered to himself, "I shall go mad if this goes on."

The afternoon had been a sultry one, and had its influence in predisposing both Margery and Mrs. Oglivie to retire to rest earlier than usual. The candles were not lighted at all that evening, and they left Captain Oglivie pacing up and down the garden terrace smoking. As the sky darkened, the sheet-lightning began to play over the sky in broad flashes. He was thinking that as there was hardly two hours of what could be called darkness, he would pass them out there, pacing to and fro till he was thoroughly tired out; for, in spite of his never having closed his eyes on the preceding night, sleep seemed as far off as ever. And yet he was terribly worn, with that weariness which produces restlessness, along with the vain desire to rest. But as the darkness increased, so also did the broad glare of the lightning, till it became intolerable to him to watch it coming and going, like a great eye of light opening and shutting on the scene. At last, through a mass of cloud, there broke a jagged stream of fire, and the next moment the thunder was rolling over the hill, as if the bolt had been hurled at his head.

Still he paced up and down. It seemed as if the madness he foreboded had come upon him already, for he heeded not the torrents of rain that in a few minutes drenched him to the skin. At length, as if mechanically, he went indoors. Flash after flash illumined the walls of his room. There was no escape from its awful illumination. He tried to shut it out, but it played upon his hands and face, and paralysed him in the act. His senses reeled at last, and he fell with a crash to the floor.

His fall had, happily, roused both his mother and Margery, already awakened by the thunder, to the sense that something was wrong, and they were soon in his room, where they found him as he had fallen, dripping and insensible, upon the floor.

Another sleepless night awaited the two women, and when morning came, and the doctor with it, Horace Oglivie was in the first stage of a brain fever.

CHAPTER L.

PARIS, 1830.

It was the morning of Monday, the 26th of July, 1830. The weather was superb, even for Paris, which looked gay and bustling as usual in the morning sun. A few days before, there had been congratulations in the streets and Te Deums in the churches for the taking of Algiers; and the volatile people, in exultation at the national victory, had half forgotten their grievances against the king and his ministers; only the prayer of the archbishop, that the king might triumph over his enemies at home as well as abroad, had been felt as a bitter reminder, and was treasured as an insult to be resented.

And now as the crowds begin to pour along the quays, or pass the public places, little knots of men gather to read the "ordonnances" printed in the Moniteur of the day. The ordonnances are directed against the liberty of the press and the right of election, and gloom settles on the faces of the readers; and a sort of stupefaction at the audacity of the man who had done this, checks for a little the rising excitement.

The bland-looking old gentleman, in blue coat and canary-coloured vest with gold buttons, who had gone in and out among them, for the last half-dozen years, smiling and bowing with such perfect politeness and urbanity had been seized with that form of lunacy, peculiar to kings, which persuades them that in practice, as well as in theory, they can do no wrong, and under its influence he had issued the fatal ordonnances which, before another day was done, would deluge those sunny streets with blood, and cause thousands to execrate his memory as the murderer of their sons, husbands, and brothers. Who could have thought that peculiarly bland and complacent smile had murder in it? No doubt of it, the tall, mild, fair monarch would have shrunk from inflicting on a single family in his capital such sorrow and suffering as his grape-shot scattered wholesale along those streets and quays. But such men can have no imagination; perhaps it is killed in them by a fate grander than their nature. The events of the next few days were enough to have caused Charles X., had he been able to realise them, to sit in sackcloth and ashes, and desire that he might die and not live. But in his exile he was the same as ever. Bland and smiling, he would issue from the gates of Holyrood Palace, his temporary refuge, with his hat under his arm, and his white hair streaming in the wind, bowing graciously to the crowd that waited on his carriage, while by his side tripped the little wizened Duchess D'Angoulême, in yellow satin gown and high-heeled shoes, with long, gold ear-drops pendant on her shoulders. In a few days she, too, was flying from France, in the disguise of an old peasant, a character which she, no doubt, acted to the very life.

There was no want of cleverness in the women of the family. Concerning these very ordonnances, the Duchess de Berri pleaded vainly with the infatuated king.

"Sire," she said, "I am a mother, and the interest of my son compels me to say, that if you do not dismiss your ministers, both you and my son will lose the throne."

"Madame," replied the king, "I want no advice; the ordonnances I have issued are immutable. Calmez-vous," he added; "l'air de la mer vous fera peut-être du bien!" meaning, that the sooner she departed for Dieppe the better.

Peggy Oglivie noticed the groups of people collected at various points, as she went the round of the print-sellers with whom she had dealings, receiving, with a heart sinking lower and lower, the same answer from all—"Nothing had been sold;" "Nothing would sell at present;" "A call on some future day would oblige."

The most depressing of all depressions is that which comes from repeated rebuffs of this kind. Ask the author, whose manuscript comes back to him again and again; or the artist, whose picture is never hung; or, worse than all, the handicraftsman, who trudges vainly from shop to shop of his craft, asking for work to do, if it is not so. To be told that you are not wanted, that in the great busy world there is no need for you, that you and yours might perish unregarded, and never be missed out of the multitude, must be a bitter experience, and yet it is a common one; alas! so very common. Peggy pauses at the window of a shop in the Rue St. Honoré. She does not enter; there is no need for her to do so: her answer hangs there in the shape of her unsold drawing. It is her latest and most ambitious attempt—a pine-clad slope in winter, depending for effect on the ethereal beauty of the sky and the powerful drawing of the trees. She turns away with a sense of relief that another denial is spared her, and with a feeling that she is being defeated in the unequal struggle.

There was nothing for her but to go home. She felt that she could not attempt anything for that day at least, and therefore she would devote what remained of it to her father. She found him in his room, complaining bitterly of his wife's neglect. She had gone out and left him without dinner, or anything wherewith to procure the meal. This neglect was easily rectified on a July day in Paris, and the father and daughter dined together economically, and in perfect peace. But the afternoon passed, and still Madame Oglivie did not return. Her husband began to be very restless, and to harass his daughter with complaints. It vexed alike her ear and her heart to listen. Between the pair not a vestige of love remained. With the wife, there was none of that loyalty which hedges the husband with a kind of jealous honour; with the husband, none of that sacred sovereignty which is the bond of the household. Almost with horror, she heard her father propose a scheme for getting over to England and leaving her behind. She had often tried to awaken a better feeling between them, and she tried now; but in vain. "I hate her," he repeated, "and she cares nothing for me; she cares only for her low pleasures."

As usual, Louis Oglivie escorted his daughter to her own little room. She would have remained with him, but there was no accommodation for her, and her step-mother might be expected at any moment. He sat with her for some time longer, and restlessly strayed out upon the roof to smoke; a thing which his daughter dreaded, as she suspected the presence of the deadly drug in which she now knew that he indulged. At length he took his departure, and she promised to be with him early on the following day.

She had been sitting for some time in perfect silence, and with no other light than that of the summer moon, when there came a rattle of something on the window-pane, which sounded like hail-stones. It could not be the rising wind, for the night was breathlessly still. "It must be a bit of plaster," she thought to herself, and then ceased to think about it. But, after a little interval, the sound was heard again, and in at the slightly open lattice a volley of pigeon's peas bounded on the floor. It must be her young neighbour. He was getting too old for pure mischief, and besides, he had been uniformly respectful during their acquaintance; so she came to the conclusion that he wanted to speak to her on some matter which he chose to think important enough to justify this unusual proceeding.

She was right in her conjecture, for on going to the window, she heard him call, "Mademoiselle! mademoiselle!" in a loud and yet anxious whisper.

She stepped out on the roof, and saw him apparently in his old position, and looking in the moonlight as girlish as ever. "What is it?" she said, and waited.

"Mademoiselle has a good courage," he began.

"You must not try me too much," she replied; "you almost succeeded in frightening me just now. Only that I know ghosts do not carry peas in their pockets, I should have been very much alarmed."

"Mademoiselle must pardon me. I have something to say. Will you come nearer?" he added, glancing down among the lurking shadows.

She went and stood beneath him in the full light, which also shone on his face, grave and important.

"There is no one with you?" he whispered cautiously.

"No person," she answered.

"I pray you make me your promise that you will not go out to-morrow evening."

"Why?"

"I cannot tell you."

"What will happen to me if I do?"

"You will be in great danger," he answered.

"Promise," he pleaded, eagerly, "that you will be at home after six o'clock."

"I cannot make promises without knowing why I make them."

"Will you not trust me?" he whispered.

"You do not trust me," she replied.

"I would, but I have made an oath."

"This is very grave. I hope you are not joining in any riotous proceedings. You are too young."

He did not resent the imputation of extreme youth, as she had hoped he would. That might have led to the disclosure of some mischief, which it was possible to prevent.

"I am not too young to die for France," he answered.

At another time, she would have smiled at the grandiloquent little speech, but the face she looked up at had on it such a gleam of enthusiasm that she felt much more ready to cry.

"Oh, no! you must not die," she said, gently; "you must live for the country you love. Every good, brave man is a gain to his country, and you will be good and brave, I think."

"It would not make much trouble if I died," he said, reflectively: "my mother is dead."

"Poor boy! I also have no mother."

"What is your name?" he asked.

"Margaret."

"It is the same—my mother's name," he answered: "I have it here," he laid his chin upon his breast. "It is embroidered on her handkerchief. To-morrow I shall wear it over my heart. My name is Henri. I do not love any one very much, but you are my friend, are you not?"

"Henri, I wish truly I could be your friend in this matter, whatever it is, and persuade you to have nothing to do with plots of any kind. You may spoil your whole life before you know what you are doing, and, if only for your country's sake, you have no right to pledge your future. Think," she added, "what your mother would have said about it."

"Ah!" he replied, with a depth of sentiment she had not given him credit for, "she would have said the same thing as you say, if she had been living; but not now. Then, she would have said, 'Keep out of danger;' now, she would say, 'Henri, do not fear to die.'"

Then there was a slight pause in their whispered conversation. The sound of passing footsteps were heard below in the street.

"I have one thing more, may I have your permission to pass over to your side to-morrow, if I should want a run on the roof?"

"I cannot hear any more of this, unless you will tell me what you are going to be about."

He shook his head.

"Well, then, good night, say your prayers, and go to sleep, and let me see you in the morning. You will think better of it, by that time."

"I shall not be here in the morning; no one knows I am here now. I am absent without leave," he said, gaily.

A terrible scratching and whining was set up just then on Henri's side. "It's Fanchon," he explained: "you will not refuse to keep Fanchon for me?—she is such a dear little dog!"

"Take her now," he said, coming up again, with the little thing in one hand, and he dropped down into her arms a tiny, white creature, quivering like a curd.

With another warning, she dismissed Henri, and, entering her room, closed the window and prepared to sleep. But she could get no sleep for hours, thinking of the strange boy and his warning. Yet the more she thought, the more utterly improbable it seemed to her that there could be any grave reality at the bottom of his talk. He was either the victim of a hoax, or else some mischief more than usually extensive was on foot, and would probably be frustrated, or desisted from, without any interference on her part, even if any interference were possible. At last she fell asleep.

THE UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

SHOUT of joy greeted Mr. Waldegrave's appearance in the drawing-room, at Elm Grove, one wet evening, and the shout was followed by an exclamation from both his children that he was five whole minutes late for the children's hour!

"And I wonder who was a good deal more than five minutes late this morning at breakfast?" said their father, laughing. "However, I am willing to bear any punishment you may think proper to impose, provided it is not anything very desperate."

"I'll give you twenty kisses as a punishment," said Maida, putting her little arms round his neck; "and if that is too hard a punishment," she whispered, "you may give them all back to me again!"

Herbert looked on at the proceeding in dignified silence, not considering kissing a very manly amusement for a great boy like him (he was just ten years old); and when the twenty kisses had been given and returned, he said the punishment he would give was that the story should be a little longer than usual.

"Very well," said Mr. Waldegrave, "I am quite content; but what shall I tell you about?"

"More about the Exhibition, I think, papa," answered Herbert.

"And about the Prince Imperial too, please," added Maida.

"My dear children," replied their father, "I really have told you everything I ever heard about the prince; and as to the Exhibition, I am sure you must know it almost as well as I do myself by this time. What would you say if I told you a true story of something that happened in Paris many years ago?"

"That would be delightful, papa!" answered Maida. "But what is it about?"

"Time will tell," said her father. "It would never do to spoil my story by beginning at the end, so I will begin at the very beginning, and say that if you had been in Paris at that time, you might have seen in the Rue St. Honoré a very small house—so small, in fact, that it only consisted of one room, which had, therefore, to answer the various purposes of bedroom, sitting-room, kitchen, and charcoal store. Not a very pleasant or convenient arrangement, certainly; and yet the room was so neat and clean as to look more comfortable than many a larger house in the same locality.

"Two wooden beds, with green curtains, were placed at one end of the room, and beside them was a cradle; further on were great bags of charcoal, heaped one over the other; at the lower end of the room was the large stove. A table, a few common chairs, two or three saucepans and kettles, and a little crockeryware, completed the furniture.

"Such was the home of James, the charcoal merchant, and his family, which consisted of his wife, whose name was Annette, two fine boys of eight and ten years old, and a little girl, who was just beginning to walk and talk, and was the pet of the whole house.

"One fine summer evening, the mother and children were seated round the table, waiting, somewhat impatiently, for the return of their father, to begin their supper. Charles, the eldest of the boys, ran to and fro between the table and the door, which had been left open, and each time shook his head mournfully as he cast a wistful glance at the covered dish, which his mother had placed on the table. 'Father is not come,' he said, at last; 'and supper will be quite cold.'

"Let us go and meet him," said his younger brother, whose name was Blondel; 'and then the time will pass quicker.'

"But, boys, I do not wish you to go," said their mother, who, seated in a low chair, was singing a sweet cradle hymn to hush her baby to sleep. 'I do not wish you to go, for I am afraid you would lose your way; and I wonder what would become of your father and me then!'

"But, mother," said Charles, 'I wonder why father is so much later out this evening than he generally is; it is quite late now.'

"He had to go to the Palais Royal to take charcoal," replied their mother; 'and this is the Queen's birthday. There are to be great doings there—a state ball and concert, and I do not know what beside.'

"At this moment the charcoal merchant's voice was heard calling out, 'I say, Annette, put down some charcoal on the fire as fast as you can, there is not a moment to be lost.' Then a great tall man, covered with charcoal-dust, and very wet, entered the house, carrying an apparently lifeless child in his arms. The poor little fellow's clothes were richly embroidered, and contrasted sadly with his bare feet and torn sleeves, and he seemed literally drenched with water.

"Dear me!" exclaimed the kind-hearted mistress of the house, laying her sleeping baby in the cradle, and making a great fire; 'what has happened to you, husband? and what is the matter with this poor child?'

"I will tell you by-and-by," he replied; 'but first warm a blanket to wrap him in; that on the children's bed is the best. Poor little fellow, I think he will get on now.'

"What a beautiful boy!" said Annette, as she helped him to undress the still unconscious little stranger. 'Charles,' she added, 'give me your Sunday clothes, for the poor child cannot keep on his own; I must dry them well for him.'

"Here they are, mother," said Charles, handing them to her, and looking in amazement at the embroidered dress which she laid carefully before the stove, and which the boys had never seen anything like before.

"Warmth soon restored the half-drowned child; he opened his eyes, and looking with no small surprise at the swarthy charcoal merchant, and his wife and children, as well as at the strange abode in which he found himself, he said, half-frightened, 'Where am I? and what has happened?'

"You are here, my little friend," said the charcoal merchant.

"My little friend!" repeated the child, disdainfully; 'my little friend, indeed!'

"So much the worse for you, my fine gentleman," said James, 'if you are angry with me. Bad as I am, I wonder where you would be now but for me.'

"These clothes are not mine," continued the child; 'you have stolen mine.'

"Stolen!" interrupted the charcoal merchant, in a furious passion; 'stolen your clothes! I only wish you were old enough, you ungrateful little—'

"Stop, stop, James," said Annette, gently; 'this poor little fellow is so bewildered that he does not know what he is saying. He will soon know that, although we are poor, we are honest, and while he is resting, tell us what happened.'

"Well," said the charcoal merchant, as he drew his boys close to him, 'I went as usual to take some charcoal to the Palais Royal; the head-cook told me that it was always so good that he would take me to the garden that I might see the fête. And true enough, I could see everything through the windows, which were illuminated to such a degree that I could hardly help thinking that the palace was on fire. I could see ever so many fine ladies and gentlemen passing the windows, dressed so splendidly, with feathers and diamonds that shone like the sun. I was wishing the Queen would pass, but she did not, or I should certainly have known her.'

"But how would you have known her?" asked Charles, who had listened eagerly to every word that his father had said.

"Why, queens always wear a crown," answered the charcoal merchant, 'and I could not see any one with a crown pass the window.'

"But I want to hear about the child," said Annette.

"Well, then," replied her husband, 'as I was standing outside the window, where the cook had left me, I heard a great splash behind me. I turned round, and by the light of the lamps I saw that this poor child had fallen into the water, and before you could say one—two—three, I jumped in after him, and brought him here, for the sentry would not allow me to take him to the kitchen, as I did not know who he was; and, indeed, he was so taken up with what was going on, that he cared very little about the child.'

"But his poor mother, how unhappy she must be about him!" said Annette, sorrowfully. 'Pray tell us where you live, and who you are,' she said to the child, 'that my husband may go and set your mother's heart at rest about you.'

"You are very kind, madam," replied the child, in a tone of politeness, which made a great impression on the two boys; 'but there is not any hurry.'

"But by this time they must have missed you, and be looking for you everywhere.'

"So much the better, madam," said the child, quietly.

"But your mother will be miserable."

"I hope she may, madam," he rejoined.

"Surely you cannot doubt it," said Annette; "and yet," she added, "children never know the depth of a mother's love."

"But we know it, mother," said Charles and Blondel, eagerly, as they ran and kissed her over and over again.

"The little visitor did not make any remark, but the tears fell fast down his face.

"My precious children," said Annette, "are you really very fond of me?"

"Indeed we are, mother," answered Charles. "I would not change you for the queen herself, if I could."

"Nor I, for the whole kingdom, and Paris too," said Blondel.

"A loud sob made them turn round. The little stranger had burst into tears.

"What is the matter, my poor child?" said Annette, kindly, drawing him to her as tenderly as if he had been one of her own boys. "Have not you also got kind parents?"

"My father is dead, madam," said the child, still weeping bitterly.

"But you have a mother, a kind mother," said Annette, "who takes care of you?"

"My mother has something else to do than take care of me, madam."

"Why, what can a mother have to do that need prevent her taking care of her children?" asked Annette.

"My mother's position gives her many other things to do, madam. She has plenty of servants to take care of me."

"Ha!" said the charcoal merchant, in a brusque tone, "nicely they were taking care of you when you fell into the water; and but for me you might have been there still. Of course, my children might fall into the water too," he added, "for that is a thing that might happen to any one; but if they did, their father or mother would soon find it out. But no matter, wife, let us go to supper."

"As soon as they were all seated at the table, Annette laid down a wooden plate and spoon before each, and then, taking off the cover of the dish, she helped every one to some boiled beans, while the father cut thick slices of the black but wholesome bread, and handed it round.

"Now, father," said the children, "please tell us what you saw at the fête."

"It was magnificent," he replied.

"I suppose kings and queens are very happy," said Blondel.

"At all events their children learn to read," said Charles, with a sigh.

"And do not you know how to read?" asked the stranger.

"No, indeed, sir," answered Charles, "I do not. It would cost ever so much, and my parents could not afford to give it."

"With a grave and solemn manner the little stranger rose from his seat, went to his dress which was hanging on the back of a chair before the fire, took a purse out of the pocket, returned to the table, opened the purse, in which were several gold pieces, and taking one of them, he handed it to Charles, saying, as sedately as if he had been a man of fifty, 'Look, there is money enough for twenty months, and when that is gone I will give you more.'

"Charles!" said the charcoal merchant, in a voice that made the child lay down the money which he had just taken in his hand, and say, 'I cannot take it, sir; but I am very much obliged.'

"But why cannot you take it?" asked the stranger.

"Because I did not earn it, sir, and I could not take charity."

"But that is not charity," answered the child; "it was mine, and I choose to give it to you; so that is all about it, besides," he added, "your father has shown me a kindness that I could not over-pay."

"And do you suppose that kindness can be paid for?" asked the charcoal merchant.

"I have always been told so," answered the stranger.

"Take back your gold, sir," said the charcoal merchant, kindly, but decidedly; "it is not that I despise your gift, especially after your saying that it was to pay for Charles learning to read; but you are too young to give away so much money."

"So you do not yet know who I am?" said the child.

"No, we do not," said Annette; "but I hope you will tell us, for surely it is high time to relieve your mother's mind from all the anxiety she must have suffered on your account these last two hours."

"My mother," said the child, sadly, "loves me just as much as you love your children, but she has not time to think of me so much; her position does not allow her to caress me as often as she would wish."

"She is not like our mother," said Charles.

"She is much handsomer," replied the little visitor.

"But ours is the best and kindest."

"But mine gives me such a beautiful house, and plenty of servants to wait on me, and as much money as ever I like," said the stranger, haughtily, not at all pleased at the comparison.

"Our mother gives us kisses as often as we like," said Blondel, angrily.

"But now the very unusual sound of the rolling of a carriage was heard at the end of the unfrequented street; louder and louder it sounded as it came nearer, and at length it stopped at the door; then came a furious knock, and some one called out, 'Does James, the charcoal merchant, live here?'

"Dear me!" said the little stranger, "that is my tutor's voice;" and while the charcoal merchant and his wife hastened to open the door, he crept under the table, making a sign to Charles and Blondel to follow his example. In one moment the room was filled with noblemen and soldiers. One man, distinguished by his cardinal's dress, his lean figure, and stern, unbending countenance, surmounted by a little red cap, detached himself from the crowd, and addressing a soldier, who stood at a respectful distance, he said to him, 'Repeat the deposition.' Whereupon, the soldier, looking at the charcoal merchant, said, 'This evening, at eight o'clock, whilst I was on duty at the palace gate, you asked me for permission to go to the kitchen, to convey there a child whom you had just taken out of the water; where is that child?'

" 'Here I am,' said the little stranger, suddenly making his appearance from under the table.

" 'Sire, the whole Court has been searching for you these two hours!'

" 'Sire!' whispered the charcoal merchant to his wife, in utter amazement.

"The child did not take any notice of their surprise, but said, proudly, 'I am extremely glad to hear it, Cardinal Mazarin.'

" 'Your mother has been very uneasy.'

" 'His mother! and yet she did not follow him!' said Annette, involuntarily.

" 'I am sorry my mother has been uneasy, cardinal; but I could not help it.'

" 'You will come with me now, sire, I hope?'

" 'Yes, if I like,' said the child.

" 'But you ought to like it, sire, when you know that your mother is most anxiously expecting you.'

" 'I must first thank these kind people for their goodness to me when they did not know who I was.'

" 'They shall be paid for it, sire; but pray do not delay any longer.'

" 'Cardinal Mazarin,' said the child with dignity, 'I have learned this evening that money cannot pay for kindness. My friend,' added he, turning to the charcoal merchant, 'I, Louis XIV., King of France, thank you with all my heart for the great kindness which you have shown me; I will take charge of the education of your sons, and will give a dowry to your daughter when she is married. You may kiss my hand.'

"Then, with the most touching expressions of gratitude, the boy-king shook hands cordially with the charcoal merchant, kissed Annette, and said to the boys, 'Au-revoir, our quarrel is over, is it not? Now cardinal,' he added, 'I am ready, let us set out.'

" 'In this dress, sire?' said the cardinal, looking contemptuously at the coarse and shabby clothes in which the young king was dressed.

" 'Yes, in these clothes,' he replied.

" 'But, sire, do you remember that the Queen is surrounded by the Court, and that they are all in full dress?'

" 'Ah! sire,' said Annette, 'do not wait to change your clothes. Think how anxiously your mother is waiting for you.'

" 'Do you hear that, Cardinal Mazarin?'

" 'It is only a poor woman who spoke, sire,' replied the cardinal.

" 'She is a mother,' said the boy-king; and going through the crowd, who drew back to let him pass, he again thanked Annette for all her care and kindness.

" 'You have forgotten your purse, sire,' she said, handing it to him.

" 'I have not forgotten anything,' he replied: 'my purse is yours now;' and jumping into the carriage which was waiting for him at the door, he drove off amid the acclamations of the crowd, whom the unwonted sight had quickly assembled.

"And now, children," said Mr. Waldegrave, as he concluded, "how do you like my story?"

"I think it is jolly," answered Herbert; "only I wish I knew if the young king kept his promise to the children. It must be great fun to be a king, and to have such a row made when anything happened to one."

"I am sure that Louis did keep his promise to the children," replied his father; "but not at all sure that you would find it fun to be a king. But what are you thinking of so earnestly?" he added, as he stroked his little daughter's long golden curls: "you look very grave."

Maida looked up shyly as she said, "I could not help thinking how like the story was—I mean," she added, correcting herself—"what a great honour those poor people thought it for the king to come to them by accident, even though he went away again as soon as he could. But the Lord Jesus came down to this world on purpose, and gave up all his greatness, and even died on the cross to save the people who were so cruel and unkind to him, because he loved them so much that he wanted them to be happy with him in heaven for ever. I think that was a great deal more wonderful, and yet we so often forget it."

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, February 29, 1868. —

(Drawn by R. NEWCOMBE.)

“‘They seem to go better,’ said Polly.”—p. 370.

THREE DAYS IN JENNY'S LIFE.

FIVE o'clock; the table laid; the meal prepared; the kitchen in order; no Polly.

“How late Polly is!” the father said to his daughter. “Polly is always late.”

But even as he spoke, there stood in the doorway, bonnet in hand, bright sunlight in her steps, Polly—who was always late.

Her long black hair, gathered up at the top of her head with a broad blue ribbon, had escaped from its fastening, and now fell tumbling down her back, a curly mass, in picturesque confusion. Her coquettish dark eyes, so veiled with long eyelashes as to seem almost black, were soft or bright as the girl's heart prompted; and her well-cut little mouth was filled with strong, white teeth, in themselves no small beauty.

Of her skin, Polly herself thought but slightly, it was so much browner than the ladies at the Hall; but there were those who admired its velvet bloom, and approved of the roses that blushed on her cheeks. Among them were to be included all the males in the little seafaring town, from the clergyman down to Roger, the fisherman's son, next door.

The clergyman's wife, indeed, said she thought more highly of Jenny, Polly's elder sister, and Roger's mother could "see nought in the gad-about wench;" but the lords of the creation stuck to their creeds, and Polly held her own among the fish-girls.

"Too bad, Polly," said her father. "Where have you been all day? It's little enough work you do. Jenny 'ull slave herself to death."

"No, father, I like the work," said Jenny, softly; and her sister corroborated the statement.

"Where have you been, Polly? Talking to the boys by the sea, and nothing to eat since the morn'?"

But Polly was too busy to answer. She tossed her bonnet and cloak in a heap on the floor, to be picked up and hung away tidily by Jenny; and was drawing the plate of fresh shrimps towards her, when a low, uncertain knocking caused them to pause—all, indeed, except Polly—and look at the closed door for information.

"It's Roger," said Polly, springing up from her seat, and letting the shells all down on the floor.

"Ah, Jenny! wait. Let me—"

Here Polly became inaudible. The sentence was finished by a gesture.

Taking out a brush from her pocket—where no brush should have been—she wound the long hair round her head like a wreath, and stuck in hairpins to any amount.

Then Jenny opened the door.

Behind it, uncomfortably balanced on one leg, the picture of rustic confusion and distress, stood a young fisherman, who, finding himself thus suddenly exposed to view, took a step forward into the room, and leered at Polly. But that young lady was quite unconscious. She had resumed her evening meal, and was unaware of any intruders.

"Polly, here's Roger," said Jenny. "Don't you speak to him?"

"Roger!" said Polly, lost in astonishment, "who'd ha' thought it? Been to the fair, Roger?"

"And brought this," exhibiting a pair of large blue shell earrings, very grandly set in "gold-work." "Polly, I thought maybe you'd take 'em."

"I!" said Polly, virtuously surprised, eyeing the baubles, with her hands behind her back. "I wouldn't take 'em from Jenny—of course you got 'em for Jenny, Roger—for anything in the whole world. Now, it's no use speaking," said Polly, "because I wouldn't do it."

Polly, looking at this minute inclined for an argument, her sister and Roger assisted her to her wishes.

"Polly—why, Polly darling, you're unkind! What do I want with fairings, only to know as how Roger thought of me?"

"That's all," said Roger, looking sheepish. "Take 'em, Polly."

"If I thought," said Polly, not exactly giving way, but certainly coming round by degrees, "as how they wouldn't suit Jenny, even, but—Jenny, put 'em in; let's see how they look."

So Jenny, after a faint protest, which was overruled by the imperious Polly, obeyed, and put Roger's fairing in her ears.

"If you ask me," said Polly, when nobody made a remark; "no, I don't. Every one has their tastes, of course, and I don't like that bright blue against Jenny's hair and eyes."

"Now it's your turn, Polly," said Jenny, not one whit irritated by the very doubtful compliments she had read in their eyes; and Polly turned round transformed.

"They seem to go better," said Polly, trying very hard to look modest, and failing very signally; "I suppose it's having dark eyes."

I suppose it was; either that or something else, for Polly had a way of looking well in everything. Blue was her colour, but no one would ever have thought so who had once seen her in pink, or grey, or mauve.

"Polly," said her father, when the meal was over, and Jenny was putting the things in their places, "wilt come and walk a bit on the shore? Art tired, lass?"

No, Polly was never tired. She put on the cloak again, and, taking the bonnet by the strings (Polly had a peculiar objection to putting it on, aware, perhaps, that to hide any portion of so sweet a face was a sin not to be warranted by any circumstances whatsoever), slipped her arm through her father's, and they sallied forth for their evening walk.

Jenny and Roger were alone in the kitchen; and the clock ticked, and the cat slept, and the light of day died a natural death, and they neither of them spoke a word. Jenny moved about the kitchen quietly, putting the place into apple-pie order, and then, her night's work over at last, sat down by the fire, rather white in its ruddy glow. Then Roger, who had been shifting from one leg to another, with the exact alternation of one minute between each uneasy movement, felt that something was expected of him, and, getting himself up by degrees to the back of her chair, imprinted on her forehead a loud-sounding kiss, which, vibrating through the kitchen, woke the cat, causing her to change sides before the fire.

Jenny put up her hands before her face, not in shyness or coquetry, but very sadly, and—"Roger," said she, "you mustn't do that; never no more, Roger; never, never, never again."

Roger taking this for an invitation—which, indeed, it would have been had Polly been the speaker—instantly gave her two more, and inwardly congratulated himself on his "pluck."

"No, Roger—no!" said Jenny, turning round at him, and catching at his two hands passionately, but speaking in a voice which her own earnestness had rendered steady and distinct; "all that is over now. It's not me as you love now, and you mustn't treat me as if it was. It isn't that, Roger (as Roger just glanced at the earrings, that still lay where Polly had left them, on the kitchen dresser, in close conjunction with Polly's brush, and a perfect tribe of Polly's hair-pins). I've known it this long, long time—ever since Polly came home: and Roger—Roger dear, you mustn't think as how I blame you, or—or think hard things."

Jenny's little speech was over. She had broken the tie that bound them together. She broke off abruptly, dropped her hands in her lap, and her eyelashes over her eyes, and leant back in her chair, paler than ever in the bright reflection the wood-fire threw on her face.

Then Roger found his voice. "Jenny," he said, "maybe I'm a fool; it's like enough, for I feel here" (here was his waistcoat, which Roger thumped vigorously, meaning Jenny to infer he alluded to his heart) "that she aint half what she should be, aint half what you be, Jenny; but—but, I can't help it, Jenny, I do love her; though," said Roger, wishing to wind up with an apology, and evidently thinking he had found a good one, "I really don't know why."

"Polly is Polly," said Jenny, in simple explanation; "but we've no call to talk of this any more. It's all over between us now, Roger, for ever and ever; but you must mind as how I say no word of Polly. If so be as how it's to be, you and she will hit it off together."

"And you won't be against saying a word for a fellow once and again?" said Roger, seeking to detain her, as she made as though she would pass from the kitchen. "I've not behaved well I know, Jenny, but when things go so far, they—~~they usually go still further,~~" said Roger, losing himself in difficulties, and breaking down ignominiously in the very strength of his argument.

"Roger, Roger, let me go."

"One moment, Jenny; only say——"

"Roger, I have loved you, and I love Polly. If I see as how you are set on each other, I'll try and help you both with father."

Then Jenny made for the open door, and fairly ran out of the room.

Up the old stairs, holding on to the wooden bars, went Jenny, mechanically repeating to herself her own heart's death-warrant: "It's all over between us now, Roger, for ever and ever." Her room once gained—the room she shared with Polly—she sat down on a low box by the window, and "began from the beginning." How she had first come to know him; how he had gradually begun to come to the cottage; how it had grown to be a settled thing that he should so come; how the "day" was soon to have been fixed; how Polly had come home. Never any further. That point once reached, Jenny began again. Over, and over, and over again. Like a child conning an unwelcome lesson, the words of which it knows full well, but whose sense it cannot yet master. She sat thus by the open window, telling herself sad secrets, till the night air blew cold on her flushed face and chilled frame, and the snow, that had at first fallen lightly, covered the earth like a pall. Then Jenny rose. Something heavier than snow—something colder than snow—something more like a pall, crushing out her heart; her whole life (so it then seemed to Jenny) spoiled for ever.

This was one day in Jenny's life. Here is another:—

Coming into the kitchen one afternoon, some six months after the snow had lain on the earth, Jenny found Roger very red, and uncomfortable, and evidently expounding to Polly. Polly, on her part, was tilting back in a chair, affecting intense denseness, and looking more than usually pretty. Then, "Jenny," said Roger, "wilt go away a bit? I've summat to say to Polly."

So Jenny went away, closing the door behind her, and sitting down on the wooden stairs outside it, told herself other and yet sadder secrets.

"Polly," said Roger, when they found themselves alone, "I wish for to court you, and I don't know how."

This, as every one knows, was merely a remark, and required no answer. Polly therefore gave it none. Roger had to begin again.

"I'm not generally back'ard, Polly," he went on, thereby showing his opinion of himself differed slightly from the one held of him by others, "but you seem to take so much out of a fellow."

Another statement which required no comment.

Polly unwound the ribbon at her waist, and tied it again in an elegant bow.

"Polly," said Roger, driven to despair, "what I mean for to say is, I love you."

Here Roger came to such a regular pause, and so clearly expressed his intention of saying no more, that Polly at last thought it safer to speak, lest the subject should haply drop to the ground.

"Not me, Roger," said Polly, looking at the cat, as if she wished him to infer she believed his affections to be fixed on that household pet; and Roger accepted the challenge.

He got up from his chair, put his arm round her waist, and the elegant bow came all untied, and the long pink ends dragged on the floor. Then all was as good as settled, when Roger, very red and happy, held Polly in his arms, an enchanting vision, with rose-coloured blushes all over her face, and rose-coloured ribbons all over her gown.

Presently Polly, who, finding this to be no time or place for coquetry, probably felt out of her element, made an indistinct allusion to Jenny, and took herself and her rose-coloured ribbons out on to the stairs. But the stairs, though highly suited to Jenny, with her steady little face on her hands, and her desolate little figure in its thick stuff dress, became of a sudden inappropriate, when Polly brought out all her fine colours, and spread them on the wooden boards, with immense success, as regards effect.

"Jenny," said Polly, sitting close up against her sister, and speaking in the pettishly-caressing voice that was peculiar to her, and was perhaps her greatest charm, "Roger wants me to go away and leave you—and leave father."

"I am very glad, Polly; you will both be so happy. But," Jenny moaned, "how quick it has been!"

"Happy's the wooing that's not long a-doing," declared Polly, promptly. "Lor, Jenny, it's better as it is. If there'd been much work about it, I'd likely have never took him at all; and as for long courtings, I can't abide 'em! Keeping company till you've a'most forgot when you began—I hate such ways!" said Polly, indignantly, and making a face that did truly indicate some slight scorn or disgust.

All this was quite out of Jenny's line. She could not even understand her sister's logic. Surely Roger's love, once given, was worth waiting for. So she moaned to herself, knowing full well she could have waited for ever; and the dark stuff dress heaved piteously, and Jenny did really feel that her heart was broken.

Ah! what uncomfortable stairs! Jenny could positively stay there no longer! The day, too, had turned so hot! There had never been known such oppressive heat! And, truly, Jenny appeared to feel a change. Her pallor became so astonishing, that even Polly remarked it, clinging to her: "Jenny, Jenny, what is it?"

But Jenny disclaimed the idea of illness.

"I'm so glad, Jenny; for one moment I thought you were going to faint, and then," said Polly, "what should I have done?"

So they entered the room together—Polly, flushed into new beauty, a sort of demure coquette, with petting ways and a caressing voice; and Jenny, in her heavy, thick dress, with dark rims round her swollen, red eyes—eyes from which, however, there shone forth a spirit that had never belonged to Polly—the spirit of self-sacrifice and unselfish love.

Late that evening, when Polly had gone off to bed, Jenny obtained the father's consent, and congratulated Roger so kindly, so warmly even, on his success, that Roger was quite taken aback. It is only fair to the poor fellow to say that he had never made strong love to Jenny. He had asked her to marry him at the request of his mother (who thought very highly of Jenny, believing she saw in her an excellent housewife, and highly approving of her quiet, gentle ways), feeling, it may be, rather indifferent as to the answer he should receive, but certainly in love with no one else.

Then Polly had come back from a long visit to an aunt, and, uncording her little wooden box, had taken thence such an astounding array of ribbons and bright-coloured odds and ends, arranging them so artistically upon her charming little figure, and bringing them into such close contrast with the dark beauty of her lovely little face, that the very first Sunday, on the way to church, the whole town had, metaphorically speaking, knelt before her, and had so gone on kneeling ever since.

Roger among them. Poor Roger, unaware of danger, had been the very first to fall in love.

And so Jenny's life had come to be spoiled. Polly, however, had known nothing of her sister's engagement, and had only pretended to couple their names, for Jenny had not cared to publish her happiness, and Polly was hardly a person in whom one would choose to confide.

And Roger himself had not asked for his release—would not, indeed, have done so; though, when offered him by Jenny, he had accepted it with a new hope springing in his heart, and his pulses beating with a strange delight. And yet, now, when after Jenny's congratulation, he went away back into his own cottage, Roger felt somewhat downcast.

"I don't know now, mother, as how I've got hold of the right girl," he said, uneasily, when he had finished his account of this his latest wooing, and the success with which it had met; but the mother evinced her sense.

"It's late in the day to think of that now, my boy," she said; and Roger, assenting, went up to bed, where, notwithstanding his expressed uncertainty, his dreams were probably more of the sleeping Polly than of the wakeful little figure that watched by her side.

So the days went on—rose-coloured for Polly, and bright with sunshine, till they lengthened out into Midsummer Eve, or, as the father said, "Somebody's wedding-day." Not Jenny's. Jenny, whose sleepless night was over before the first bird had begun to sing, and who hovered about the cottage in the early morning light, with a soft look of pleasure on her face, stealing up from the good heart that, communing with itself through so many weary months, had conquered at last, and was at peace now with the whole world.

And then, later, Polly came down to breakfast, like a lovely little flower in her plain muslin gown. "All in white like a bride," said the proud father, as the girl nestled up against him, hanging over his chair, insisting on being made much of, "because you know, father," said Polly's pettishly-caressing voice, "it is the last time. I am going away, and you won't have me any more."

The cottage without Polly!

"My dear," said the father ("No, not any tighter, Polly." Polly was tying a bright-blue neckerchief round his throat in one of her fanciful bows, quite irrespective of the hue to which her father's rosy complexion was rapidly turning), "that is the way of the world; but if you suppose as how we shan't think of you, Polly, you—you think wrong, my dear."

The father could not make speeches; but, indeed, there was no speech necessary, with Polly's little dark head resting on his breast, and Jenny's tears falling on his hand.

And then they all went off to church, and met Roger there, which was, indeed, quite in the programme, and took no one by surprise. And Polly came away, "not simply Polly," she was particular to explain, "but Roger's wife," having in the last hour undergone promotion. Polly, with her beauty, and her little dependent ways, excited general admiration and interest. Even the ladies at the Hall had come down to see their little pet married.

"I never saw anything so charmingly pretty," one of them had said, and she only expressed the general opinion.

And Jenny? Jenny stood in the corner of the church, and prayed for the happy little bride, round whom such bright sunshine was falling—prayed with all the earnestness of her loving, pure heart, that this, her darling sister, might not only be happy herself, but might make Roger happy also.

So Roger took Polly away, and she began to pet him then with her little brown hands.

That evening the father spent in a neighbouring cottage, quite unable to bear the sight of his own, on this the first night of Polly's absence; but Jenny, though also solicited, would not stir out. She climbed up into her little room—Polly's old room—and sat herself down, as she had so often done before, on the wooden box by the window. The sun was setting in summer glory, long bars of light stealing down to the earth, and the rosy tints that flooded the heavens reflected red on the little casement.

Polly was gone!

That was at first all Jenny could feel. The child she had so loved grown up into a woman, and married! And then Jenny's thoughts wandered—as Jenny's thoughts were always sure to wander—to the man she had loved so well, the Roger to whom this very morning the child Polly had been given away. Presently Jenny rose, and took from a drawer a little miniature, which she handled with care, and touched reverently.

"Mother," she whispered beneath her breath, "Polly will be so happy," and she kissed the little miniature, and her tears rained fast down upon it.

"And so am I happy," Jenny declared, later on in the evening, when, the miniature put away, there were only the stars to keep her company. "The two persons I love best on earth are happy through me, for Roger 'ud never have given me up, had I not bidden him go, and Polly 'ud never have taken him, if she'd known he'd been courting me. And I do feel," said Jenny, confiding in the stars, "as happy a girl as any in the town."

And that was so. Through all the village no happier girl said her prayers that night.

THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE.

CAME a merchantman of yore,
Seeking goodly pearls to store:
One he found, and straightway sold
All he had, that one to hold.

But another Merchant came Seeking pearls He knew by name,—
Seeking, gave His all for me;
Bought His treasure on the tree.

I, too, now, for Jesus Christ,
Look within for pearls unpriced:
Hid in heart and stored in mind,
But the merchantman must find.

Down beneath strong passion's tide,
Down where weeds of sin-growth hide;
Scarce discerned from what is base,
Yet how sweet the hidden grace!

Seek I many pearls to own,
These for crown, and those for throne?
All I have I sell to buy
One I find so fair to eye.

This the pearl all price above,
And I know who calls it love:
Faith and hope, bright gems they shine,
But the pearl is love divine.

Seeking many, finding one,
Finding all, thus lacking none,
Hold I each possession vain,
If I only this may gain.

Toiling on in life's swift whirl,
If I find this goodly pearl,
Till time's merchant own at last,
Heart, not hand, must hold it fast.

WILLIAM CHATTERTON D.D.

REDEMPTION NOT REPEATED IN ITS REVEALED FIGURES.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

THE world waited longer for the Lord's first coming than she will probably have to wait for his second. It was a long, dark nightwatch from the first Adam's fall to the second Adam's incarnation. Men heard the prophecies, and saw the types, and both gilded the cloud of their future with hope. The unity of its Author illustrates the unity of its operation—God is one, and his work one. Scripture defines the interposition of the Son of God on behalf of the sons of men under the four significant figures of “a washing, a justification, a ransom, and an atonement.” Let us mark how these all exclude the theory of a repeated sacrifice. The work of Christ, first, is called a washing, “the washing of regeneration” —“washed from our sins in Christ's own blood.” Not cleansings like ordinary washings, which need their repetition, like the daily sacrifice; for he (i.e., Christ) “needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself.” And in that one and only cleansing, purifying blood, we have his own blessed testimony, “he that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit.”

Had there been any Scripture warrant for the theory of repeated sin-offerings, or “a perpetual sacrifice” in the Christian economy, washing was the direct natural symbol under which to announce it. Hence, lest the emblem should be liable to such misconception, the work which it signifies is carefully limited, and defended against any trespass upon its abiding efficacy which might be implied in the metaphor, by the Saviour's special declaration, “He that is washed” (i.e., in my blood for the cleansing of the inner man) “needeth” no other, nor further washing, “save to wash his feet”—i.e., to cleanse himself from all filthiness of the flesh through the sins of the outer man. By the first washing, the character is changed, by other and repeated applications of the same blood, the conduct is purified, as it is written of the believer in Jesus, who “purifieth himself, even as he is pure.”

Secondly. The work of Christ is called a justification. “Through this man, by faith in this man, ye are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.” A plea is established by which sinners, otherwise “dead before God” (i.e., liable to capital conviction), are pronounced as clear from guilt as if, like their Divine Advocate, they had never sinned; and as free from condemnation as He was, who, “being raised from the dead, dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him.” The metaphor clearly implies that the justification needs no repetition, or otherwise the justified man would resemble a prisoner tried again for the offence of which he had been once honourably and fully acquitted. The law of man repeats neither its acquittals nor its penalties for the same offence; and shall the law of God be less just and high-minded than human statutes? God forbid! “There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus: for the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made them free from the law of sin and death.” “Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.” Then the singleness of the sacrifice is specially analogised with the singleness of death: “As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered.” There is as much sense or sound theology in a theory of repeated deaths of the sinner, as in repeated sacrifices for sin.

This proposition of the absolute and perpetual unity of the propitiation is confirmed, thirdly, by the designation of the work of Christ as a redemption—“Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold; . . . but with the precious blood of Christ.” Thus the redemption of a sinner, like that of a slave, is the paying down of his price, by which the property in the man is either transferred to the purchaser, or the bondman becomes free. But whoever heard of the price being demanded twice, or of the ceremony of the ransom being repeated? If the captive were free, there is nothing to ransom; if he were still in bondage, the act of emancipation is a cheat and delusion. Christianity is no such fraud; the Gospel ensures "liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison to them that were bound." Nor are these gracious manumissions of the heart, soul, and conscience, so many dreams of enthusiasm; "they are the words of truth and soberness." "If the Son shall make ye free, ye shall be free indeed." Nevertheless, the regained freedom may be compromised by the "cunning craftiness of men, whereby they lie in wait to deceive;" hence the need of the caution, "Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not entangled again with a yoke of bondage." Entangling dogmas multiply in these days, and require all our utmost circumspection and "watching unto prayer," to save our necks from old sacramental "yokes of bondage, which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear."

Their effect is to evaporate and fritter away the essence of truth, and leave the poor, carnal prodigal no resource but to "join himself to a citizen of that country," do his base menial work with the swine, and feed upon their husks till the moral hunger becomes intolerable. Then, in the forlorn depth of his penury and rags, there breaks through his broken heart the light of old and better memories of his father's house; and of the bread enough to eat and to spare.

Fourthly. The mediation of Jesus is called an atonement, or reconciliation: "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." It is not the repeated death, but the perpetual life of the Mediator, which is salvation: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood;" not faith in an "un-bloody sacrifice," nor in reiterated atonements, which, like the old typical "sacrifices, offered year by year continually, could not make the comers thereunto perfect," but "the bringing in of a better hope did." Had even the typical sacrifices possessed the saving efficacy of their great Antitype, "then would they not have ceased to be offered?" Clearly they would have ceased, "because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins." If, then, the Jewish sacrifices would not have been repeated had they possessed the power which dwelt alone in the sacrifice of Christ, is it not a monstrous contradiction to repeat the sacrifice of Christ himself? If such repetition was the result and evidence that those former priests had infirmity, and, therefore, their sacrifices imperfection, is it no disloyal ascription of both personal infirmity and piacular inefficacy, to repeat the sacrifice of the hypostatic union of Deity with the body and blood of Christ? Ah, sirs, these dogmatic rehearsals of the passion of the Saviour are most apt, easily and fatally, to glide into substitutions for the office of the Saviour himself. They divide Christ against Christ in such wise that his kingdom cannot stand upon such anomalies. The fallacy that pretends to do again what the Lord Jesus did once for all, is not far from the thought of the heart which would willingly, or perhaps unwittingly, do without him altogether. It is a subtle bridge of constructive transition from "the cup of the Lord to the cup of devils." Never was it more needful to examine ourselves, and prove our own selves, whether we be in the faith, or whether we be falling into fancies of the flesh.

Recapitulating our arguments, with a view to their concentration on the conclusion, we note that these four figures of washing, justifying, redeeming, and atoning, are the leading symbols under which Holy Scripture indicates the work of the Father's mercy in and through the functions of his Eternal Son. Consequently, the act on which the whole work of salvation must be seen to hinge, is that one in which all these beneficent processes of spiritual washing, justifying, redeeming, and atoning, meet and co-operate. Let us inquire, therefore, how and when and where the Lord Jesus paid down the ransom for our souls, and supplied us with a plea on which, as sinners, we could purify our souls from the stain of sin; by virtue of which we may claim acquittal from the charge of sin, and on the ground of which we can make an atonement of peace between us and God. These issues all directly point to, and converge in, the death of the Saviour, and confirm the uniform statements of Holy Scripture to the same effect. Hence the force of the passages: "Such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are cleansed." "For the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin." "Who is he that condemneth? It is God that justifieth." "For in due time Christ died for the ungodly." "That God may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and your spirit, which are God's." "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." "For the Lord hath laid on him" (as the scapegoat of a world of sin) "the iniquity of us all;" therefore "we joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement." "For he is our peace" (i.e., our peace-offering); by which oblation "we have access to God by a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." Thus the whole tenor of Scripture ascribes all our mercies, privileges, exemptions, and covenant inheritance, to the death of Jesus: and death is pre-eminently one. It is a single incident, or it is not death, but its counterfeit. Life is a continuous act, it is a repetition of sundry laws and operations of being; but death is an isolated instance in the individual life. No man, apart from miracle, dies twice, still less the Son of Man; "in that he died, he died unto sin once: in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Being raised from the dead, he dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." The oneness of the Mediator's death contradicts, with all its natural meaning and solemnity of implication, the repetitions of its supposed offering in a sacramental form. "The offence of the cross," as being a dying once for all, always was, and will be, the great hindrance to the reception of the Gospel by the self-righteous man; and always was, and will be, contemptible to the carnal intellect: but it always was, and will be, though "to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness," yet to every one that believeth "Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God."

God's inspired Word inseparably connects this purification, redemption, justification, and atonement, directly and specifically, with the shedding of the life-blood of Jesus. "The blood is the life." "The bread that I give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." It was necessary to make atonement for a broken law—death was the only satisfaction which the law of God, in profound fealty to its own holy requirements, and righteous vindication, could accept. Hence the Mediator became man that he might die. It was, indeed, the original ideal nature of man which Christ assumed—a nature not corrupted by sin, and so not in itself liable to death. His death was purely voluntary, because it was for others' sins he died. His death is our redemption, restoration, life.

Thus the whole spirit of Christianity, radiating from the death of Jesus as its great central truth, is opposed to any and every kind of multiplying of mediators and of sacrifices. They bring back, like an unnatural night, the darkness of the crucifixion, after its glorious dissipation by the morning of the resurrection. All such theories, of whatever kind or degree, are releases into "weak and beggarly elements"—anachronisms, based upon no "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," but upon carnal stumblings on the rudiments of the world." They are neither "strong meat for men" nor "milk for babes;" but "the old leaven" of "them who draw back unto perdition," not "of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

The immediate personal comfort of believing the Gospel, is its immediate undeferred salvation. Believing now, you are saved now. The salvation is perfect because its purchase is finished, its atonement accepted. God wants no more, why should man pretend to offer more? "By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Beware lest your offering interfere with his, or set aside his, and depreciate his. "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle." This tabernacle service is in various ways returning to many a careless house and heart, whence it had gone out, and the last state of that man is worse than the first. An apostate is always worse than one who had never believed.

Young and ardent readers of THE QUIVER, never was it more needful for every man, young or old, to try and "examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." You should bring to the test of prayer and Scripture your moral and religious sentiments, as well as your emotional sensations. Opinions need sifting as much as practices, for the practices are the fruit of the opinions; and, bad as these may be, evil practices, inconsistent with evangelical professions, are worse. These offend weaker brethren, are enemies within the camp of the cross of Christ, profane that holy name by which the backsliders are called, and "give occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme."

"Let not your good be spoken evil of," at all events, so far as your life and walk are concerned. Gainsayers will despise and libel the Gospel—that you cannot prevent, but you can prevent their having any evil thing to say of you. "Only let your conversation be such as becometh the Gospel of Christ," and then let the world rail on, and heresies withstand and misrepresent "the truth as it is in Jesus," the magnetic power of godly sincerity shall extort, even from your ungodly contemporaries, the acknowledgment that "God is in you of a truth."

Wait in hope and expectation for the fulfilment of the promise, when in the world's convictions, as in his Divine reality, "the Lord shall be one, and his name one," and all his people, and all people shall be his, "shall be called by his name." No more idolatry of sacraments, as so many saviours, nor vicarious deifications of ministers, by investing them with the incommunicable functions of their Master, constituting the sacerdotal order an elaborate sacrilege and trespass on the one eternal priesthood of the Mediator; a regenerate world will detect the imposition, and accept no other and inferior intercession between them and God, except His pontificate who is "consecrated for evermore," thereby harmonising in one glorious act of uniformity the adorations of the earthly with the heavenly hosts, both worlds bowing down at the same altar, to worship "Him that sitteth upon the throne, and the Lamb for ever and ever."

In the meantime, to be consistent with this anticipation, and true to the pledge of whole and undivided fealty and affection to "our Master and only Saviour," thus "dying for our sins and rising again for our justification," let our only repetitions, or rather spiritual assimilations of his death, consist in our own "dying unto sin, and rising again unto righteousness." Let us substitute for ritual processions of host, or symbol, a personal "bearing about the body of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our body;" so shall we best protest against the conflicting and fluctuating theories founded on any "other Gospel which is not another," and, resting our peace and comfort on the finished work of an alone Redeemer, be bold as Isaiah, and confident as the avowal of St. Paul: "Henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

By neither sacramental dogma, nor by personal incongruity, will I "crucify my Lord afresh, and put him," whether I would or no, "to an open shame;" no other crucifixion will I abide, beyond that by which "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Christ Jesus my Lord, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." That is the only cross which the Spirit of Jesus hath taught me to bear, as I look to his glory for my only crown! Infinitely subtle and diversified are the forms, visible and invisible, of the spirit of idolatry. "There be gods many, and lords many," and many sacraments, and many sacrifices are apt to slip down the inclined plane of creature-worship into so many gods and lords. "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord."

CHARITY.

I'VE met her wand'ring, seeking those in need,
Smiling with ethereal kindness. Blest—
How blest! how pure and holy in the deed
Of doing good, and thoughtless all of rest.

Easy to guile, unable to deny,
She gives her all, by all to falsehood doomed.

Still seeking and still sought for, she is found

Under the mask of age, of lovely youth

More oft, spreading her gifts to all the world around,
Heedless of birth, of beauty—only truth.

O give her truth! nor cheat her with the lie
Of poverty, of indigence assumed;

Where fearful fevers rage, and death grows rife,
Whence all are flown who soothe the sufferer's pain,
There have I found her, careless of the life
She saves for others—their ungrateful gain.

These deeds recorded, these received with joy,
With songs and music to the gladsome voice
Of saints in heaven, their constant time employ
In sweetest strains to her, their dearest choice.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER LI.

A FRUITLESS SEARCH.

IT was the morning of Tuesday, the 27th, and, from the quarter in the far east where he had spent the night with a manufacturer of his acquaintance, David Haldane hastened westwards through the streets of Paris, to explore the city in search of an address written down with care in a leaf of his pocket-book. He had already finished the business part of his visit, and there remained before him only pleasure. But he did not look like a pleasure-seeker—certainly not like a Parisian pleasure-seeker—as he traversed the streets at a still early hour. He was walking rapidly, with that springing gait which belongs, more or less, to the people of the hills, bearing down towards the quays, through the Faubourg St. Antoine. Then he seemed to notice that he was walking very fast, and checked himself. Smiling at his own impatience, he consulted his watch, and resolutely took to loitering. He noticed an immense number of idlers hanging about; but it was nothing unusual for an immense number of idlers to be hanging about there, so he passed them, with a glance of commiseration for the squalor and wretchedness in which they were condemned to live. As he came down upon the quay, there were idlers of a better class engaged in more or less exciting conversation; but, then, it was nothing unusual for Frenchmen to be excited. From some words which he caught in passing, he knew that they were discussing the ordonnances; and though he could not help smiling at their eagerness, it was with that peculiar thrill of sympathy which keen popular feeling creates.

He had his own private excitement too, which was sending the blood coursing through his veins more rapidly than usual. He was on his way to the presence of Miss Oglivie. There was her address, taken down from her own handwriting, as exhibited to him by Jean, in the corner of her last letter. He took it out and looked at it again, judging it time at last to proceed thither.

What he hoped for in this visit of his he did not ask himself. He did not, however, hope for any immediate result. He did not expect her to fling herself into his arms without more ado. He had gleaned enough of information respecting her father's character and circumstances, to know that she could neither be very prosperous nor very happy with him; but he knew well enough that this but increased instead of diminishing his difficulties. At all events, he would bring with him softening memories of home; he would be welcome to her, if only for their sake, and he would at least renew their relations with each other. The rest he must leave to fate and his own strong heart.

Arrived at the street, which, though a small back one in a close neighbourhood, he had little difficulty in finding, he was soon at the house indicated by the address, where he inquired for M. Oglivie. He was gone, madame too, whither the man could not tell. Could monsieur himself form any notion, as several inquiries had been made? and from the knowing look which accompanied the question, David Haldane understood that the inquiries had not been of the politest order.

He, of course, replied that he was a stranger, and knew nothing of their probable movements. "Was the young lady with them still?"

"Mademoiselle used to come daily," was the answer; "but she did not sleep there—she had apartments of her own."

It seemed quite mysterious, and there was no key to the mystery, no clue to any further search.

Bitterly disappointed, he turned away. The sun no longer shone for him; the river no longer smiled. It seemed as if the world had suddenly gone into eclipse, so dull was all its brightness. He strolled on, without any particular object, and came into the Rue St. Honoré. He was looking into the windows in a listless fashion, not that they interested or amused him, but simply because it gave him an opportunity of lingering near, and thinking whether there was any possibility of finding any one by chance in a great city.

He was looking into the window of a print-shop, when he felt his attention suddenly aroused, and his thoughts carried back to the fir-clad slopes of the Strathie. The picture which had done this was a representation of a little hill, clothed and crowned with fir-trees, just like those at home. He examined it more attentively. There was snow upon the ground, its softness and brightness beautifully indicated, as well as its dazzling white. The sky was bluer and more ethereal than it ever is—except at rare intervals—in the cloudy North, and against the sky the dark branches of the trees rose in the form of a cathedral window. Yes, there could be no doubt about it, it was one of the hills he had seen at home—it was Delaube.

He entered the shop at once, and desired to see the drawing. On examining it closely, there was a small cipher in the corner, which stood for the initial of the artist. When he had purchased the drawing, he said to the shopman, "This is the work, I believe, of a lady whom I am anxious to find, can you give me her address?"

The shopman, with great politeness, produced the address. It was the same as that which he had already, and which had proved useless.

On hearing this the man further explained that the young lady, the last time she had called, promised to return in a day or two, and might therefore possibly call that very day.

"I am staying close at hand," said David Haldane; "I shall leave the drawing with you. Keep it in the window, and take it down when she calls, that I may give you as little trouble as possible. I will also leave my card, which you will kindly give her, and ask her to leave her new address with you."

The man cheerfully promised to do as requested, and David Haldane went away, rejoicing in his good fortune, having unconsciously taken the very means which would prevent the object he had in view. He had not been gone half an hour when she whom he sought passed by, and with a wistful glance at the shopwindow, passed on despairingly.

David Haldane wandered about restlessly all day, dined at his hotel in the Rue de Rohan, which crossed at right angles the Rue St. Honoré, and wandered forth again. He hovered about the quarter, straying into the galleries of the Louvre, crossing the Pont Neuf, and spending half an hour in Notre Dame, and finding himself more than once passing the same shop, where the drawing he had purchased still kept its place in the window.

The day had been almost intolerably bright and hot, and it was no wonder that in the cool of the evening nobody should think of going indoors. The workshops were emptied, and the workpeople were not going home; the shops were closed, but the streets got fuller and fuller. Everybody was out, and the crowds passing on to the quays, where, of course, it was cooler than anywhere else, and where the free space of the broad river allowed them to breathe a fresher air, soon became a continuous stream. David Haldane recognised some of his friends of the Faubourg St. Antoine, not by the faces of individuals, but by the general bearing of groups. These had an individuality of their own; stunted stature and keen intellect, both famine-bred, made their movements more swift and savage than those of the better artisans.

But they were evidently moved with a common impulse towards fraternisation on the evening in question, group communicating with group as they passed along. As the evening advanced, it was clear that something unusual was going forward, but not till the moment for action arrived was even this apparent.

Then, a whole city had risen against its government. Paris was in arms.

To an onlooker the whole thing appears inexplicable—confounding. The king's ordonnances are issued on Monday, and the people are stupefied for a moment. Then they pass from stupefaction to displeasure, from displeasure to indignation, from indignation to a determination to resist: and all this not individually, but collectively, and in a single day! The next day they carry their determination into effect, not by means of a compact organisation, but by the spontaneous movement of the whole population of Paris, seemingly without communication or concert.

But they are comparatively unarmed, and there are in Paris 12,000 men, the élite of one of the finest armies the world ever saw, and their first movement is, therefore, to obtain arms. David Haldane saw a compact body of workmen—they might have been from one shop or yard, so accustomed did they seem to act together—with the utmost coolness break open a gunsmith's shop, and distribute the contents, first among their own members, then, as far as they would go, among the crowd: and the same thing was going on elsewhere in the city, with the same deliberate and yet almost unpremeditated design.

The soldiers of government were on the alert; troops were being concentrated round the several palaces, and lancers were sweeping the streets in the vicinity of the Palais Royal; but as yet there had been no fatal collision between the soldiers and the people, and David Haldane once more entered his hotel.

Some of its windows commanded a portion of the Rue St. Honoré, and he had returned with the intention of watching the movements of the mass from thence. On entering he was told that a lady, a countrywoman, desired to speak with him. His heart gave a bound at the intelligence: he felt sure that it must be Peggy who had sought him, and sought him in a time of danger when it was possible that he might serve, even save her. He hastened to meet her, following the servant to the door of a private room.

A lady rose to meet him—certainly not the one he sought—a little grey-haired, bright-eyed woman, who advanced in much excitement, in which, however, there was nothing of fear. She spoke with a rapid utterance.

"I thought I might claim the protection of a countryman," she said. "We are Scotch, and I knew from your name in the hotel-book that you were Scotch also. My niece and I are travelling home from Italy. She is ill. I fear this excitement will kill her. Our window looks down upon a perfect sea of people, and they are getting more and more excited every moment. They will soon be behaving like lunatics, as they are. Is there any way of getting out of the city to-night?"

"I fear it is quite impossible," he replied. "From what I have seen, you would encounter worse than you would escape from here. I dare say peace will be restored before morning; and in the meantime I will gladly exchange rooms with you. Mine is high up, and at the back of the house, and you will be quite quiet up there, while I shall hear and see all that is going on. In the morning I will assist you in any way that I can."

"Will you come and see my niece? It will reassure her greatly, and we will thankfully accept your offer," said the lady.

He passed into another room, which was a bedroom as well as sitting-room, and found there a lovely creature, evidently on the verge of another world. Her cheeks were hollow and burning, their hectic deepened by the excitement of watching the people in the street, and her eyes blazed like stars. Her thin hands were strained together, and she was altogether in a condition which required the greatest care. David Haldane was at once interested and filled with pity. He spoke to her with a quiet assurance of safety; but she turned upon him with a luminous and yet wavering smile, and told him that she did not care for safety—that she had too little of life left to seek to husband it.

"Yet, for your aunt's sake," he said, "you will try. She would be better in a quieter room, and I have offered mine in exchange for yours."

She looked at her companion inquiringly. There was entreaty in her eyes.

"Oh, yes, if you wish, dear aunty; but I am sure I shall not sleep now."

At length it was agreed that they should adjourn to David Haldane's room, and that he should come to them from time to time with reports till the streets were a little quieter. Of that there appeared, however, very little prospect. Up from the human sea there came an ever-deepening roar; and there ran through it at intervals great waves of disturbance, as communications passed along the living channel. It seemed as if there would be little of sleep in Paris city on that July night.

CHAPTER LII.

GUILTY.

In the room to which David Haldane escorted the ladies he found a letter awaiting him, and after making them as much at their ease as was possible under the circumstances, he begged permission to open it, as it was a letter from home. It was in the handwriting of a clerk, and he expected only a business-like missive, informing him that all was going on satisfactorily—a statement which the absent master craves for, and yet knows to be about as unsatisfactory as general statements usually are.

The missive was there, worded exactly as he knew it would be worded. Everything was going on well, so well as almost to convey the idea that they went on all the better for his absence. But there was an enclosure strangely enough, addressed to Miss Oglivie. It was sent to his care by Miss Margery Oglivie, who was to be greatly obliged to Mr. Haldane if he would deliver it soon and safely into the hands of her young relative.

Concerning this letter, it is necessary to go back to the night when Captain Oglivie was seized with brain fever. His mother and Margery watched him throughout its creeping hours, sleeping a little as they could by turns. An expression of unusually deep concern was on the doctor's face as he came out of the patient's room, where he left him with Mrs. Oglivie, in order to give Margery a freer opinion of his case than it was possible to give to his nearly distracted mother. He was dangerously ill, and would be worse before the disease was at its height. The doctor recommended that a nurse should be procured before the crisis came on, if possible, one who could be trusted with—and the good man hesitated—with any family secret.

Before the day was done, Margery knew the meaning of the hint the words conveyed. The delirious man was in the midst of the burning house, re-enacting his part in the scene of the preceding night, answering accusing voices heard by his ear alone, shouting out, "Who says I am guilty of murder?" "How do you know I could have saved him?" "Let him perish; my life is surely worth ten such lives as his." "I must have the money." These, and other exclamations, repeated over and over again, mixed up with the name of Mr. Haldane, came from that terrible sick-bed; and Margery determined, in the strong magnanimity which lay at the foundation of her character, that no ear save her own should listen to that self-accusing, unconscious voice.

She was glad when poor Mrs. Oglivie, who was helpless at all times, fairly broke down and took to her bed. There was only the doctor whom it was necessary to trust, and who could be trusted, and she would try her own strength to the utmost before she yielded. When the doctor came again in the afternoon, she announced her determination, and very reluctantly he felt obliged to acquiesce.

"It is terrible," he said, pressing her hand, and, accustomed as he was to suffering of all kinds, he could not look at her for a mist of stinging tears; "but he may be accusing himself falsely," he added. "It is often the case in delirium: the patient accuses himself of crimes he never committed. Poor fellow, he may have made every effort to save your brother, and, conscious of failure, thinks he has not made enough. It is dreadful for you, very dreadful, but I honour your resolution to stay by him. The phase may soon pass over. If necessary, I will spend the night with him myself."

It would have been quite possible to have accepted the doctor's explanation of the words to which Captain Oglivie gave utterance, and it was readily accepted by his mother; but an incident of the afternoon brought to Margery a terrible confirmation of her doubts on the subject.

She was called out of the room, happily, when her patient was lying exhausted. Her little serving-lad had employed himself in poking about among the ruins, and had found something which he wished to deliver to her. It was an old-fashioned escritoire, which he carried in his arms. The lad had not much reason to congratulate himself, it seemed, on the value of his discovery, for his mistress received him and dismissed him harshly, though he expected praise, if not reward; for the box, as he called it, had been Miss Janet's, and all the servants knew that everything of hers was precious. It had the name "Janet" engraved on a plate of silver on the top.

But before he had left the house he was recalled, and questioned closely as to the finding of the writing-desk. It had been full of papers; now it was empty, rifled of its contents, and yet the fire had not passed upon it. Then his mistress went on to ask him what he had seen on the night of the fire.

The boy had been, like other boys, though by no means a brilliant specimen of the class, pretty nearly ubiquitous. He had seen everything that happened. His hero was evidently David Haldane, whose movements he had closely followed. Margery found that the servants were saying, it would have been better if David Haldane had not followed Captain Oglivie, but had tried the ladders at first. The boy had seen the two men descend from the window under which the writing-desk was found, and he had then followed David Haldane, and lost sight of Captain Oglivie.

Still, they might have thrown out the desk before they descended, and, in the confusion, it might have been robbed of its contents by some villager who had come to see the fire. Its contents were worthless in themselves—bundles of old, yellow letters, chiefly from Sir Alexander Oglivie to his daughters—sad remembrancers of long-past trials and sorrows. Not a single love-token, or letter, could the sisters boast between them among the relics of their youth. But in this desk of her sister's Margery had deposited the letters of Louis Oglivie to his wife, and the other papers received from Gilbert on his death-bed. These she would have given much to be able to restore to their rightful owner.

The escritoire had rested on the top of an ancient chest of drawers; and on a piece of furniture exactly similar, only that it was placed in a recess of the room, had rested one exactly like it. Both the drawers and the desks had belonged to the sisters from their early days, and the other desk was marked with the name "Margery" in the same fashion as the one now found. Margery's desk had, however, contained a considerable sum of money in Scotch bank-notes, and other things of material value.

On the first night of her watch by the bed of Captain Oglivie, Margery had noticed that the grate was full of the black remains of burnt paper, and that the whole hearth was strewn with the same. These were now swept away, and there remained nothing to show that Captain Oglivie had possessed himself of the papers, and so to set at rest the horrible doubt that remained on Margery's mind.

It was, however, destined to be set at rest speedily. In putting away the clothes that he had worn, the bundle of letters which were weighing on Margery's mind fell out of one of the pockets, and, with a shock which even her firm nerves were not proof against, she picked it up and hid it away. A few nights later she saw the unhappy man, whose life had just been spared, rise from his bed, and proceed to search for that same bundle. The watcher had been half dozing in her chair, and seeing him rise and totter across the floor, she judged it best to remain perfectly still, as the least excitement might bring on a relapse. Not finding what he looked for, he put his hand to his head, and, tottering back again, fell fainting on his bed.

Captain Oglivie's return to life and reason was more painful to Margery than even his illness had been. How was she to deal with him, when he had partially recovered? She dared not reproach him while he lay in his weakness on that bed, where he had suffered tortures, such as no human power could inflict; she dared not even tell him all she knew, because of the danger of relapse; though, as she watched him, she thought that it might even be a relief to him, to know that he had unconsciously unburdened himself of his terrible secret. She longed to say, "I know and forgive, even as God knows, and is ready to forgive." It was well that she had witnessed his sufferings, or she might not have felt thus towards him—might not have felt inclined to spare him as she did.

But he could not bear to see her, and manifested this so painfully on his return to consciousness, that she gave place at once to his mother. His first words to her were:—"Is he gone?"

"Is who gone?" she asked; but from the expression of his face she gathered that he meant the dead man, and answered, "Yes, he is gone."

"I have been ill a long time," he said.

"Not a very long time, it is only nine days."

"Has anything happened?" he asked in a sinking voice.

"Nothing," she answered, "except the funeral." He seemed to breathe more freely.

"Margery has nursed you through it all," said his mother.

"It is kind of her," he whispered, faintly.

"I did not think she could have been so kind," she replied.

There was a pause, and then he said, "We must go away from this place, mother."

"Yes, my dear," she answered, mechanically.

"We must go away as soon as I can move," he repeated, eagerly.

Another secret of the sick man's had come into Margery's possession, and that was his debt to David Haldane, and she seized the first opportunity of seeking an interview with the latter. She demanded, bluntly, to know how much, including interest, the debt amounted to; and David Haldane told her what was the sum total of money lent, but utterly refused to receive the interest, and was paid on the spot.

"I wish I could have seen your nephew," said Margery; "I owe him more than I can ever pay."

The old man explained that he had gone to Paris. In the course of their further talk, it came out that he had carried with him the address of Louis Oglivie's daughter, and at Margery's request, David Haldane promised to forward a letter for her to his nephew's care.

This was the letter which lay waiting David Haldane at his hotel, on the evening of the 27th of July; in it Margery recalled her young relative, and offered her, under very different circumstances, a home with her. She was about to take up her abode at Oglivie Castle, and seeing that there was room enough in it for a whole clan of Oglivies, she desired her to ask her father and step-mother to accompany her thither.

THE KIND-HEARTED FISHER-BOY.

SOME little children—girls as well as boys, I am grieved to say—have a very dangerous habit of looking down upon people that are not quite so well dressed, or so rich as themselves.

Again, most children—of course there are some happy exceptions—feel inclined to laugh at an old man or woman who is feeble, or peculiar in appearance. Children of a higher grade content themselves with laughing and sneering at them, while children of the very poor, or dirty and ragged class, who are not particular to observe the outward decent forms of society, manifest their feelings by throwing mud or stones at the unfortunate old people.

Now I am going to tell you a little story of a boy who, although he was poor and uneducated, and had had no "bringing up" to speak of, was yet possessed of sufficient goodness and wisdom to defend the helpless, and to protect the weak against the strong. In short, he was gifted with the highest and truest politeness, that springs from a good, noble, manly heart. But you shall judge for yourselves, and see how unexpectedly this kind-heartedness was rewarded.

A good many years ago, at a small watering-place called Shoresea, there were a number of fisher-boys, fine, sturdy, brown specimens of humanity, full of health, and life, and spirits. When they were not at sea, they were always down on the beach throwing the shining pebbles into the sea, or paddling in the water with their bare feet. But the generality of these boys, I am sorry to say, were not polite. You see they had never been taught manners, and if they had gentle mothers and sisters, they were scarcely ever at home with them. They got up with the sun, in the fresh air of the morning, and swallowed a scanty breakfast, and off they were to the water; and when they came home at night they ate their suppers—if they had any to eat—and tumbled into bed, without so much as saying their prayers, I am afraid.

There was one happy exception to this rule, I am glad to tell you, and his name was Harry Dingle; and although he was as short, and broad, and healthy, and brown as the rest, yet he was as gentle as a delicate girl could be.

You never heard him swear like the other boys, nor gibe and jeer at the old fishwomen who walked about Shoressea with men's high boots on, and short blue petticoats. No, as I said before, he was very gentle. Shall I tell you why I think it was so?

He had a sister at home, a poor little cripple, whom he loved very much; indeed, she was the only human being he had in the world to love. They were all alone in the wide world, poor little creatures. Their father had been drowned, and their mother had died of a broken heart, so people said, and the two children could just remember her pale face, and how she used to get up in the night when it was stormy, and watch the sea for hours, and cry.

You may imagine how lonely the poor little sister was all day long, lying on a hard wooden couch with nothing to do; but Harry ran home as often as he could, and every spare penny he had he saved for her. She was passionately fond of flowers, she tended them as carefully as if they had been living things, and watched them with the most intense interest as she lay on her little couch for the greater part of the long day. She could only move about very little, poor little Jenny, and yet she was rich in her brother's love and her flowers. Some of us strong, hearty ones would be glad of that much.

But I must not forget Harry. I am going to tell you how his politeness, which always made him feel happy, was the means of very great good fortune, both to him and his sister.

One bright August morning, very early, before breakfast a long time, an old woman, very strangely dressed, with a coarse blue bag slung over her left shoulder and under her right arm, appeared on the beach, and after watching the sea for some time, stooped down, and was apparently searching for curious pebbles.

Her costume was certainly remarkable: her dress was very short, and made of the largest possible patterned chintz; her mantle was of black silk, and reached almost to the bottom of her dress; her bonnet, oh! I could not describe her bonnet. It was one of those they called coal-scuttles, and the largest and most frightful of its kind. It was covered with a large white veil, of the most costly and expensive lace; but it was very yellow, and not much to look at to people who did not understand that sort of thing.

As soon as the fisher-boys perceived this strange figure they set up a shout of derision, and some of them even went so far as to run up to her and twitch her mantle. One rude fellow actually bawled out to her—

"How much a yard did you pay for your dress, old girl? I should like to buy some like it for my sweet-heart."

Harry Dingle was at some distance, but hearing the shouts, and seeing the crowd of boys, and the poor bewildered woman in the midst, he guessed the "wind was in the mischief quarter," as he said, and hastened to the spot.

"Can't you let the poor old woman alone?" he shouted. "What mean-spirited creatures you must be, to fix on an old lady like that! Why, Jack Stiles, I'm ashamed of you. Look here now," he continued, as the boys did not seem inclined to leave off, but were about to attack the old lady again—"look here, if you boys don't let the poor old soul alone, I'll fight every mother's son of you, one after the other."

Then, turning to the old lady, he said, "What are you looking for, ma'am? Pebbles? Don't you be frightened; they shan't hurt you while I'm here;" and he turned such a bold and determined front to the boys, who were in a group at a little distance, that they thought discretion was the better part of valour, and marched off.

"We don't want no rows with 'Arry," said Jack Stiles; "but I never see such a chap as he is for interfering with larks."

"No more did I," said Bob Giles; "but we made the old gal pant, didn't us, Jack?" and the friends walked off, laughing.

Meanwhile the old lady had thanked Harry for his service, in a very kind tone, at the same time talking very angrily about the other fisher-boys.

"Young barbarians!" she said—"how dare they insult a lady who chooses to amuse herself by collecting pretty pebbles?"

"Do you like pretty pebbles, ma'am?" said Harry; "here is a beauty;" and he took a beautiful stone out of his pocket and gave it her. "I picked this up coming along, ma'am," he said: "you may have it, if you like. I did mean to give it to Jenny; but she has lots more something like it."

"Thank you," said the old lady, as she dropped the pebble into her blue bag; "and who is Jenny?"

"Jenny, ma'am, is my poor little sister. She's a cripple; and pebbles, or flowers, or any pretty things like that, please her very much indeed."

"To be sure—to be sure," said the old lady. "A cripple, eh! How sad to be sure, very sad! A cripple, and so poor." Then she turned round full upon Harry, and said, "I should like to see Jenny—can't you take me now?"

"If you like, ma'am," said Harry; "but it's a very poor place, very poor indeed. Perhaps you wouldn't like to go there; but it's very clean, for though poor Jenny cannot do much, our neighbours are very kind, and wash the room and make everything so bright and clean. The poor are very good to each other, ma'am—very good, when they are really kind people."

"Yes, I believe they are sometimes—I believe they are," replied the old lady; "and, as for your poor place, so long as it's clean, I've no objection to the poverty of it."

"Well, ma'am, then I'll take you now, if you like," said Harry.

"Yes—yes, by all means."

The old lady had a great fashion of repeating her words and sentences. So off they went, away from the beach, where the fisher-boys were discussing them, through the narrow streets, till they came to the place where Harry and his sister lived.

"This is our street ma'am," said Harry.

"Oh! answered the old lady, "what a smell of fish!" and she put a scented handkerchief to her nose.

At last they came to the house where Harry and his sister lived. "What a beautiful show of flowers to be sure!" exclaimed the old lady, looking at the window; "why, I haven't a rose-tree in my whole garden to compare with that."

"That's my sister's rose, ma'am," replied Harry, "and that's Jenny singing; hasn't she a sweet voice?"

"Yes, very," replied the old lady.

Then they went in, and up the rickety, dark old stairs, and entered the room where little Jenny was lying on her couch by the window, with the sweet smell of roses, and stocks, and mignonette blowing upon her pale face. The old lady was very kind, and talked away to Jenny and her brother for at least half an hour. As for Jenny, she was charmed with her; she did not notice her peculiar look after the first glance, she was so pleasant and chatty. She told Harry to come to her house on Sparlton Terrace the next morning, and she would give him a beautiful calceolaria for his sister.

Jenny was quite sorry when the old lady went. She even kissed Jenny's forehead and patted Harry on the head, and at the door she gave him a card, and said—

"Oh, here is my address. You will see my name on this card. Don't forget the flower to-morrow."

Harry took the card, and let the old lady out; then he rushed back to his sister's room, and shouted—

"Why, Jenny, she's a real lady; see here's a card with it all on;" and he showed Jenny the piece of pasteboard, whereon was written, "Lady Silvermoat, 4, Sparlton Terrace."

Harry knew that the houses in Sparlton Terrace were the best for miles round, and that No. 4 was the best of all.

The next morning Harry washed his face till it shone like polished deal, and Jenny put on a nice clean collar over his Sunday suit, and with fear and trepidation he knocked at the great door of No. 4. It was opened by an immensely tall footman in undress, who said, in awful, pompous tones, which chilled poor Harry to the very marrow—

"Ho! you're the boy as my lady hordered to call; step in, young man, and 'ere's the calcilary as you was to take;" so saying, and thrusting the pot into Harry's arms, he opened the door, and as Harry was going down the steps he called after him: "My lady's not hup yet."

Harry was rather disappointed; but Lady Silvermoat's kindness did not stop here by a great deal. She was a very eccentric old lady, but, like a good many more eccentric people, she was very charitable, and, fortunately, had the means to be as charitable as she chose. She had a couch-like carriage made for poor Jenny, and the tall footman used to drag her about in it, much to his own disgust and the amusement of the aforesaid fisher-boys.

Harry was sent to an excellent school in London, and afterwards placed in Her Majesty's navy, and when last we heard of him, he had attained the rank of post-captain, had married a wife, and was as happy as love and a clear conscience could make him. Twice every year he goes down to Shoresea, to see the graves of two people very dear to him—his beloved sister and his kind benefactress. They lie side by side in the little churchyard, within sound of the rolling sea that they both loved so much, covered with pebbles and flowers by the loving hand of Captain Harry Dingle, R.N.

"I paused to look at the happy picture."—p. 333.

SHADOWS.

I AM a solitary being. I live in a large the glorious, warm-hearted North, three-and-southern town; possibly the first adjective twenty years ago, and they have died or gone to is an ample explanation of my first statement; far countries, and my hand has lost the feel of and I have no friends, not one. I left them all in loving, earnest clasps, and my ears are strangers to words, tender and true, which used to make such ceaseless music in this weary heart. Perhaps this is my own fault, but so it is.

One side of the road of life is shady, and the other sunny. Some people walk most on the sunny side, and some scarcely ever quit the shade. I have walked in the shade these twenty-three years, but let that pass; it is not of my own sorrows I would speak now, and I have had my day; the sunshine was mine once.

One of my idiosyncrasies is a love for walking abroad after dark. I cannot walk much in the day; I have work to do. In this work I am absorbed, and I am content; for absorption is almost happiness. Women who are denied the more natural and beautiful life of home-duty, ought to find some such work. They would be an immeasurably nobler class of people, if they could divest themselves of the idea that there is but one sphere for a woman, and out of that she is, and can be, nothing.

There is a broad street not far from the square where I live, down which I pass every evening in my wanderings. Some of the houses are small, and others are very large and handsome. When I first went to and fro, I noticed at the lower window of one of the small houses the shadow of a man upon the white blind. Three nights of every week he was there reading. On the other four nights there was no light. Sometimes as I passed he would move across the room, and I saw that he was tall, well-built, and what is generally called a fine young man. After some months, the room was dark, and apparently untenanted, for two or three weeks. At the end of that time I was rejoiced, on turning the corner of the street at the usual time, to see the window brilliantly illuminated. Standing just within it were two figures, whose shadows fell full upon the blind. The tall young man holding close in his arms a slight figure in bonnet and cloak, and stooping tenderly to see her face half-hidden on his shoulder. I paused to look at the happy picture.

O graceful loving shadows! God's smile be on you! Presently she drew herself gently away and went swiftly out of sight, leaving him where he stood. How attractive that window was to me! How long I lingered before it, night after night, just to see them sitting together, he reading while she worked, or now and then she reading to him, while he rested in an easy chair. This peaceful scene was sometimes varied; other shadows fitted across the blind, or sat in their seats, and I caught no glimpse of my friends. Once it was varied in a different and not so pleasant a manner. The shadow of the young man came and went quickly on the blind. He was pacing up and down, angrily, it seemed, for he pushed his hands hastily up into his hair from time to time. She was sitting at work so close to the window, that I marked the determined pose of her little head and the set expression of her face. It was not long, however, not a minute, before she laid down her work and went to him; first taking both his hands, looking up into his face, and then throwing her hands round him, and clinging to him, as if to say, "Never—never—never more shall any discord arise between us."

I turned for a last look at the corner of the street. They were still standing together; his hand, so lately angry, was fondling her bent head. Ah! second shadow-caress, more beautiful than the first, because witnessing of a love built upon a rock, which storms of anger cannot shake, which the keen wind of mutual fault cannot blow down, but only make more steadfast and more sure.

The months passed on; a little wearily for me, not wearily to my shadow-friends, I sometimes thought with a sigh; and then the manly shadow sat alone for several nights, or the blind was blank, however long I watched. It was very wet weather. I struggled against wind and rain up the street, but never forgot to look up as I passed that house. At last I was rewarded by seeing his companion sitting by him again, though now she was reclining in the easy chair. She was looking down at something in her arms. He rose and stood by her. She lifted the something up towards his face. He put his lips to it very, very gently, took it in his arms for a moment, and returned it to the mother's waiting knees. I dreamed of that baby all night. The face I imagined it to have rose ceaselessly before me, and I woke holding out my arms with an indescribable longing to take it. For some days I was possessed with the womanly weakness which envies another woman that sweetest of all earth's sweet possessions—a frail, tiny, helpless baby.

During four or five years my shadows scarcely changed in their habits, or as it seemed in themselves. But they were gradually surrounded by more little shadows, fitting to and fro, now romping together, now climbing on to fatherly or motherly knees, now disappearing from down-stairs, and appearing again in an upper room. Sometimes in that upper room the shadow-mother would be moving about when I passed from home, and be still there when I repassed, and the light would be dim, and the child-shadows down-stairs would be restrained by the father's hand from making too much noise. There was illness. I saw this once for a long time, and then I missed one child-shadow; there used to be four, now there were never more than three.

Soon after this, I came one night and found the house shut up, I was distressed, fearing I had lost my friends. Three successive evenings I went past, and was then quite assured that they were gone. But, happening to glance up as I passed one of the large houses, I refound my shadows. There they all were; I knew them again instantly. Prosperity was theirs, for none but rich people lived in those mansions, and these friends of mine had love with it. Could any sight be more pleasant to look upon? Alas! there are some flowers which are fair and strong in morning sunshine, but the glory of the noon is too much for them, and they fade upon the burning lea; and there are some men whose goodness will not stand the noontide of wealth and honour. A change came over the shadow-household. The wife sat alone with her children night after night. His shadow fell upon the blind scarce once a week, and when there, it was restless; it seemed to find no happiness in the old seat at her side. Often, too, there was merry-making, and the whole house was lighted up. Did she carry a heavy heart about with her among her guests, and in her daily duties? Oh, poor shadow-wife! I guessed so, and it seemed I was not wrong: for one night he rose impatiently from his seat, as if the quiet was intolerable to him. She sprang up, stayed him with her hand on his arm, pointed to the children, laid her hand on his shoulder, caressed his hand. He threw back his head with a mocking gesture—woman's fears are foolish—but he kissed her and sat down again. When I passed homewards she was alone. I turned away. I shuddered, as the fancy swept over my heart: What if my joy so brief, so incomplete, had been consummated like theirs, and then he had changed? This thought held me so, and brought the shadow-trouble so close home to myself, that I could not rest, and I often went out very late, and stole into that street, to see if she were at her sorrowful post; and often, God pity her! she was there, at midnight, with her head bowed upon her hands. Now and then, as time went on, there was a little shadow by her—the shadow of a little girl about ten years old—sitting by the tired mother; and it was pitiful to see how the child-head was turned, listening, towards the window at the slightest sound outside. Shadow-father, do you ever think of the gloom you have brought upon her childhood, which should have been so gay? do you ever think how you have sullied the beauty of that grand name “father” to her innocent heart?

I was weary of my anxiety and sorrow for the shadow-wife, who moved about more slowly and despairingly day by day, when that anxiety and sorrow had a sudden ending. For many successive nights she sat motionless, neither working nor reading, nor even noting her little daughter's movements. Not one of all those nights found him at her side. At last I came, to find them gone. The window was deserted. I looked up, and on the blind of a bedroom saw distinctly the shadow of a coffin on its trestles; a long coffin, far too long for any child. Was it hers or his? Had the forlorn heart found its rest in the love which changes not nor wanes? or had he been stricken down in the midst of his carelessness, bringing her sorrow upon sorrow? These questions passed rapidly through my mind as I gazed up, hoping the survivor, whichever it might be, would come to weep there, and I should have my doubts set at rest. But no one came. And four other nights I watched in vain; there was no shadow anywhere, but that one awful, mournful, death-shadow. Then it was no longer there; but below was the shadow of one bowed down with grief, one who suffered not only in his bereaved affections, but in his awakened conscience—awakened too late—one who let the book fall from his hands in remorseful reverie, one who walked the room with heavy steps and dejected head.

So she it was who had passed away. Could I sorrow for her any more, poor thing? could I regret that she had been so quickly and quietly removed from earth's hard winter of neglect and pain, to the eternal, heavenly summer? No; I was comforted when I knew her safe, though I missed her shadow, as one misses a well-known face or voice; that shadow which, lost to my view, must have haunted all his dreams waking or sleeping. Only twelve short years ago he had stood in the window, holding her, his bright, blooming, tender bride, as though she were dearer than life itself. She had not been dearer than his own selfish enjoyment, and this was the end. Ah! me, we jest about heartaches in this frivolous world; but there are such things in every house, and they are not easy to bear.

I saw with satisfaction that the uprightness and vigour of the lonely shadow did not return to him; he sat, month after month, every evening, not a yard from the spot where she had kept her weary vigil, while he had been madly blind to her happiness and his own duty. The little attendant shadow, which had been so faithful to her, was almost always with him; but it was long before she learned to draw near him trustfully, or to caress him lovingly. However, there came a time at last, when I could tell if she were entering the room, long before her shadow fell upon that blind, which had revealed so much to me, by the eager uplifting of his head. They bent over the table hour after hour together, and the movements of his hand seemed to indicate that he was explaining things to her. Loss and gain are curiously inwrought in the web of life; she had lost a mother, and gained a father. Neither of them ever sat in the mother's place. By-and-by, instead of a small child-shadow, there sat by him a tall maiden with a regal head and graceful movements, like the lost wife and mother in her happy days, only far less sprightly. There was but one other shadow then with these two—a child-shadow—except at times, when a boyish, quick, ever-moving figure was to be seen leaning on the father's chair, or upsetting the sister's work. Gradually, this boy-shadow grew more manly, and fell into his father's habit of pacing the room, when the girl's head would be lifted up to watch him, and the father would sit forward in his chair, making earnest gestures. After many such scenes, his shadow scarcely ever came near theirs, or within my view; and if it came near hers, or his, it was not to talk to him, or to tease her, as in the old times, but simply to pass as if he cared nothing for their presence. Then his shadow never came at all, and the father's head was bowed down again, and the maiden-shadow moved about very quietly and sadly. Was she never to walk in the sunshine? I grew impatient at her lot, beautiful in charity as it was, and angry at the want of discernment in men, who could pass her over, and spend their love, which might have made her life so bright, upon foolish and vain girls, or at least, on girls totally unworthy to be compared with her, sweet gentle home-shadow!

For when the impatient youth had been at home, there had often been other young manly shadows at her side, invited, as I divined, to win him back to his filial duty. I had not grumbled long, when I noticed two of these same shadows with the father and daughter; sometimes one alone, sometimes both together. I noticed that one was taller than the other, and that the lesser one was oftenest by her chair, and that she talked much more to him than to the other. From this I instinctively guessed that her heart was with that other. After a time the shorter shadow disappeared. Then I was ill, and unable to go out for a fortnight. I had missed several weeks at various times before, when I had sought recreation in the country, or been too unwell to pursue my ordinary track; but this had never before happened at any very interesting point in my shadow-studies, and I was very anxious to be out again. When I was able to do so, I saw only the two shadows, of father and daughter—never either of the others. Many weeks had passed like this, when one night he suddenly looked up from his book. What did he say—what thought had flashed across him, that her head drooped so over her work? He leant forward—took both her hands. Her head drooped lower and lower. She lifted it once for a moment to look into his face, that was all. Then he let go her hands, and held out his arms, and she sprang into them, and lay close to his fond, father's heart, weeping, as I knew from his soothing care. I left them so and went home. The next evening, the taller lover was in the father's seat, bending over her busy hands, and now and then stopping them with a young man's earnest fondness. Presently the father's stooping shadow came between me and them, and he laid an affectionate hand on each, and looked from one to the other. Are these things too imperfect to be understood? I say no. That noble shadow-girl sent her lover away, though all her maiden thoughts went after him, because she would not leave the father, who, though kind now, once spoilt her childhood and broke her mother's heart. All happiness follow her, now he is brought to her by that father, who is saying something to the young man—what, perhaps the reader can tell. Listen to him, O young lover-shadow, as he speaks of his fault and its bitter punishment, and never be tempted to leave her to such weary, weary hours of loneliness!

To-night I look up at that blind. The father sits in his old place, with a baby-shadow on his knees. Husband and wife are sitting together in the mother's corner. Presently she rises and stoops over some one farther in the room. This she does once or twice; then she comes slowly forward with a tall, gaunt figure leaning on her arm. She helps him tenderly to a chair. I take one long look at the shadow-picture, complete now, with even the "lost and found" returned to the shelter of home. It is my last look, for to-morrow I leave the house where I have lived all these years, and go to a distance. There is only one thing I regret much—the leaving of my shadow-friends, of whose life I know so much, though I never saw their faces, or heard their voices, or touched their hands. Farewell, shadows; I part from you with sorrow; but I may meet you again where earth's shadows pass away from our lives for ever, where I shall see you face to face, and recognise her who for the past eleven years has found that perfection which we ever seek and are ever denied in this lower life.

M. G.

THE BENEFICENT EFFECTS OF HURRICANES.

WHEN we read the accounts of the hurricane at St. Thomas, Tortola, and elsewhere, it was not possible for the moment to do anything but to pity the sufferers. The destruction to life and property was so enormous, the fury of the blast was so dreadful, that for the time one was awe-struck, and failed to see the hand of Him who came flying upon the wings of the wind. And when afterwards one did recognise it, was he not disposed, in view of the destruction and dismay, to attribute the guiding impulse of that hand to motives other than beneficent; to wrath and to fury poured out, forgetful of the lesson which our Lord taught when the Tower in Siloam fell and killed eighteen persons? Are we, or the French, or the Germans, or the people in Grenada and Trinidad, where hurricanes never come—are we less wicked than the people in St. Thomas, and in the other places visited? It would be better for us not to court the inquiry, at least until we can do so in another spirit than that in which we hazard suggestions as to our comparative righteousness. In any case the inquiry would be unprofitable, and in the conduct of it we could not possibly pray too heartily to be delivered from presumptuous sins.

We must look for some other motive in Him who "rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm." In a former article we noticed the ruinous effects of hurricanes, and made some suggestions as to the causes of them. We propose now to notice some of the beneficent effects of these storms; and we shall not be surprised to find that they are as numerous and more important than the evils that they bring.

It is not yet known—probably it never will be known—how much damage the St. Thomas hurricane has occasioned. In the small island of St. Thomas, however, the property destroyed—to say nothing of some hundreds of men—included four mail steamers, some fifty vessels of various sizes, and a very considerable portion of the thickly-populated part of the town. Wharves, warehouses, docks, and merchandise shared a common ruin, and this ruin has proved to be so utter, followed as it was by the effects of numerous earthquakes, that the merchants of the place are gathering up the few fragments that remain to them, and are quitting St. Thomas's in despair. Time, and much capital, and more labour, will be wanted, to put the place in statu quo; while those who have been snatched away suddenly into eternity are gone, never to come back—"no reckoning made, but sent to their account, with all their imperfections on their head." Such is the statement on one side of the account. Let us see what is written on the other.

"Yellow fever has left St. Thomas," is one of the first entries that meets the eye. For some months we had heard, as a sadly regular item of news, that the West-Indian mail packet had been quarantined on arrival at Southampton, on account of the prevalence of fever on board. So virulent had been the form of the malady, that the colder climate of the northern latitudes, even during the winter months, had not succeeded in killing it; and as the summer, and then the autumn came on, the cases reported on the arrival of the steamer became worse and still worse. The quotation above was one of the first pieces of good news we had in connection with the disaster; and though since then there have been a few cases in the island, they have either been imported, or have arisen in consequence of the overcrowding of dirty people in the parts of the town and harbour which have survived the storm. The place as a fever-nest has been cleared out by the "rushing, mighty wind," and the conditions of atmosphere (to be noticed presently) which caused it to have a tendency to be a fever-nest, have been blown away vi et ventibus.

This alone is great gain, but it is not the whole of the benefit conferred. It is indispensably necessary to the well-being of the ocean system, and, therefore, to the maintenance of existing climates in all parts of the world, that a certain quantity of the hot water which has been heated in the tropical seas, should be carried off, both north and south, and be replaced by cold water, which is brought by currents from those latitudes towards the equator. Should this system of currents, which intersects the globe much in the same way that veins and arteries intersect in all parts of the human body, get out of order, there would be dire confusion in Nature's great aquarium. The functions discharged by currents are very numerous beyond and beside those of preventing stagnation in the ocean. They are the compensators which strike a balance between the hot and cold climates, and bear in their own persons the remedy for too great an extreme at either end of the thermometer. They produce, or rather they induce, the downfall of rain, through the mists evolved by the junction of hot and cold streams, and by the condensing effect which cold streams have upon steamy and steam-making currents. They convey large quantities of sea-salts from regions where the evaporating power of the sun has caused them to become concentrated, to the latitudes where the great rainfall, and the large influx of fresh water from rivers, tend to make the sea thin and poor (the water of the Baltic is almost brackish). They carry on their surface seeds and drift of various kinds, which, washed up on the shores of unclothed islands, go to form the material for a substantial covering, and to make the new land available for man. The greatest office, however, which they have is that of scouring the seas, so as to prevent and obviate the many evils which would come of stagnation in the deep.

Now this system of currents is liable to get out of gear; the machinery seems to require occasional renewings, and the motive power which keeps it going requires from time to time a fresh stimulus. The tropics are the caldron in which the sea-water is heated and made to expand itself, and to originate, therefore, the current system. It is in the tropics that the machinery seems to get out of order. From some causes, not yet ascertained, the heat of the sun is found sometimes to be more than enough for the heating it is called upon to do; over-heating takes place; the air, so to speak, gets burned up, the healthful breeze fails, and fever and the causes of fever take the occasion to profit. The sea also gets overdone, and cannot get rid of its superfluous heat; the land catches the infection, and begins to be ill at ease; all Nature in those parts languishes; and men whose business it is to come to and fro, note the difference between the characteristics of the atmosphere at these seasons, and at those in which Nature is going on regularly with its work. The complicated but beautiful system by which the winds blow in their appointed circuits, producing the "gentle trade winds," the friendly monsoons, and the countervailing currents which act as their coadjutors, is at such times disordered, and the whole world is out of joint in consequence.

It is at such times that hurricanes come. The evil to be remedied is so great, that nothing short of a violent medicine will remove it. And the hurricane does remove it. Cleaving the air as it does with its mighty presence, whirling round and round with terrible swiftness, it snatches up in its folds and there annihilates the listless, vapid, and death-giving atmospheres which erewhile plagued the earth. Its purifying power is equal to its destroying power, and it brings life as well as death in its wings.

And then the waters; they, too, are stirred up from their lowest depths by the force of the winds which are raging on their surface, and the cold water below is brought violently into contact with the over-heated water on the top, and the defect in the boiler where the warm streams are heated, is made good. Some idea of the mixing power of the wind may be gathered from the statement, that the great hurricane of 1780 tore up rocks that were lying embedded under seven fathoms of sea-water, and cast them like so many shells on the beach.

After a hurricane, the Gulf Stream, which before it has been always noticed to be irregular in its rate and direction, goes on regularly as before; and the numerous small wheels in Nature's machinery which are regulated by this great wheel, and are in good or bad order according as it is so, whirl merrily round, discharging the office assigned to them in the beautiful system of God's creation with renewed life and spirit. What would the whales do, if the Gulf Stream no longer brought their food of sea-nettles, and other small fry, to their breeding-stations in the ocean? What would be the climate of the British Islands, placed two degrees to the northward of ice-bound Newfoundland, and yet never blocked up with ice, if the Gulf Stream failed to bring (all the way from the Gulf of Mexico) the heat which tempers the severity of an English winter, and makes the whole atmosphere mild and bearable? What would the impoverished Polar Seas do, if the great ocean carrier did not bring supplies of salt to renew the vigour of their brine? What would the over-salted tropical seas, and the myriads of fish who live in them, do, if the excess of salt were not got rid of? All these things depend principally upon the proper and efficient circulation of a system of currents. This system is liable to get out of order, as we have stated, at certain irregular intervals, and owing to causes not yet sufficiently ascertained. This liability is checked, and the disorder itself is remedied, by the violent action of the winds "in hurricane assembled." How, then, can it be said that the hurricane is an unmixed evil? How could any gift or operation of the beneficent Creator be so described? He whom the winds and the sea obey has given to hurricanes a certain duty, which duty they perform, like all his agents, with unerring faithfulness and thoroughly. If man has discovered, as undoubtedly he has, that the execution of this duty is attended by results eminently disastrous to him, if he be unprepared and unmindful of their coming, is that a reason for begging for a withdrawal of the hurricane from Nature? or a reason only for man to use his intelligence—no less God's gift—in devising means to guard against the disaster? It is evident we could not spare the hurricanes, were their actions even more furious than they are. We can devise means for guarding against their fury in respect of our dwellings and our ships; we can study more and more their nature and their causes; we can improve yet greatly on the knowledge (far greater than our grandfathers had) we already possess; and we can learn how to put ourselves and our property in safety till the wind-tyranny be overpast.

Much has been done, much has been ascertained, and it is something to have learned even so little as is contained in our former article on the subject. Shipmasters know now how to conduct themselves when a hurricane overtakes them. They no longer give themselves up to despair. Sometimes they can even use the stormy wind for the immediate purposes of their voyage. Why should we not, on further study, find out more useful knowledge? There is no reason whatever to the contrary; indeed, the probability is, that when we know more about hurricanes, we shall not only act differently with regard to them, but shall see in them no longer a mere fury poured out; we shall recognise them for the beautiful and mighty instruments of the beneficent will of Him who desires not the death of a sinner, whether by hurricanes, or ignorance, or any other thing, but would rather a thousandfold that he should be converted from the error and ignorance of his ways, and live and not die.

FRANCIS W. ROWSELL.

"ANGELS UNAWARES."

BY THE REV. H. V. H. COWELL, B.A.

OME have entertained angels unawares," says the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Abraham did so. When sitting at his tent door, under the shade of the terebinth of Mamre, while the eastern sun blazed fiercely around, he saw three mysterious men near his habitation. He rose, went forward to greet them, made ready a lordly meal; and thus entertained,
"unawares," messengers from the unseen world.
Lot did so. Sitting at the gate of Sodom, as the sun shot slanting beams along the western sky, he discerned in the gloaming two strangers approach the city. These he pressed to spend the night under the shelter of his roof; and thus unconsciously did honour to the heavenly ambassadors whom God had sent to deliver him and his from the destruction impending the place. Gideon did so. While thrashing out his father's corn at Ophrah, he was startled by the sudden appearance of an unfamiliar form. He made ready some food for the wayfarer; but this was made to serve as a sacrifice, in the flame of which the stranger rose as a seraph to the sky.

In these cases, "angels that do always behold the face of our Father in heaven," stood face to face with man; and those whose voices swell the symphonies of the skies, spoke to human ears.
Thus heavenly messengers, disguised in earthly garb, received as men, entertained as "strangers," disappeared with their higher nature disclosed.

Not thus visibly do angels appear now; but often still do heavenly messengers visit us in veiled form, so that we do not recognise their high origin until they "brighten as they take their flight;" and sometimes not even then does their true nature appear to us. It is well, then, that we should be prepared to receive them in disguise, and should be ready to entertain God's servants, whatever form they may assume. Let us, then, think of some of the "angels" whom we are apt to "entertain unawares."

First, then, we doubtless often have actual angels in our homes, or hovering over us in our ways, while we are unaware of their presence. At the beginning of this epistle the apostle asks,
"Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?"
And in the chapter that precedes the one in which the expression "angels unawares" occurs, he says, "Ye are come . . . to an innumerable company of angels." The Psalmist declares, "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them;" and in another psalm it is written, "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." The angels who met Jacob at Mahanaim, who ministered to our Master after his temptation, are with God's children still, to keep and comfort them. You remember when a holy feeling suddenly surprised your soul; then you entertained an "angel unawares," who was sent to excite heavenly emotion, as the angel at Bethesda, descending, gave supernatural virtue to the spring.
You remember when a gleam of light flashed on your saddened spirit; then you entertained an "angel unawares." You remember when you felt the chain of a sinful desire snap and fall loose from you; then you entertained an "angel unawares," sent to free you from the fetters of sin, as St. Peter was delivered from the prison-gyves.

"In solemn beauty, and in strength and power,
Comes the soul's guardian from his home afar,
To stand beside us in temptation's hour,
Pure as a glittering star."

In a less strictly literal, though no less true sense, we may be said to entertain angels unawares, when our relations and friends prove messengers from God to lead up the path of light to heaven. There are those near us every day who have definite missions from God for us.
The wife, the child, the companion, who allure to better things, and inspire us with higher, purer feelings, are God's messengers of mercy. But, as Leigh Hunt says so truly—

"Alas! we think not what we daily see
About our hearths—angels that are to be,
Or may be if they will, and we prepare
Their souls and ours to meet in happy air."

We see not in the changeling child an angel sent to bid us set our affections on things above; we recognise not in the familiar voice of a friend the still small voice of God's mercy. These are "angels unawares."

So are those who, with "the love-light on their brow," bend over the sick and suffering, relieve the destitute, instruct the ignorant. The eyes are not purged to see the unearthliness of their spirit—they are "angels unawares."

Again, in our sorrows and trials we entertain often "angels unawares." They advance to us along the plains of earth, and so, not tracing them far enough, we think they arise from the dust, spring from second causes, come from some fortuities in our lives. And the messages they bear seem so hard as to have little that is heavenly in their tone. There seems, too, so little Divine gentleness in their treatment of us, so little of God's love in their aspect; so, forgetting that—

" Oftentimes celestial benedictions Assume this dark disguise," they are to us "angels unawares."

Oh! that God would open our eyes, as he opened those of the servant of the prophet; then should we welcome those sorrows at which we so much murmur now. There was a picture exhibited some time ago, by a German painter, called "Cloud-land." At first sight, it seemed but one chaotic mass of clouds; but, as one gazed, each cloud came clearly to assume the aspect of an angel, and gradually angels' eyes flashed forth from the former gloom, and angels' wings spread across the sky. So, if we saw aright, would each trouble appear. Yes,

"Thou art God's angel, Sorrow! Though thy face,
Veiled by the shadowy wings, is hid awhile,
Sweet is the message on the scroll we trace,
A holy rapture hath thy parting smile."

"Cowards are we—fain would we pass thee by,
When thou wouldst wake the soul by sin long stained;
But at thy flight we own thy ministry,
And find we have an angel entertained."

And once more, there is an angel that enters our homes with dusky wings, and bears away our best-beloved from our embrace. How we start at the approach of that angel—Death! yet is it God's messenger.

That angel will come some day to call from earth not ours but us; and how much depends upon the aspect that angel wears to us then! Shall we hail his approach, or shall we cry, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" This will depend on the way in which we "entertain" God's messengers now. Let us receive them reverently, listen to them teachably, entertain them as heaven-sent, whether they whisper to us in secret, or dwell with us in the familiarities of home, or approach in a chariot of cloud, or darken our threshold to bereave us of those whom we love the best; then an angel-escort shall at last bear us to our Father's house on high, as Lazarus, in our Lord's parable, was carried to Abraham's bosom.

MY FAITHFUL STAR.

DOWN the moonpath, softly creeping,
Came my little love to me;
Wakened from her first, fresh sleeping
By my farewell melody.

Chaste and childlike, 'neath the moonbeams,
Stood she there to hear my love;
Which, e'en through her deepest night-dreams,
Thus had power her soul to move.

Round my outstretched, fevered fingers
Closed her soft and cooling palm;
Round my heartstrings fondly lingers
That loved touch, so pure and calm.

Up unto the heavens then gazing
With those liquid wells of light—
Up to heaven her white hand raising
To the maiden Queen of Night,

Said she then—(I yet can hear her):—

"As that moon and planet pale,
Ever near, but never nearer,
Sadly through the night-air sail;

"So on earth, though doomed to sever
(Tears her lifted eyes now fill),
Still our hearts will cling for ever—
Cling through parting, pain, and ill!"

Thus she spoke, and softly creeping
To my heart, one kiss she gave;
Then she left me, gently weeping—
Left me, oh! so strong and brave.

Still beside me, ever gliding
Near me, yet, alas! so far;
Patient, watchful, and confiding,
Steals my fond and faithful star!

"Down the moonpath, softly creeping, Came my little love to me."—p. 392.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER LIII.

FROM DUSK TO DAWN.

THE cavalry had swept through the streets with drawn sabres, and the first blood had been shed. They had wounded a few unfortunates, in all probability the most innocent in the assemblage, whose movements had not been quick enough to secure their escape. Then a shot had been fired from a window in the Rue St. Honoré, most likely in pure foolhardiness—the foolhardiness which carries its candle into the powder-magazine—and it was answered by a volley, which killed the perpetrator of the act and his companions, where they stood. Another man fell in the street, and the people snatched up the body and carried it along, with wild cries for vengeance. These sounds signified the rousing of the fierce spirit of insurrection. They were the first tokens of the storm; the fall of the loose stones before the rush and crush of a mighty avalanche.

Deputies were assembling, had been assembling all day, debating what was to be done. The bourgeoisie, whose clamours had roused the people, and whose interests alone were at stake, were beginning to be alarmed at the spirit they had raised, and would fain have laid it again. But for this they had no spell of sufficient power. A deputation to wait upon the king, the withdrawal of the ordonnances, these were their proposals. They might as well have tried to stop the rush of the avalanche once in motion, as to stay the progress of a revolution already begun, with such straws as these. The same fate awaited him who stepped in to impede the path of the one as of the other—that fate was destruction.

The sound of the first few shots was the signal for action to the unarmed crowds in the streets of the city. For the most part, they knew not for what they were about to fight, but there rose in them at the sound, the blind, brave instinct of resistance to physical force. Almost simultaneously, there floated over their heads a tricolour flag. A man of the people bore it along; there was light enough still to distinguish the colours at a distance, and the crowd everywhere opened before it. The people accepted the signal, received it with homage and in silence, a silence which broke in deeper murmurs when it had passed. These were the colours under which they would fight, to which they would rally, by which they would know one another, friend from foe. Men clubbed their pocket-handkerchiefs on the spot to form the tricolour; the red and blue cottons of the workmen, and the cambric of the rich young bourgeois, were fastened together and hoisted on sticks. The mercers' shops still open were invaded, and there sprang up, within the hour, a furious trade in tricolour which speedily exhausted all the red, white, and blue ribbons to be had, and which, before the revolution had spent itself, had used up every yard of these within the bounds of Paris. Every man, woman and child in the city hastened to don the national colours. Man and boy wore the cockade or the breast-knot, those who wanted to appear doubly patriotic, both. When there was no more ribbon to be had, they cut up broad pieces of silk into strips, to serve instead. While ladies made their appearance in white gowns and scarves of red and blue, or any combination of the colours which came to hand, no matter though it might set their teeth on edge with its savage incongruity.

But on this first night of the outbreak the people seemed only playing at insurrection. Except in the immediate neighbourhood of the tragic incidents of the evening, they laughed, and jested, and accosted the soldiers good-naturedly; they, in their turn, driving the crowd before them, more by entreaty than by force. As the darkness descended, the streets appeared to thin, and though confused noises and murmurs, and sometimes a shout, or the crash of a street-lamp, floated up to the ear of David Haldane, he was able to visit the ladies to whom he had given up his room, with the assurance that the disturbance was dying down. The younger lady was persuaded to seek repose; the elder remained for a little with him, whom she had constituted her protector.

Miss Minto—for that was the name the elder lady gave—went back with him to the room they had vacated, in order to satisfy her curiosity as to the state of affairs. The sound of a shot came to their ears as they stood at the window.

"I hope she has not heard it," she said, in a tone of alarm.

"It was some distance off," he answered.

"Ah, Mr. Haldane," she went on, with the confidence born of the hour of danger, "I am one of the happy women who have no history. My joys are other people's joys—my sorrows other people's sorrows. But for her—I have trembled for her reason. Within a month of her marriage-day, he who was to have been her husband was shot, and by her brother's hand—shot by accident, in sport. At first she was wild for death, lamenting that she could not die; but lately she has taken no interest in anything, and seems to be consuming her very soul in silence. I fear the effect of any disturbance upon her, especially of this dreadful firing."

"You may rely upon me to do whatever can be done to secure her against annoyance, though I hope that to-morrow my help may be unnecessary," he replied. And with this assurance, they separated for the night.

David Haldane neither slept, nor sought to sleep. He sat listening to the noises that sounded not unlike a sea breaking upon a distant, rocky shore.

It was the sound of men engaged in piling up the barricades. He was far from anticipating the aspect of the morrow, and yet he could not rest. He felt the disturbing influence that often seems to come with the nearness of one whose destiny is interwoven with ours. And there was another who declared—but that was in the future—that she too was subject to the same mysterious influence. She too on that night was sleepless, and on the eventful morrow she was twice startled by a face and figure which, in the distance, appeared to be no other than David Haldane, and, on a near approach, turned out to be as unlike him as possible.

When Louis Oglivie set out, on the previous evening, to escort his daughter, there issued from a closet in the room which they had quitted, a dark-eyed fury. It was Louis Oglivie's wife. Her hair and dress were in disorder, and her face was flushed. She had been confined in the darkness for some time, and her breath laboured from long suppression. The closet was used as a bedroom, and opened into a room on each side. She had entered it from the back, and was in the act of making her appearance at the other side, when the words she heard tempted her to listen. In her case, the old adage had been fulfilled. Her face flushed, and her ears tingled with anger, as she listened to her husband's complaints of her conduct. But when she heard him coolly propose to quit France and leave her behind, her rage knew no bounds. She could hardly contain herself sufficiently to remain in her place of concealment till father and daughter had taken their departure. She had paid little heed to the voice that had pleaded the sacredness of her rights. She pictured to herself her husband intent on his scheme of desertion—a scheme which she resolved to defeat.

When he returned she was sullen and silent, and on the morrow she maintained the same demeanour.

Breakfast over, Peggy withdrew to her studio, making a little détour to look in at the window of the shop in the Rue St. Honoré, and then going to work with the resolution of despair.

His daughter gone, Louis Oglivie proposed to go out, and his wife at once prepared to accompany him. He changed his mind upon this, and remained in the house; she remained too. Every now and then her dark, resentful eyes were upon him. She went about ostentatiously doing things with abrupt, grating noises. He shrank from contact with her visibly. An almost insane desire to get quit of her presence seized upon him. At length he said, in a tone of irritation—

"Are you not going out?"

"I will go when you go," was the answer.

"But I am not going."

"Well, then, neither am I."

"I wish you would," he muttered.

"Ah, you wish I would!" she cried, no longer able to control herself. "You think to escape me; but you shall not," she hissed, "if I never quit you till I quit you dead."

Louis Oglivie did not answer his wife on such occasions, save by a mocking laugh; he would show that he had nothing in common with her, even in their mutual disagreement. Nevertheless he winced at her words. Her present threat had something terrible in it to his morbid mind.

So he answered nothing, but towards the afternoon he watched his opportunity and made his escape. Wrought up almost to a phrenzy of disgust and aversion, he went straight to his daughter's studio.

He found her at work, sitting in the sunshine. A cup of milk and a piece of bread had sufficed her for a midday meal, and so intent was she on the sketch before her, that when he entered she smiled and nodded, without even raising hand or eye.

"I can bear it no longer," he said, with a new vehemence, beginning to pace up and down the bare little room.

She looked up at him inquiringly, and with pity in her eyes.

"She knows all," he went on. "She was listening last night, serpent that she is. All day she has watched me, till she fell asleep, like a cat. She will follow me here—she will follow me everywhere. I cannot bear it!" and the weak and miserable man burst into tears.

His daughter laid down her pencil, and stood up dismayed in the presence of a misery which she had no power to alleviate, on which she had no sympathy to bestow.

"Stay here in the quiet," she said, leading him to sit on the seat from which she had risen. "I will go to her. Oh, father," she added, "can you not spare her a little love to heal all this cruel unhappiness?"

Ay, there lay the healing for that and many another mortal hurt; but where was the love to come from? What power on earth is to create it, where it is not? Alas for the terrible impossibility!

He would not suffer her to go, and his complainings ended in the usual appeal, "Have you got any money?"

She had but little left, but one gold coin, in fact, which she was husbanding for the payment of her small rent. She told him this, and did not offer it, for she knew, or feared, it would only do him harm; but she could not resist his eager entreaty—his tears even, and he promised faithfully to keep it for his own necessities. As soon as he had it in his hand he showed an excessive eagerness to be gone, scarcely listening to her last words; but answering at random that he would be with her again in the evening.

He hastened into the street. At the door, which was open for her entrance, stood his wife. The porter afterwards said that she seemed to be quite gay and smiling; she spoke to her husband in his presence, and her words were: "Come, we will enjoy ourselves together."

As her father had not returned, Peggy went round to their apartments at her usual hour. It was six o'clock. She remembered Henri's warning, and smiled. There was nothing unusual that she could see in the few back streets she had to traverse. Her father and stepmother had not returned. She obtained the key of their rooms, that she might be there awaiting them; but the evening passed on and they did not come. She became restless and unhappy, and again went out and visited her studio, intending to return and wait for them. This time she heard the sounds of unwonted tumult, and saw unusual crowds in the quiet streets. She learned, too, that the pair were together, for the porter told her what he had seen and heard, and concluded his statement with a recommendation to her to keep within, as there was some disturbance going on. She therefore changed her mind about returning, and went back to her room for the night. Her father had doubtless made it up with his wife, and they were enjoying themselves together, as the latter had said.

From her roof she could hear the sounds of the tumult below, and a vague, nameless apprehension, which was not fear so much as foreboding, took possession of her as she listened. The sounds were of the unseen, the unknown. She could form no conjecture what they were, what the people could be doing in the night, for the sounds were those of labour rather than of fight. She flung herself on her bed near the open lattice and listened, and sleep was banished from her eyes.

CHAPTER LIV.

FROM DAWN TO DUSK.

NEVER did a lovelier day dawn on any city of the world than the morning of the 28th of July, 1830, as it rose over the city of Paris; and many were the sleepless eyes in the gay capital to which the light was welcome as hope from heaven. Many a watcher had watched there throughout the night for one who had not returned—for one who, now, never would return to the place he had called his home: for on that fatal morning the people were intent on blood. The tiger had been roused, and was ravening for prey. At an early hour men were turning out into the streets, armed with whatever came to hand, preparing to march en masse from their quarters, St. Antoine, St. Denis, and St. Martin, and to carry insurrection into the very heart of the capital.

But at an early hour the central portion of the city, which was about to be turned into a bloody battle-ground, was still comparatively quiet. The struggle had not begun when Peggy Oglivie, having watched the splendour of the dawn "melt into the light of common day," and having in vain essayed her task, stole down the stair as soon as any one was stirring. She stopped to exchange a few words with the concierge, a seemingly sleepless old soldier. He had heard the reports of the night—reports in which the fighting and killing were, of course, fearfully exaggerated, and which he was evidently desirous to verify, if his wife, who was even more preternaturally vigilant than himself, would allow him to do so. He therefore made light of alarms, and Peggy passed out into the street with the strange foreboding weighing on her heart.

Her worst fears appeared to be realised, when she found that neither her father nor stepmother had been in the house that night. Again she set herself to the dreary task of waiting; but the morning wore on, and they did not return. Every moment increased the tumult in the streets. If she waited longer they might be impassable. She resolved to go back, leaving a message for her father. He would surely come to her as soon as he could, when he learnt that she was in anxiety about him. She was more at home in her own little room, for the people here were new and strange to her; while she had exchanged friendly greetings with most of the inhabitants of the house of which her studio was an insignificant portion.

She was again on her way through the streets, but even yet they did not look very terrible. It was ten o'clock before the troops, concentrated in and near the Tuileries, received their orders to march; and as yet there was no fighting, for there were no foes to encounter.

To her, the aspect of things seemed by no means alarming. The crowds she passed through were still gay and good-humoured, though the excitement was immense. Every one spoke to every one else, it seemed, and all sorts of rumours were afloat. The city had been declared in a state of siege, and the soldiers had received orders to encompass it, and fire upon the people. True enough, as it turned out, but only half believed by the multitude.

She suffered herself to go with the stream till she came into the familiar Rue St. Honoré. But how changed was its aspect! At one end a huge barricade, on which armed men were mounted on the look-out; the shops either unopened or shutting again in haste; a dense mass of people on every side. Before she could retreat, she found herself completely hemmed in by a sudden movement of the crowd. It was caused by the approach of a patrol of infantry, accompanied by some mounted lancers of the guards. The unarmed multitude fell back, for the people who were to do the fighting had not yet arrived on the scene of action; and above the tumult, a woman's voice cried from the balcony of an hotel—

"Do not kill! Soldiers! do not fire."

The balcony was exactly opposite where Peggy stood, trembling and alone in the press, and she looked up eagerly, for the words were spoken in English. In the excitement of the moment, the lady had forgotten that her own language was not that of those whom she addressed. But soldiers and people seemed to understand the language of the heart, in the clasped hands and supplicating gesture, for the officer took off his cap, and bowed as he rode on, and some in the crowd were not behind him in the graceful homage.

A glance showed Peggy that the lady was young and beautiful, but the glance was immediately riveted on her companion. This time there could be no mistake. She had been startled already by a faithless resemblance, which had vanished from her sight, but this was indeed David Haldane. It was no momentary glance she was permitted to take, for she saw him come out barcheaded upon the balcony beside the lady; she saw the brown locks tossed back; the gesture of tender entreaty, no doubt accompanied with still more tender words; and then he almost bore her into the room. She was doubtless his wife, beautiful and full of goodness, and every way worthy of him. Peggy exaggerated her loveliness, great as it was, for her heart had thrilled with sympathy, at the cry of the woman's heart. To her that white-robed girl, crying out, "Do not kill—do not fire," was an heroic figure, remained an heroic figure evermore, when she shuddered at the bare idea of her before whom Frenchmen ground their arms as she passed bloodstained from the victory. More than one woman took part in the fighting; and one received this mark of honour—or disgrace.

The two figures retreated from the window, and a sense of utter desolateness fell upon the spirit of her who watched them, as she stood alone in the press below. In the next few moments, worse than the bitterness of death passed over her, for life remained while hope had died. She knew then, that for her there could be no refuge from the world's dreary selfishness, such as there is to be found in the sheltering love of a heart that is wholly ours. How strangely Fate had tantalised her! hiding from her the happiness which was within her reach, and holding it up before her, that she might recognise it before it vanished for ever.

A mist swam before her eyes, and she stood heedless of the tumult around her. A little longer, and she would have seen David Haldane return to the window and take up his post of observation there, letting nothing escape his keen and earnest scrutiny; a little longer, and her eyes might have encountered his—might have seen his sign of joyful recognition, and she might have been at least within the shelter of a friendly arm: but at that moment the roll of a drum was heard at a distance, and a shout arose—"To the quays! to the quays!" The human tide was turned, and poured in streams down every intersecting street. On one of these streams she was borne along unresistingly, like a twig down the course of a torrent.

The new movement of the crowd had been caused by the intelligence, which seemed to penetrate it like lightning, that the troops were on the move—were coming to plant their cannon on the quays. Instead of running from the danger, this strange, brave multitude flew to meet it. It was this that gave the revolution its unconquerable force. To have conquered Paris that day would have been to depopulate it.

The troops had been ordered to march in two divisions: one eastward and southward, from the Tuileries along the right bank of the Seine to the Hôtel de Ville and the Place de Grève; the other by the northern Boulevards to the Place de Bastille, and from thence through the Faubourg St. Antoine; thus drawing a cordon round the greater portion of the city.

Besides these, two battalions of the guards took up their position in the centre of this circle, in the Marché des Innocents, with orders to divide the city, by keeping the Rue St. Denis open from end to end—from the Boulevards to the river.

From the first it fared ill with the two latter portions of the little army. Neither of them was able to accomplish its object. Three battalions of guards, a hundred and fifty lances, and two pieces of cannon rolled along the Boulevards. The trees fell behind them as they marched, barricades were piled with incredible rapidity to cut off their return; attacked at the Ports St. Denis and St. Martin, they managed to reach the Faubourg St. Antoine; but here they were engulfed. Nothing more was heard of them for the remainder of the day. They were fighting a hopeless battle, with hosts of foes swarming out upon them from narrow street and crooked alley, and hurling on their heads, from all the houses, everything that could be turned into a missile; while doors opened to receive the enemy whom they pursued, and closed in their baffled faces. In the end they had to turn, and go round by the new Boulevards on the south, to reach their starting-point, when the day's fight was over.

Meantime, the first division had skirted the river and arrived at the Pont Neuf, which they crossed half way, and advanced into the Isle de Cité, as far as the bridge of Notre Dame. Here they passed to the north bank of the river, and charged the crowd assembled on the Place de Grève. Then the fight began in earnest, the cannon opened fire, and rained a storm of grape upon the Place; and the soldiers took possession, and cleared it of all save the dead and dying. But from the southern bank of the Seine the people kept pouring into the island, and manning the Quai de la Cité with sharpshooters, who, under cover of the river wall, did grievous execution among the soldiers on the other side.

Amid the mêlée Peggy Oglivie had been borne along, scarce knowing or caring whither, till she found herself over the bridge and on the island, in the neighbourhood of Notre Dame. Then making an effort to disengage herself, she hastened for refuge to the great cathedral, in which many women had already taken shelter when the firing commenced. The great bell of the cathedral clanged and boomed over their heads, and the sound of the firing reached their ears, representing to their shuddering fancy a scene of slaughter even more terrible than the reality. Many cast themselves on the pavement, weeping and crying; others retired into the chapels, and knelt in silent prayer. Notwithstanding the tumult without, there was the usual sacred hush within, which subdued even the sound of weeping. It died away in murmurs. The fever of excitement calmed under the shadow of the solemn aisles, cool and dim, while the hot sunshine without blistered and almost blinded the raging people.

The sound of the firing did not cease. Hour after hour it was kept up, till the blazing noon passed over them, and the shadows lengthened eastward.

Pale and motionless—nearly as pale and motionless as the white image above her head—Peggy Oglivie sat during those terrible hours. She knelt and tried to pray, but her attention wandered—wandered from the exhaustion consequent on watching and want of food. It seemed as if those sounds of discord would never cease. Still she did not move. She felt as if she would gladly die.

Two Sisters of Charity—in their black gowns and white headgear looking as if the sun never burned and the dust never soiled them, and as peaceful as if they had come out of a cloister-garden, instead of through the blood-stained streets of an insurgent city—came into the little chapel. They laid down their bag, filled with gifts for the poor, said their evening prayer, and were about to depart. A woman asked them for bread, and they bade her follow them to the door of the church. Peggy remembered that she had not tasted food that day, and another remembrance seized her, which made her rise and quit the sanctuary with the sisters.

It was a strange recollection to occur at such a time and place—no other than that of Henri's small dog Fanchon, who must be famishing, shut up in her room unfed since yesterday. She was hastening on, thinking of Fanchon, when Fanchon's master suddenly appeared. On the instant the boy offered her his escort with the greatest gallantry in the world. At another time she would have smiled at the little man, as he raised his cocked hat and walked by her side, sword in hand. He was full of the incidents of the day, and tripped along gaily, his hat in his hand half the time, his childish face begrimed and smiling. He was a sight for a tender heart to weep at. David Haldane, from his post of observation, which he had seldom quitted throughout the day, and which had become one of danger too, noticed him. The students had made themselves conspicuous, and he was in full-dress uniform. He did not, however, notice his companion until it was too late. When he did, he started from his place and rushed out after them. They had disappeared down a side street. He followed, but only to see them vanish round another. When he reached the second turning, they had disappeared altogether.

(To be continued.)

SOLDIER JOHNNY.

PART I.

JOHNNY MAYNARD was a bright little boy of ten years, with large blue eyes, round, red cheeks, curly brown hair, and—an ambition. Now this ambition was—to be a soldier.

Yes, to be a soldier, and wear medals and stripes like his Uncle Fred, who had been in the Crimea, and afterwards in India: going out a private, and returning home a sergeant-major.

Johnny's father was a farmer; that is to say, he had a few acres of land to cultivate, and lived in a tiny farmhouse, round which ever arose a continuous chorus from beast and fowl—the cackling of hens, the grunting and squeaking of pigs, the quacking of ducks, the bleating of sheep, the lowing of kine, an occasional hee-haw from Mr. Edward Bray, and an intermittent crow from chanticleer. In this musical atmosphere was our hero born, so that, whenever he blew a martial call upon his penny trumpet, he was well accompanied by a numerous natural orchestra. When I have mentioned that not far from the house was a small rickyard, in which were stacked and thatched the hay and corn of last harvest, I think I have given you as much of the geography of the place as will be necessary to our story.

What halcyon days for Johnny were those of Uncle Fred's stay at the farm! Uncle Fred had plenty of stirring tales to tell, of battles, and sieges, and skirmishes, and lonely bivouacs; and finding in his nephew a greedy listener, tell them he did, over and over again, day after day, from morning till night, when Johnny went to bed charged to the full, to dream a chaos of flood and fire, and an incessant whizz and whirl of shot and shell. Then Uncle Fred allowed Johnny to fasten on his big white belt with the bayonet, and his large red sash, and to bury his small head in the enormous black "busby" worn by grenadiers: and thus accoutred, our enterprising young hero would strut and stumble about in grand style, to the no small amusement of the household. So this is how, like the youth whose name was Norval, he had heard of battles, and longed

"To follow to the field some warlike chief," rather than follow the plough. After a time Uncle Fred had to rejoin his regiment, and there was an end to the wonderful stories and the daily march with the bayonet and busby; but the "scarlet" fever once taken, was not to die out so quickly. Johnny all at once caught a happy idea. He would make a regiment of his own, and he should be captain. So one day after school, when the master had granted a half-holiday, he set about the enlistment of as many of his schoolfellows as he could induce, with almost as much craft as any recruiting-sergeant in Her Majesty's service. As Betty, Mrs. Maynard's servant-of-all-work, said, "To hear how that little chap went on, for all the world like his own uncle, about honour and glory and offending this 'ere glorious free country, was that amazin', 'nuff to take yer off yer head a'most!"

In this way he got together about twenty of his schoolfellows, and brought the whole troop into the farmyard, an old corner shed in which was granted by Johnny's indulgent father for the head-quarters and armory of the corps.

I dare say you have played at soldiers, too, my boy; but I am sure you would like to know how Johnny organised his army.

"Now, look here—I mean, 'tention," said he, as they ranged themselves in a rank before him. "You've all 'listed yourselves into a new reg'ment—eyes front—aint you?"

"Yes," in tones equal to the solemnity of the occasion.

"And I'm your—'ten-tion!"—(what a concentration of mind the gallant officer seemed to require!)"—"and I'm your captain, aint I?"

"Three cheers for Captain John!"

And our young martinet was lax enough to allow those three cheers to be given.

"Ten-tion! Now, of course, we must have a sergeant-major, and a sergeant, and two corporals.—Jemmy Slow, turn out your toes; you'll never be an officer, make sure o' that.—First, who's to be our sergeant-major? Now, mind, I don't want to choose him; but Bill Slade is the biggest of the lot, and he carries his head very back on his shoulders—But who's that muttering?"

"Yees," said a heavy-looking lad, "ye wants to favour 'un, acos his fayther wuks on your farm."

"No, it aint," exclaimed Johnny, firing up; "no it aint, private Jenks! just you mind your own business a little, will ye? It aint that, 'cos father told me this very morning, that he shouldn't keep Slade on another week. And if you say another word, I'll try you by court-martial for mutiny and drum you out o' the regiment."

So Bill Slade was made sergeant-major, and the other officers were selected by the captain—although mind, he didn't want to choose—without opposition, as the smallest sign of it was threatened with a court-martial, a horrible thing which they did not understand, and a drum out, also a thing in which Jehnny had the advantage of superior knowledge.

"And now," continued the captain, "we shall want a uniform; a cockade will do. What sort of cockade shall it be?"

"Hens' feathers," suggested the sergeant-major.

"No, it won't," snapped the captain; "they aint shiny enough. Betty's going to kill a cock to-morrow, and we can have the tail, if I ask for it. I shall have the largest feather, being captain, and the sergeant-major the next biggest, and the sergeant and corporals the next pick, and so on. Aint that right?"

"Yes, and please, sir," said the sergeant-major, "don't we want a name to be called by?"

"Name! of course; you don't suppose we're going to be a reg'ment without a name for the Queen to call us by? 'cos," continued the captain with much solemnity of manner, "I mean to tell Uncle Fred all about it, and he being a sergeant-major in the guards, lives very near to Buckingham Palace, and sees the Queen quite often; so you see he can easily tell her all about it. We'll call our regiment—'tention!—we'll call our regiment the Queen's Own—"

"Cocktails," suggested the sergeant-major.

"Ah, right,—the Queen's Own Cocktails. It sounds fine! won't the Queen be proud of it when she hears about it, that's all! Three cheers for the Queen and the Queen's Own Cocktails!"

Having in this manner formed his regiment, our young captain instituted drill and parade. And it was a cheerful, if not a very imposing sight, to see them perform their wonderful evolutions, which Johnny had learned from Uncle Fred. When on parade, the Queen's Own Cocktails had their band, in full strength of three tin whistles and a tam-bourine; and as they thus marched into the adjoining village, the whole juvenile population turned out to receive them. I forgot to tell you that the other sergeant carried the colours of the regiment, which had been made with a flaming red handkerchief belonging to Farmer Maynard, and an old broom-handle, begged with eloquence that "took her off her head a'most," from poor old Betty. The captain carried a tin sword, and the rest shouldered their gun-shaped hedge-stakes with soldierly vigour. But ambition grows upon its own success. They felt that much more was yet to be attained, and that their gun-practice was only a mockery and a delusion, while they were obliged to make noises with their mouths to represent the noise of firing. One day they had been drilling in this fashion, and the captain was giving the word—"Fire!" when the sergeant-major, who had been ominously silent from the commencement of the drill, now suddenly broke out with—

"I say, captain!"

"Silence, Sergeant-major Slade," rebuked the captain; "I'm 'stounded at you. It aint dis'pline to speak to your commanding officer in that fashion while on duty."

"Well, I was only a——"

"Silence, I tell you, Sergeant-major Slade. If you stop me while I'm speaking again, I'll reduce you to the ranks. 'Tention there, corporals. Now, sergeant-major, what have you got to say?" jerked out our young captain, with his left hand upon his belt of pink ribbon, and his right hand on the hilt of his sword; "and first of all, make your proper salute."

"If you please, sir," began the humbled sergeant-major, "we're all getting jolly tired of growling out bang-bang, when you tell us to fire."

"What business have you to get jolly tired, I should like to know?" exclaimed the captain, who, you see, was a very strict disciplinarian. "Who gave you leave to get jolly tired? It's mutiny, to do anything without leave from your commanding officer." The captain was rather partial to the phrase, "your commanding officer," it having been a frequent expression of Uncle Fred's.

"Beg your pardon, cap'n," remonstrated Sergeant-major Slade; "but I was only going to venter a observation, as I thought on, this morning."

"Don't be so long about it, then; but let's have it."

"Well, cap'n, I thought as how—Here we've bin a goin' on day after day, and firing away nothin' but bang-bang, with our own breath; when all the while we might have had real fire, and real bangs, with no trouble at all."

"What a jolly idea! How's that, Bill?" asked Johnny, eagerly, forgetting his "dis'pline" in the excitement of the moment.

"Why, with lucifer-matches, in course," replied Bill. "All you've got to do is, take your pocket-knife, and cut off the head of the match, stick the head into the hinge of the knife, and squeeze it together—so!" And the sergeant-major illustrated his lecture with an example, to the great delight and edification of the captain, who had not known of this "dodge" before.

"Think," concluded the sergeant-major, with a look of sublime triumph—"think what a jolly noise, the whole score on us could make, firing away all at once, and together; and I know we've all got knives."

"But, where are the matches to come from?" pursued the captain.

"Well, you bein' cap'n, ought to find the matches, I should think," said the sergeant-major.

But the captain's pocket-money was quite exhausted, and he knew that old Betty must not let him take any away from the house; so he said—"No, I think the sergeant-major ought to provide the am'nition."

"But, please, sir, I can't. My fayther is so jolly cross about bein' turned off your farm, that he won't give me a single penny at all now, and would give me a good licking even if I took only a single match."

Here was a pretty fix. No matches, and, no money to buy them with. He would grant them all a furlough for one day, so that he might consider the question, and afterwards call a council of war: so he said—

"Tention! Eyes front, all of ye. Private Slow, four toes again. I grant you all a furlough for one day. Present arms."

The next day hung very heavily on the captain's hands, and he could not arrive at a fair solution of the important problem before him. There was not one wealthy warrior amongst them all, and when they had a penny to spend, to their undying shame be it spoken, it unfailingly went to Goody Silkstone's for toffy. All the morning Johnny disconsolately wandered about the farmyard in search of an idea, until wearied of the pursuit, with a sigh, which was a very deep one for a young captain, he turned into the kitchen, resolved as a last resource to seek counsel of old Betty.

But old Betty was not there. With a howl of impatience he was rushing away, when something on the high mantelshelf caught his eye.

A matchbox.

Johnny felt very guilty. He had never contemplated any such act before, and he now trembled all over. He had brooded over it so long, that he now lost all control over himself, and it seemed as if he could not help taking it off the mantelshelf and bolting away.

What a useful servant is logic to the Evil One! Johnny now began to use logic. "After all," said he to himself, as he took down the box and slipped it into his pocket, "it's only half a box-full of matches, worth about a farthing; and as to my not being allowed to take them away from the house, because it's dangerous, that's all nonsense, as if I should be such a stupid as to set fire to anything. Besides, I am doing nothing at all to-day, and I should like to have a little practice in firing 'em off."

So Johnny stole out of the house, and, like the stupid he just now professed himself not to be, made for the rickyard.

"They'll neither see nor hear me here," argued he.

Bang—bang, went match after match. Johnny laid the open match-box on the ground, so that he might pick up his charges the more quickly.

"It's awfully jolly!" said Johnny. Bang—bang—fizz! "Goodness gracious! what's that?"

One of the lighted matches had fallen into the box and set it all ablaze. If Johnny had tried to set the whole rickyard on fire, he could not have planned it better. The box lay on a loose wisp of hay, and close to the foot of a hayrick; a gentle breeze was blowing—just the very breeze to keep a flame alight; so, though Johnny stamped and jumped upon it with all his might, it was too late: the flame spread from the box to the loose wisp, from the loose wisp to the hayrick, and presently he saw a growing column of smoke issuing from the roof of the rick. The mischief was done; the whole rickyard would be in flames, and he was lost! The fright gave him only one impulse, and he sped away in the opposite direction from home; anywhere—anywhere, so that it was out of sight, and nobody could find him!

In another minute a man passed by, and saw the smoke rising from the rick. He was very much startled; but a fierce gleam shot from his eyes as he said, "Good, good! My enemy has met with his punishment. But what if the whole rickyard should be burnt down? That will be dreadful. I don't want to ruin the man. I must give the alarm."

But the revenge in his heart would not let him act at once according to his conscience. He came away very lingeringly; and it was only when nearing the farmyard that he began to run, shouting, "Fire!—fire!"

He met Farmer Maynard running towards the rickyard with a pail of water in either hand, and his three farm-servants following him with other buckets.

"Oh, is it you, Slade?" exclaimed the farmer, without stopping. "Very kind of you to tell me—very! Come on, lads!"

But when the poor farmer reached the spot he found the case was almost hopeless. "We must get the engine," said he. "Johnny—Johnny! where are you? Oh, the young scamp! he is never by when he is wanted. Smith, run for your life to the town and fetch the engine; and," he added, whispering into his ear, "bring the constable with you."

THE FIRST CHURCH IN ENGLAND.

SAID TO HAVE BEEN ERECTED A.D. 61.

THE peculiar beauty that is inseparable from noble and majestic architectural ruins, in the instance of the ruins of the great monasteries that are scattered throughout the length and breadth of the British Islands, is certain to be powerfully enhanced by their association with beautiful and picturesque natural scenery. The builders of those once magnificent edifices loved hill-sides, and wooded valleys, and winding streams, and they chose for their own retreats and for the sites of their architectural triumphs, the fairest of the many fair scenes which in their days were placed absolutely at their disposal: and so we now find the shattered relics of our old abbeys, in addition to their intrinsic interest and attractiveness, to be beautiful also for situation. Many and great, doubtless, were the changes which in various ways affected the general aspect of the scenery surrounding the abbeys, during the long interval that intervened between their original foundation and their dissolution in the sixteenth century; and still more decided and more important changes may have succeeded in later times: yet the monastic ruins are certain, at least, to prove that once they were surrounded with natural beauties of a very high order, even if now they are not actually encompassed and incorporated with as much of natural beauty as was theirs in the olden time.

Second to very few (if, indeed, to any) English monastic remains, in every quality and circumstance that is powerful to excite the delighted admiration of all who know them, are the ruins of Glastonbury Abbey. Very pleasant are the Somersetshire hills, where they yet linger, rich as they are in historical memories, and richer still in traditional associations: and most striking in their varied loveliness are the views that spread away on every side from those chisel-wrought memorials, which with silent eloquence declare how powerful man is both to create and to overthrow.

It is not, however, with either the artistic excellences of the Glastonbury ruins, or the fine scenery in the midst of which they have been preserved, that I am now specially concerned; nor do I desire on the present occasion to direct attention to any historical incidents connected with Glastonbury Abbey, whether in the palmy days of its early grandeur, or during the subsequent era of its decline and fall. But it is upon the traditions of Glastonbury which precede its positively established history, that I have a few words to address to all who, like myself, are unable to read these five words "The First Church in England," without the thrilling consciousness of their being pre-eminently stored with memories the most glorious, and the most precious of associations. This very short sentence, "The first church in England," is, indeed, one that at once engages thoughtful attention and commands the warmest sympathies; it leads the involuntary train of thought to a remote period, in which the earliest of the edifices that ever was erected for Christian worship in this church-building and church-loving country of ours, stood alone—a solitary, humble structure, in this then remote "island of the sea," the very world's end of what in those days constituted the known earth.

Reflections such as these naturally and necessarily lead to the inquiries: Is anything whatever known concerning a first church in England? By whom is it supposed to have been built, and at how early a period, and on what spot of English ground did it probably stand?

No historical record of unquestionable authority is known to be in existence, which beyond all doubt or hesitation fixes either the site or the era of the first church, or sets forth the name of its founder; and yet there are very strong and cogent reasons for believing that the first church was erected in England very near the middle of the first century of the Christian era; that it was founded by a personage no less venerable and interesting than Joseph of Arimathea himself; and, further, that this first of English churches stood on that very spot, in the midst of the pleasant hills of Somersetshire, upon which in after times the great Abbey of Glastonbury grew up in stately dignity, and where its ruins, so magnificently solemn in their decay, remain to this very day.

It will be understood that claims are urged for more than one other locality, time-honoured in association with the history of English Christianity, as the site of the "first church in England." Some persons suppose that Canterbury Cathedral, and not what once was Glastonbury Abbey, is standing now on this memorable spot. It is, indeed, most true that, with a happy consistency, the metropolitan Cathedral of Canterbury stands where stood that venerable structure, whether British or Roman, which Augustine found when, in the year 597, he came to re-establish Christianity amongst the Anglo-Saxons. But neither Canterbury, nor any one of the other places where very early Christian churches were certainly erected in this island, can rival Glastonbury as a claimant for the very first church;—the very first, as many have believed and affirmed, of the churches, not in England only, but in universal Christendom.

All the most ancient edifices that were consecrated for Christian worship, and particularly those that were erected specially for that high service, in all external and material qualities were humble as was the worldly condition of the primitive worshippers. Altogether unlike the spacious and splendid structures which rapidly arose in the principal cities as soon as Christianity had become the religion of the emperor and of the empire, the first churches were small and lowly, and without any pretension either to architectural merit, or to distinctiveness of character. It is more than probable that the first church in England, whether or not it may also have been the first Christian church that ever was constructed for the special purpose of worship, as a building, was the humblest amongst the humble. The first church at Glastonbury, according to an early chronicler, had its walls made of stakes driven into the ground, and of branches and twigs "wended and twisted together after the ancient custom,"—such a structure exactly as appears represented in our wood-engraving. The length of it, we are also told, was sixty feet, and the breadth twenty-six. Joseph of Arimathea is said to have reached the shores of Britain in the year of our Lord 61; when he established himself, and with himself, the eleven companions of his travel and his fellow-labourers in his ministry, at the place we now know as Glastonbury. And there they built the first church: and there, in their own simplest, yet noblest of metropolitan churches, those true "pilgrim fathers" worshipped and "preached the word." This was believed, from a very early period, throughout Britain. Many of our earliest historians place the first English church at Glastonbury, and record the tradition of its origin. In consequence of its priority of existence, this particular church is found to have been frequently entitled by our earliest writers as "the church founded and built by our Lord's disciples," as "the beginning and fountain of all religion in England," as "the mother of the saints," and "the tomb of the saints," while the place where it was erected is called, in both the same spirit and the same form of expression, "the first land of God," and "the first land of saints in England."

Such is the tradition which assigns to the first church in England a local identity, and to the founder and builder of it gives a distinguished name. Southey, a judicious and thoughtful writer, considers the tradition to be worthy of credit, from the circumstance that it was never contradicted, nor were any conflicting claims adduced in those ages, when other churches would have derived very great temporal advantages from being able to have advanced similar pretensions on their own behalf. From the first, to so far as we can trace out any allusion to the matter at all, Glastonbury claimed to have its abbey standing where the first church had stood; and from the first also, through many an age, in which no such claim could have stood firm without good and solid ground to stand upon, the claim of Glastonbury was accepted and recognised as worthy of all acceptance. For example, it is certain that the Churchmen of England, who were present at the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle, severally held in the years 1409, 1414, and 1431, brought forward the Glastonbury tradition, as proof that no Continental ecclesiastics had a right to rank in precedence before themselves; and the validity of this argument was admitted. And again, at the present time, in his "Architectural History of Glastonbury Abbey," published last year, Professor Willis, one of the most cautious as well as the most discriminating of inquirers, after narrating the early traditions of that church, collected by William of Malmesbury, remarks: "One fact can certainly be derived from them, namely, that there existed on the spot, which is the scene of the tale, a structure of twisted rods or hurdles, which was believed to have been built as a Christian oratory, and reported to be the earliest church erected in Britain; also, that it especially bore the name of Vetusta Ecclesia, the 'Old Church,' and was dedicated to the Virgin Mary. To show the veneration in which the structure itself was held, the chronicler records that, 'according to the tradition of the fathers, St. Paulinus, Archbishop of York (A.D. 630), clothed the old church, which before was made of inter-twined rods, with boards, and covered it with lead from top to bottom.'"

It is tradition, then, which places at the Glastonbury of to-day the first church in England, said to have been erected in the year 61. But the weight, and value, and validity of tradition vary very greatly; and in every case they must be estimated by special circumstances, and determined upon their own particular merits. Where the voice of tradition has been clear, strong, distinct, unvarying, and long-continued; where its truth is, at least, probable, and it is opposed by no weighty evidence; also, where it can appeal to an early, a general, and a sustained acceptance, it is but reasonable to believe that it contains the outlines, if not the substance, of a true chronicle. The tradition that places at Glastonbury the first English church, "a structure of twisted rods or hurdles," is of such a character as this. It possesses, in the most remarkable degree, every quality of authenticity; and, with extraordinary emphasis, it supports and maintains its own allegation; while (as I have already stated) many of our early histories concur in confirming its testimony.

The church which the good and pious Paulinus built at Glastonbury, and the "old church" that he covered over for protection, alike have passed away. That "old church" itself must also have been restored many times after the veritable "first church" of all had been set up in apostolic times, and before Paulinus appeared to render to it a becoming tribute of reverential care. Of the magnificent abbey, also—in part of Norman work, and partly of the Early Gothic of England—roofless walls, and broken arches, and shattered sculptures, are the chief existing remains. But the name and the memory of Joseph of Arimathea are still preserved in inseparable association with the ruins of Glastonbury. The remains of the pious saint himself, the first of English church-builders, are believed to rest in the hallowed ground where his own church was placed by him: and amidst the ruins of the grand abbey of later days, covered over and sheltered by a low rounded arch of massive masonry, lavishly enriched with the zig-zag work that the architects of the North so dearly loved, the "Well of St. Joseph" may still be seen.

A representation of the "old church," the "first church in England," has been given by Sir Henry Spelman, in his work, entitled "Consilia Britannica," published in 1639, as he obtained it from a plate which was fixed in a pillar of the new church, and was preserved after the destruction of the monastery. The same venerable structure has also been engraved, from the same authority, in Sammes' "Antiquities of Ancient Britain," p. 213, (published in 1676); and, more recently, in Phelps'

"Somersetshire," p. 40; in "Scenes and Sketches from English History," p. 314; and in the Evangelical Register for February, 1839, p. 48. (See Notes and Queries, 3rd Series, x. 415.) At length a copy of one of the early engravings became the property of an artist, in whose service the sunlight itself has been taught by modern science to perform the most important duties. So the old engraving at last has been photographed; and the photograph, beautifully executed, with the little memoir which is published with it, has been sent to THE QUIVER, by the kindness of the proprietor and publisher, Mr. W. H. Mason, of Brighton; and, reversing the process adopted by Mr. Mason, THE QUIVER has engraved the photograph, that it might be enabled to place before its readers as faithful a representation as possible of the simple structure that was considered to have been the First Church in England. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

A CASE OF REAL DISTRESS.—IX.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

CAPTAIN SCOTT would not give a decisive answer at once that night, in regard to accepting an appointment as almoner, or taking any district under his own particular charge.

He was naturally of rather a cautious disposition, and preferred, as he told his friend, to sleep on it, at least one night, and indeed even to take a day or two fully to consider the matter, before committing himself.

Sydney Welworth did not care to use any further arguments or persuasion than he had already done.

"I have this evening," he said, "just shown you the sort of thing you would have to undertake, if you like to join us. You complain of being without any occupation, and wish that you could find some object in which to interest yourself. I don't think that you will find any other which will more thoroughly answer your purpose, even looking at it from the more selfish and interested side of the question, while at the same time others will be deriving relief and benefit from your services, and I feel quite sure that, even after what you have seen in this evening's rounds with me, you will lay your head on your pillow to-night in a more satisfied and contented, if not an actually happier, frame of mind, than you have done for, perhaps, some considerable time."

Archie took his friend's advice in good part, and really did his best to analyse his own feelings thoughtfully and conscientiously that night when he turned into his bed. He fully carried out his intention of devoting the best part of the next two days to fairly considering the pros and the cons of the question, giving one day exclusively to each; and, to make quite sure of arriving at a just and impartial decision, even thought it necessary, almost as a matter of conscience, to spend one afternoon in his old corner in the club, so as to try the effect of sitting there with nothing to do. That decided him.

That very evening he addressed a letter to his friend, the Hon. Sydney Welworth, informing him, in his own homely style, that he considered that he (Sydney) had decidedly "hit the right nail on the head," and that he had spoken only "like a printed book of wisdom," for that he certainly had found that he had gone to bed happier, slept sounder, and awoke up fresher, even after the day devoted to "cons," than he had done since his sad reverse in circumstances, or, more correctly speaking, disappointed expectations; and, therefore, he was ready, if the society should think fit to appoint him, to "go in" for the charge of a district, though he could not, at first start, engage to bind himself for more than two days in the week.

His services were accordingly accepted, at the very next meeting of the working committee of the society, and Captain Archibald Scott became the accredited almoner to the district of St. Edward the Confessor-in-the-East. So far in the east, indeed, beyond the most distant and undiscovered regions of Bethnal Green, does that district, dedicated to the memory of that respectable old Saxon monarch, lie, that, as the astonished cabman, who had driven the captain down there on the next morning after his appointment, was overheard to declare to some of his brethren of the rank, that Shoreditch or the Commercial Road might be considered quite as west-end or fashionable localities, in comparison to the regions he had that day explored. And whatever such a real swell as the capting could possibly be "up to" down in such outlandish parts as them, he, the cabby, was quite at a loss (though not perhaps expressed in quite such delicate language) to conceive.

What the captain was "up to," was going round his new district, seeking out and making acquaintance with the incumbent, the Scripture readers, the Independent minister, and, in short, the authorities, or any principal persons of the district, who could supply him with any information as to the number of the population, the general character of the work or means of livelihood of the inhabitants, the average amount of poor rates, local charities, or other institutions, and any other particulars in regard to the lowest and poorest classes of the inhabitants; all of which he had to set down in a printed schedule, with which he had been officially supplied by the secretary of the society, upon his accepting the appointment of almoner.

Besides that, he had to find out and arrange with the proprietor of one of the local coal-stores, and the most respectable general grocer and provision shop in the neighbourhood, for the proper recognition of the printed orders or tickets, which he was about to distribute among the poor, sick, and suffering, who, partly from the bitter severity of the weather, partly from the unusual depression in trade and capital of some of the great employers, were to be found in hundreds, and even thousands, in all the eastern districts of London.

Captain Scott soon found out that it was indeed no sinecure which he had undertaken, but having—to use his own term—once "gone in" for it, he certainly stuck to the work which he found cut out for him, like a man, and a soldier trained to know what duty really is. He was no longer to be found in his old corner in the club, at least during the day-time. The two crusty old gentlemen had the big room pretty well all to themselves for the rest of that winter, each in undisputed possession of his own favourite fire-side; though, by the way, Archie, before giving it up to them entirely, by adroitly pitting them one against another, managed to extort from each a five-pound note towards the funds of the society of which he had become a member.

As Welworth had foretold, he very soon became too much interested in his new work to be contented with the two days in the week to which he had cautiously restricted his services on first starting; three, four, even five days running, while the worst pressure of distress lasted, might the gallant captain be seen rattling along eastwards in a hansom, with an eagerness and interest in the expression of his countenance very different from the old, listless gape, which always appears to be the stereotyped characteristic of a "heavy swell."

"One learns such a lot of new things of all sorts, you see," said Archie, describing his new avocation to a friend. "I used to fancy that I had seen as much of what is called life, and knew as much of the world, as most men; whereas I now find that I just knew nothing at all beyond a narrow circle, the radius of which was hardly beyond the length of my own nose, or thereabouts. Such new characters one meets with!—why, if I had only gained the acquaintance, as I have done, of that noble body of men, the London working clergy, and seen the zeal and earnestness with which they devote themselves to their endless and almost hopeless work, I should feel myself well rewarded for any little trouble I may have taken. And there are the parish doctors, too; the work those poor fellows go through is quite wonderful. They may not perhaps be considered to be a very polished lot, but a better-hearted, more charitable set of men, I never met; and their extraordinary kindness, and the deal of good they do with the very small means at their disposal, is perfectly astounding."

One thing, at any rate, Archie Scott learnt amongst others—the real value of money, and upon how very little a poor man with his family can manage to subsist, if really obliged to do so. He who three months before had looked upon an income, or rather allowance, of £500 a year as positive starvation, now began to hold very different views as to the relative value of that sum, when brought into immediate comparison with the miserable pittance which he found so many of his fellow-creatures absolutely thankful to call their own, on which they had to feed, clothe, and lodge, not only themselves, but their wives and whole heaps of children of all ages.

The necessity of keeping exact accounts was, perhaps, what troubled our friend more than anything else; but though he grumbled much over them at first, he soon fell into the way of regularly sending in full and elaborate statements of his expenditure in fuel, groceries, blankets, clothing, and other domestic necessaries, carefully filed and docketed, according to the strict rule at "head-quarters," as he used to call it, before he could expect any fresh grant of funds to carry on the work into which, having once launched himself, he had gone with all his heart; indeed, before that winter was over, Archie Scott had shown himself to be a model almoner, and was looked upon by the committee as one of their best and most efficient men.

His friend Sydney Welworth saw very little of him for some time; their districts were widely apart, and while the severity of the weather continued, they both had their hands too full of work among the starving thousands, to find much time for meeting or looking-out for one another; but he heard of him constantly at committee-meetings, and had every reason to feel proud of his pupil, and to congratulate himself upon having been the means of introducing him to the society.

SOME DIFFICULTIES OF BELIEVING.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A.

HERE are times in the history of most men when the soul is aroused and made uneasy about itself. In a Christian land, few people or none go through the whole of life easily and comfortably to ruin. At least, they approach Christ, like the young man who presently departed sorrowful, in a gush of feeling that will not last; or, like Felix, they tremble and resolve not to let this matter drop, even though they will not follow it up just now; or, like Agrippa, they are almost persuaded to be Christians.

Perhaps some one is reading these words who is thus troubled and disquieted; and he would fain be a child of God, and would like to live a holy and blessed life, and yet something seems to hold his spirit down. There is a kind of cloud over the way of salvation, and although its scheme has been repeated a thousand times, the poor tried soul is still uncertain and perplexed, striving to enter in, and yet unable.

Such times are more important than we can say—fraught with eternal blessedness, if they are ended aright; but if they are let pass away, certain to end in greater heaviness and hardness of spirit than before. Let me try to smooth away even one difficulty that is felt, to show the manner in which conviction may ripen to conversion, and how the anxiety that presses the soul down to the ground, may change into the blessed assurance that you are an heir of God and a joint heir of Christ.

There is but one way: "They that are of faith are blessed;" and although faith has now become almost a scientific word, a theological term, it simply means, "they they that are of trust," in whom a spirit of reliance has taken the place of that cold forgetfulness or guilty fear which the world feels toward God. If we remember this assertion, it will perhaps save us from some mistakes that perplex seekers after grace. One says, for example, "To be a Christian, I must give up all my sins." But yet he confesses in his very heart that he is quite unable to do that. Sin is like a fiery garment, that clings to him even while he feels it to be torture. A man in fever might as well say, "To be well, I must become cool again, and chase away the delirium that fires my brain," and set to work upon that hopeless task, as might the sinner set about ridding himself of his corruptions.

Surely there is blessedness in deliverance from sin, one of the best enjoyments of a saved heart is to be pure, but only they that are of faith already are blessed, and therefore it is only by faith that we can hope for holiness. If one is desirous to give up sin, well. Yet the evil that he would not, that he does. It is not until the great act of trust in God has been performed, and his Spirit has spoken peace into the heart, that old things can pass away, or anything become new.

So, again, people say, "To be a Christian I must bear a cross, and deny myself, and think far more of God's smile than of the world's frown. But I really cannot do that. Yonder is a dear companion that I know I could never give up, and yet he is not a person whom a Christian ought to stay much beside. He is so clever and witty an acquaintance, that I think I should die with mortification, if his sarcastic smile and knifelike words were turned against me and my saintliness. There is also some extravagant or excessive pleasure, that has become part and parcel of my life itself. Now, in order to believe, I must renounce all these, and therefore I cannot believe until more strength is given me, and in the meantime I can but hope and wait."

But, now, think. How strange a religion that would be which promised God's strength to help you, but not until you had proved clearly that your own strength was enough, requiring that you should bear unaided the greatest shock of all, in order to buy the help that would break the power of other shocks. No, my brother; the blessing of self-control, like that of holiness, belongs only to those who have already put their trust in God and in his Christ. To say otherwise, would be a mockery as cruel and heartless as to tell a traveller in the desert, who has lain down to die of thirst, that if he will only toil on one other day, there is a spring which he may reach. Give him to drink, first. Let him cool his fevered brain and his swollen tongue, and then he will rise and go forward, from fountain to fountain of living water.

To get these blessings, any blessings, we must begin by having faith, by exercising confidence in God. To trust God and his wise plan for saving us, to trust that even if that way seem dark, it will some day prove the highest wisdom, and if it seem weak, it will yet prove to be the power of God; and in that sweet confidence to lay down our souls to rest, believing that Christ is our Saviour, and will be our guide, leaving this world and the next in his good hands—that is faith.

In old times the chief difficulty arose from the darkness of God's counsel. How little can Abraham have known about the Saviour's work! how much less Rahab! Yet trusting God in the dark or in the twilight, they were accepted.

There is light enough now, but what it shows does not please flesh and blood. The humility of Christ, his patience, his abasement, the transfer of his suffering work to us—these are the stumbling-blocks of our day. Yet even if we could not explain such things, our duty would still be to accept and trust God's Word; and whoever does so, amid ten thousand perplexities, shall find light arising in the darkness.

Perhaps the hardest thing of all is to trust God the Father himself. Yet a great part of faith is to believe that God is love, that he is quite as anxious as the Son to save us; that before any attempt had been made to assuage his anger, before the first step in the atoning work was taken, even then the great eternal heart was full of kindness and of pity for his erring children, and even then he was fixed in the intention to deliver them from the power of Satan who are led captive by him at his will.

We have a difficulty here which the Old Testament believers never felt. Not knowing anything definite or certain about the Trinity, they could not fall into the sad and shameful error of giving all the mercy to one Person, and all the justice and severity to another. We live in a time when the air is full of strange, false notions about Christ's work; but none of them can grieve the Son more deeply at his heart than that men should honour him for any quality of goodness more than they honour the Father. His great desire was, that his Father should be glorified; and now it is possibly his highest joy that souls, once alienated from God, should come with boldness to his throne; that as men hear of all he himself did, as their eyes grow moist with gratitude, and their hearts begin to beat again with hope, they should look up to Him who so loved the world as to give his only-begotten Son, and should say, "Thank God." "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who of his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope."

Reader, have faith in God. Sitting in the highest of all places is not a blind and wanton Chance, who saves or crushes according to his mere caprice, not an enemy to be propitiated by some one's blood, but a friend who has made all the needful provision by which your sins may be forgiven. In the pit of hell there may be sorrow when a guilty and doomed soul is washed and pardoned, but there is no such sorrow in the skies, nor one spirit before the throne who does not feel a wave of deeper transport stir his breast when, gazing where he always gazes, he beholds a beam of exquisite pleasure there. "There is joy in the presence of the angels of heaven over one sinner that repenteth."

Faith in God implies faith in God's plan, and consent to it. If he speaks of deliverance in one way, declaring that there is none other name given by which we may be saved, and telling us that now is the day of salvation, then it is absolute unbelief (and insolence as well) to think of striking out any other road to heaven, or to reckon on being forgiven to-morrow, although we spurn the offer to-day.

It is no real belief in God, that sets his warnings down as idle threats. A silly reliance upon the good nature even of a man, against his clear word and solemn warnings, would scarcely be taken for a compliment. It is not trust, but defiance—not tranquil confidence, but scornful and high-handed presumption, that stays and loiters in the sinking ship of a worldly life when the lifeboat of mercy is at its side, and refuses to believe that it may possibly depart without him, although threatened, warned, implored.

True faith is not afraid to commit itself to the finished work of Christ. Others may be wise above what is written, and talk of the danger that sin and lightness may be encouraged by so easy a doctrine; others may argue away and treacherously narrow in the large freeness of Christ's Gospel, insisting that works and dispositions are taken for granted when they are not mentioned in the message of grace—but the humble, trustful soul knows well that pardon and holiness, however cheaply given, are not likely to make him a worse man than he was, and that to offer mercy only when he should become good, is as great a mockery as to offer it when he should drink the sea. So he takes the gracious gift as a gift. He believes that "Christ was made to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." He believes that in Christ's death his sins are dead, and in Christ's life there is holiness and life for him. He does not expect God to love him because he is a believer, but he ventures to believe simply because God already loved him, and proved it when Jesus died. Neither does he think of his own trust as a thing which finishes the work, and brings him into an acceptable condition; for the work was finished when Christ rose from the dead an accepted sacrifice, a Saviour omnipotent to save. Hungry, he takes the bread of life; thirsty, he drinks the living water; but never dreams that his eating is what provided the bread, that his drinking is what filled the river.

Faith is but the glad and thankful hearing of God's call, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," and the answer of a ready soul—

"Just as I am, Thou wilt receive—
Wilt pardon, pity, cleanse, relieve;
Because Thy promise I believe:
O Lamb of God, I come."

True faith is quite content to receive its good things in God's own established order. We have seen that trust comes before holiness, but many people do not seem to know that trust comes before happiness also. You cannot believe because you are under a cloud; because your spirit is downcast; because you are still as conscious as ever of your sins! But then belief is the only way to get rid of those troubles and anxieties. There is such a thing as peace and joy in believing, but there is no such thing as believing in peace and joy. The fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace; but no branches bear fruit save those which by faith are already abiding in the Vine. People who want comfort in order to believe, are like people who wait for health in order to take physic. It is by faith you must be freed from sin, and so from all the evils and hindrances which sin casts about the spirit. These are but the grave-clothes in which a corpse is swathed, and Christ's manner, as we know, is first to give life to the dead, and then, not till then, to say, "Loose him and let him go." But he who trusts the Saviour in the dark, will soon be led by the Saviour into light, and liberty, and gladness.

Just such another snare is the one which Satan finds most deadly among well-taught congregations and in Christian families. How often does every minister hear something like the following argument:—"I wish I could believe, but I cannot—I really cannot feel these things. I know them all. I have not the slightest doubt that Christ died—not the slightest doubt that he would receive me if I came; but you see it is all dry knowledge, my soul has no pleasure in it, and so it is quite beside the mark: I cannot believe."

Stay a moment. We are teaching some person to swim, and we tell him that his body is lighter than the water, so that if he will stay quiet he cannot sink. Still he hesitates, and tells us that he knows all that—has read it in books of science—that are beyond all question, but has really no experimental feeling of the kind, and cannot venture until he has. May we not answer—"If you know it, act upon your knowledge, and the feeling will soon come. Plunge in and try; that will show more real belief than any amount of emotion?"

So it is with God's love and Christ's atonement. You know they will not fail, but your heart is all in a flutter at the greatness of the venture. Make it, nevertheless, and never heed your want of emotion, for the glow of confidence, the calmness of acceptance, the rapture of a cleansed conscience, the filial sense of your adoption—all will come in their due time.

Come they shall, if you but make the trial, for "they that are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Blessed in the flood of heavenly light that suddenly bursts upon this mysterious life of man; blessed in the satisfaction of numberless desires that ached and hungered and moaned within the breast; blessed in the one companionship that death cannot break, nor falsehood breathe upon, nor time exhaust and make monotonous; blessed in the upraising of that heavy curtain that parts the present from the future, the fleeting from the eternal, the seeming from the true; blessed in the death of death, in the conquest of passion, in the harmony of their deepest longings with the holy and all-subduing will of God.

LOST.

NONG years ago, he knew not where,
He knew not how, or in storm or calm,
Whether the wintry surge was there,
And caught and clung to the flaxen hair,
Or broad seas, sweet with the Eastern balm,
Had sucked him down when the skies were fair—
Long years ago, his only son
Was lost, and the young life scarce begun!

However it was, by night or day,
He could not live from the beach away;
Though at times his rude hut scarce could stand,
When the west wind drank the flying spray,
And swept, hard-breathing foam and sand,
On that lonely life in the lonely bay,
Coldly caught in the lonely land.
A still old man whom the years passed by,
Who took their days and heeded not,
Whom the World, and Time, and Death forgot,
Who loved not life, yet could not die.

"A dying youth in aged hands,
That clasped him then in life once more."—p. 410.

Sometimes when summer lovely made
 The sleeping sea by rock and cave,
 He climbed from out his wonted shade,
 And saw far off the western wave.
 He had not hope, or grief, or fear,
 Only a yearning toward the sun,
 That sank above the seaman's grave,
 And made so bright what was so dear,
 And ceased where that brave course was run.

Sometimes his hands, yet sturdy, took
 The oar, and cast the net again,
 And from his careless calm he shook
 Himself, and spoke to passing men;

But rarely and but briefly came
 This change upon his inner mood;
 And men knew not his birth or name,
 And scarce his strange speech understood.

Thus came the end: all through the night
 A tempest scarred the coast with wreck;
 And the first breaking beam of light
 Saw in that bay a storm-swept deck,
 And close by that old cottage door
 A dying youth in aged hands,
 That clasped him then in life once more,
 And clasp him still beneath the sands.

CHAPTER LV.

THE BARRICADES.

THE dawn of another day saw the city sunk in death-like repose. It had been nearly midnight before the last of the firing ceased on the Place de Grève. A detachment of the Swiss Guards had been sent towards evening to the relief of the soldiers, hemmed in by insurgents in the Marché des Innocents. They had succeeded in withdrawing them, an exhausted remnant, from their perilous position, and in falling back altogether upon the Louvre. Swiss had also been sent to succour the soldiers on the Place de Grève; but the people had become frantic at the sight of the poor mercenaries, and redoubled the vigour of their assault. Fired upon from every house in the neighbourhood, they still maintained their position, and, up to eleven o'clock at night, defended themselves from the windows of the Hôtel de Ville. With the coming on of night, however, the wearied assailants had withdrawn, and, after a time, the equally exhausted soldiers retreated, carrying their wounded with them, to head-quarters, and leaving the deserted streets strewn with corpses—a ghastly sight for to-morrow's sun.

On the morrow, the people took possession of the post the soldiers had vacated, and installed themselves, and their self-made general, in the Hôtel de Ville. The troops were barricaded out of the populous quarters, and the scene of the conflict was therefore changed.

Again the people mustered, and advanced in dense masses along the Boulevards, and down the Rue Richelieu towards the Louvre and the Tuileries. Other bands of insurgents, headed by the students, came from the opposite side, and the Rue St. Honoré, and the other streets that lay between, became a scene of frightful carnage.

The front rooms of the hotel in which David Haldane lived, were no longer tenable. The shutters were closed and the rooms vacated, for bullet after bullet crushed through the glass, and lodged in the wood-work and plaster.

The terror among the inmates of the hotel, especially among the women, was extreme. They crowded into a large room at the back of the house, servants and all, together, completely paralysed with fear. Among them, the two English ladies were the calmest and most self-possessed—the younger lady the most self-possessed of all. That each feared not for herself, but only for the other, was that which gave them courage.

"Oh! it will kill her," the elder lady had whispered to David Haldane; and he had made answer—

"I do not think so; for the present it seems to have cured her." And so, indeed, it appeared: the inward fever seemed quenched. She was paler, but firmer. No longer languid and brooding, but roused, and carried altogether out of herself.

The hotel was closely shut up, and all were waiting with beating hearts for the passing of the storm of conflict, when the terror intensified—reached its supreme moment. The combatants, one side or other, were thundering at the doors. Amid the crying and confusion that arose, one idea seemed to prevail—to keep the doors shut. But abler counsel was at hand.

"You cannot resist their force," said David Haldane, in the ear of the dismayed proprietor; "it is safer to propitiate it."

He accompanied him to the door. The people only demanded admission for the wounded and the dying, that they might not perish under foot. It was granted with seeming graciousness; and, without a rush, calmly, and quietly, the poor fellows, soldiers as well as citizens, were carried in, and the door was shut. Then humanity conquered fear, and all were speedily busy, attending to the unwelcome guests. Some of the strange actors without captured and sent in a surgeon, and under his orders the hotel speedily became an hospital; and among the nurses, swiftest and firmest, and tenderest of hand, was the English girl who had been going home to die.

At length the storm swept on, and seemed to be dying down; and David Haldane, having done all that he could to assist in the disposal of the wounded, turned out into the city. He had meditated doing this all the morning, but the disturbance in the hotel had kept him indoors till within an hour of noon. His object was to find Peggy Oglivie; not that he expected to find her in the streets: it could only have been by accident that she had been exposed to their dangers on the day before. But he counted upon seeing her companion of yesterday; it was a clue to be picked up, if possible. The students were everywhere at the head of the revolt, and he would, in all probability, find the youth who had roused his curiosity and pity, in the midst of the fighting; he would know that childish figure, tricked out in its warlike bravery, anywhere.

By the time he reached the Louvre, the triumph of the people had begun; the fire of the soldiers had suddenly ceased, and the mob were about to enter the palace, and scatter themselves over the noble rooms, filled with the relics of ages, to indulge in a revel of rude mockery and dismal burlesque; with the lance of Francis I. to run a tilt at the portraits of his descendants; to sit by turns upon the throne of France, and then to leave a dead man to fill it.

A few searching glances sufficed to show David Haldane that the boy-soldier was not there. He left the crowd just as they burst through the palace gates with a yell of triumph, and went on towards the quays. There he met party after party, headed by youths in the well-known uniform of the school; but none of them was he whom he sought. These parties were coming from the attack of the archiepiscopal palace. Stormed upon with grapeshot from the quays, the crowd had taken refuge in the aisles of Notre Dame; there some young priests had caused them to be fired upon from the windows of the palace. A signal revenge was taken for the unchristian act; the gates of the palace were carried by storm, and in an instant masses of people filled its sumptuous apartments. All the furniture—books, paintings, hangings, even the plate—was thrown into the river. One object alone, a representation of Christ, as large as life, was respected; the people instinctively felt that he whom it represented, who had dwelt in no palace, and wielded no temporal power, had nothing in common with those who called themselves his priests. But now the crowds were pouring westward steadily, and David Haldane turned back and went with the stream. The conflict had ceased in the city quarter, but in the Rue St. Honoré the fighting still went on. In fact, the soldiers posted there had been forgotten in the general retreat; they were Swiss, and they defended themselves to the last. When David Haldane returned to the point from which he had started, they were reduced to about sixty men. Three red lines, each consisting of a single file, fronted the raging multitude which filled the entire breadth of the street, and there, at the head of the half-armed mob, who had suffered fearfully from the practised fire of the soldiers, was the young student, armed with a carbine, which seemed at least as big as himself. It was easy to be seen that it would fare ill with that remnant of the enemy, now become thoroughly obnoxious to the people, and conspicuous by their uniforms. The deep roar of the increasing and excited multitude was enough to strike terror into their hearts. The lines wavered, broke and scattered, the soldiers flying singly or in pairs.

But the mob seemed resolved that this last act of the drama should be a bloody one. They pursued the poor soldiers into the shops and houses in which they sought refuge, and stained their hour of triumph with some acts of brutal butchery. But many even in the crowd connived in their escape, and suffered them to get out of back windows and into back alleys, while they pretended to be following them for their blood.

David Haldane had kept his eye on the small figure in the cocked hat, while this scene was enacting. He saw him discharge his piece, and throw it away, that he might run after two tall soldiers who had turned and fled down a side street. He and they soon distanced the crowd yelling at their heels; so also did David Haldane. At any moment the men might have turned and got rid of their young but apparently merciless pursuer. At one time they did turn, when he was close upon them, seemingly to address to him some remonstrance. Surely the boy's life was at stake, for the crowd had not yet gained the corner. David Haldane glanced behind him. They were in the very street in which he had lost the boy and his companion the night before; and now, when he looked forward again, he was following the soldiers through an open door, which David Haldane only reached in time to have closed in his face. Both pursuer and pursued were shut up there with their fate, and what that would be depended on those who had thus received them. It could but make matters worse to put the yelling mob upon the scent, and therefore he passed on, marking well the tall old house in the narrow street, to which he determined to return immediately.

Meantime Peggy was passing through those terrible hours of waiting, which so often fall to the woman's lot, and whose anguish is worse to bear than any active suffering. The night before, she had slept the sleep of exhaustion, and had awakened only in the full sunshine of another day of blood. The old soldier keeping guard at the foot of the stair had prevented her going forth, and had brought her a message to the effect that nothing whatever had been heard of monsieur and madame. Perhaps they were dead, she thought, killed in those dreadful cannonades. Perhaps they had gone away together, and left her to her fate. She knew by this time that she had flung herself into hands that would wring her heart for a single coin.

It seemed as if nothing remained to her but to die. Only she was young and strong, and she knew that she would not die just yet, but live and have to face life as bravely as she could. The unselfish too rarely make the most of their own sufferings. She thought of Margery, and what her life had been, and a deeper sympathy for her relative came to her in her own desolation. Then the faces of the sisters she had seen in Notre Dame passed before her in their sweet serenity. They had given up life, but had given it up to the service of others; and she longed to devote her life as theirs was devoted, and wondered why her purer and sterner faith forbade the sacrifice.

As she sat thinking thus, seated on a low stool near the window, her head resting on her hand, she heard a noise of trampling feet upon the stair, and Henri bounded into the room, pursued, as it seemed, by a couple of soldiers. Before she had found words to speak, he had sprung through the open window on to the roof, the men following but leaving their arms behind them.

Entreating them to desist from harming the boy, she ran out after them, and was hailed by Henri with the assurance that all was well, that these were friends of his whom he was saving from their pursuers, and hiding in a place of safety. She had scarcely entered the room again and fastened the door, when a fresh trampling arose, accompanied with frantic noise and tumult. It was evident that a crowd was approaching. Another moment, and they were thundering at the door. Delay might be precious to the fugitives, and she did not dare to open it, but drew herself up, wide-eyed and motionless, in the furthest corner of the room. She heard the door creaking and straining as they pressed against it with cries and execrations. There was no time to escape, even if she could, from that dreadful multitude. There was only the parapet, and, five storeys underneath, the stony street. The door fell inward with a crash, and a number of squalid, blood-stained men stood upon the floor.

They ran to the window shouting, "They are here, they are here, the murderers of the people!" Just then a man appeared in the doorway, a head taller than the rest, and a voice called out in breathless eagerness, "I have found you at last, my love—my love!" They had swept her, trembling, from their path; but the next moment she was safe in David Haldane's arms, and, for that moment, everything was forgotten in one long, clinging embrace.

The soldiers had escaped, and the baffled pursuers retreated across the room. Gay and goodhumoured in their very mercilessness, they gave no annoyance as they passed, save a jest or two over the prize the stranger had won.

CHAPTER LVI.

FOUND AT LAST.

LEFT alone together, a deep and painful sense of embarrassment took the place of that moment of ecstacy. They were each conscious of the mutual thrill with which they had met; but there existed in both their minds a barrier to its true interpretation. She was the first to draw back, and then for an instant he looked at her, no longer a blushing girl, but the sweet and yet noble woman her girlish grace had promised. The face he gazed upon was sad and quiet to coldness; and yet, but a moment since the lovely head had lain so willingly on his bosom that it seemed as if it might rest there for ever.

He was the first to speak. "You are alone?" he said, glancing round the little dovecot of a room.

"Quite alone," she answered, sadly, "at least here."

"I thought you were with your father," he replied, with an asking look.

In a few words she explained to him the aspect of affairs.

"You must not remain here," he said, when she had finished; "you must come with me. There is a lady at my hotel under whose protection I can place you."

"Your wife?"

"My wife!" he repeated, in amazement.

"Then the lady I saw you with was not your wife?"

"Certainly not. I am not married, nor likely to marry."

She was conscious of drawing a little closer to him, though she restrained the involuntary movement.

But he seized her hand. "Forgive me if I am wrong," he said, "if I am taking you at a disadvantage: I will never ask any woman to be my wife, except the one I have asked already. Something tells me that one day I may ask again with better success."

"You shall not ask again, if you think her still worth having," she answered, the sudden generous impulse of giving fully and freely conquering her womanly reserve, and she held out to him the other hand.

He drew her toward him eagerly, and was about to kiss her.

"Stay till you hear all," she cried. "You know that I was engaged to Captain Oglivie, and that I broke off the engagement?"

"There is no need to tell me anything, only that you love me now," broke in the impatient lover.

"Oh, listen," she pleaded, "you do not know that I fancied I loved him before any one knew that I had seen him. He is not so much to blame as he seems, for my heart had gone from him before I was able to break with him altogether. In spite of this, I tried to keep a foolish, fatal vow—a vow that seems to bind me still, though we are separated for ever."

He looked grave, and she went on to tell him of the scene in the fir-wood, still holding him gently back. When she had finished, he drew her to him unresistingly.

"Then you do not think me fickle—almost false?" she whispered, after a little interval; "you do not think my love for you will change?"

"You have never told me yet that you loved me," he said, somewhat archly. "Let me hear you say you do."

"I do, I do," she answered, earnestly.

Suddenly he remembered the letter with which he had been entrusted, and told her of it, adding, "Had we not better go? The streets are dangerous, but it seems that here we are not safe, and I think I can pilot you to a place of safety."

"But Henri," she said, "will return here, and I have something to ask him."

"Is that the little soldier?" he asked.

"Yes; he is a great friend of mine."

"I wonder what has become of him. When he has made an end of the two gendarmes, perhaps he will come and have a thrust at me," said David. "Your little friend appeared to be uncommonly thirsty. Seriously, is the boy safe, do you think?"

"He is quite safe," she answered; "as safe as a cat, out on the roof there."

"And the soldiers?"

"Not quite so safe there, I fancy, though safer than in the hands of those awful men;" and she shuddered as she thought of the invaders of her sanctum. "Henri saved the soldiers at the risk of his life, I suppose."

"It was to kill them he risked his life, I imagine," said David.

"Oh, no; he himself told me they were friends. People in this country fraternise more suddenly than with us. Come out here," she added. "Perhaps he will hear me if I call to him."

They went out into the sunshine, these two. It was strange, in that city of strife, what a peace had fallen on their hearts—the great peace and rest of love. Peggy called softly, but there was no response, and they stood still a little out there, to ask and answer the endless questions which occurred to each. They were trivial for the most part, for it is the privilege of love to exalt the trivial and transfigure the common things of life. David Haldane tried to keep back for a little the tragic incident which had taken place at the Forest House, and when it was no longer possible to do so, he softened it as much as he was able. Truly, their new-found joy was shadowed by a sad and awful background.

Just as they were about to depart, Henri's face appeared over the high range of chimneys. If Peggy's eyes had not been turned in that direction she would not have seen him, for he rose and disappeared as deftly and silently as the cat to which she had compared him.

"It is all right, Henri," she exclaimed; "they are gone, and this is a friend."

Henri had evidently heard her assurance, for he looked up again over the barrier.

"I thought monsieur had led the pursuit," he said, a little doubtfully.

"Not I," replied David Haldane. "A lady from an opposite window pointed out the door through which you had passed, and the sovereign people demanded admittance in a way that was not to be denied."

"Have you got them safe?" Peggy asked.

"Quite safe," he answered, "but hungry, dreadfully hungry. Have you anything you can give us to eat?"

She was obliged to confess that she had nothing.

"They cannot go through the streets till they have changed their clothes," said the little fellow, thoughtfully. "The people would kill them, though the fighting is over now. I have been to the end of the houses out here, and I can see the people embracing one another, but there is not a red coat to be seen."

"If you will wait till I take this lady to a place of safety," said David Haldane, "I will send you everything you require."

Thus it was settled, and Henri was to remain up there till the soldiers could come forth with safety.

Then Peggy asked her question. It was, whether the lad knew anything of her father. It had struck her that, in his strange curiosity about every one, he might have made himself familiar with her father's haunts—might know more about him, indeed, than she did herself. And she was right in her conjecture. Henri knew where he was to be found if yet alive, and promised to set out in search of him as soon as he should be released from taking charge of the safety of his new friends. As Peggy surmised, they had fraternised in the moment of victory, and the clever lad had saved them by his sham pursuit.

They re-entered the room, and Peggy prepared to go with her lover. "I cannot well stay here," she said, pointing to the demolished door; "and yet I am sorry to lose a chance of finding my poor father. He might come here." There was still a painful explanation to be made on her part. It was necessary for her to confide to David Haldane her father's desperate circumstances, and leave him to judge if it was possible for her to forsake him then. Would he try as well as trust her? leave her to do her duty, and wait for her? It was with a wistful, deprecating look that she told him, in as few words as possible, of her father's weakness and need.

"I will go with you till he is found," she said. "I shall be glad to see and be near a countrywoman again."

"And do you think I am going to lose sight of you again?" he said, tenderly. "You do not know what a hunt I have had for you. And do you know that I have bought a picture of yours?" he added; "I knew the old place in a moment."

"Oh, I am so glad you have got that," she said; "and I shall be glad of the money too, for I am desperately poor." She tried to smile over it, but failed. It had been quite too serious for that.

Meantime they had got into the streets. It was as Henri had said: the three days' fighting was over, and men who had never seen each other before, were embracing and kissing in an intoxication of joy.

They reached the hotel in safety, and a few words of explanation from David Haldane sufficed to interest the kind-hearted Miss Minto in her new charge. What these words had been, the latter could gather from the elder lady's manner toward her. She evidently regarded her in the light of David Haldane's future wife, and her gentle freedom of manner was tempered by respectful tenderness.

"I like you, my dear," said the sweet old gentleman, when she had carried her off to her room to arrange her dress; "and as for him, he is a man to be proud of."

Yes, he was certainly a man to be proud of—a man whom women instinctively trusted, and men instinctively honoured.

Then there was Margery's letter, which seemed to solve every difficulty. All that remained was to find her father, and the poor stepmother, too, and make everybody happy after their own fashion. This was her first thought—a return to the old childish vision of universal good; but her second thought was deeper and sadder. She knew now that life was not so simple a matter; that the good, which was to be universal, was not to be so easily attained; the taint of selfishness and sin was not so easily purged away; and while these remained, the inheritance of happiness was not to be won—never would be wholly won on the earthly side.

With Miss Minto and her niece, Margaret Oglivie

—the childish pet name had fallen away from her, for David had called her Margaret—was in her element. In the younger lady she found a friend and companion, in the elder a mother, one who loved youth and rejoiced in its joys, and so shared them. In Grace Minto these last days had wrought a great and happy change. She had found that there was no comfort like comforting others; no relief from pain so great as that which came from relieving others. Her aunt found the task of consolation and care suddenly taken out of her hands. The only danger seemed to be that Grace would overtask her physical strength, which had been deeply shaken, though not undermined, by her sorrow. This would be in a measure obviated by the necessity for returning home, and finding there objects on which to expend her awakened energy of beneficence. It was resolved that, if all went well, the whole party should return to England together, waiting, however, a sufficient time to allow the disappearance of Louis Oglivie to be satisfactorily accounted for. That very evening David Haldane, assisted by Henri, began an active search for the missing pair.

SOLDIER JOHNNY.

PART II.

HE rickyard was evidently doomed. Higher and higher, wider and wider, leaped the growing flames, and seemed to laugh at the miserable efforts of the rickety little parish fire-engine. The whole population of the village came trooping up to the spot, and their yells of surprise and excitement, with the snapping and roaring of the flames, made a hubbub which had not been heard in that neighbourhood for many a day.

Farmer Maynard groaned in his despair. "It is all over with it," said he, "and nearly over with me. What shall I do? These crops, on which I have so long depended to pay my rent and clear the better part of my debts, all gone in an hour. I can scarcely believe it—it is too like a terrible dream!"

So saying, he drew back a little way from the scene, and, leaning against the trunk of a tree, the leaves of which were scorched and seared with the heat of the flames, he contented himself (if such a word as content could be applied to his frame of mind) with watching the progress of the fire, and the last efforts of the men. He noticed how particularly energetic was the conduct of his former servant, Slade, who was throwing bucketful upon bucketful of water on one of the ricks, and whose voice was frequently heard directing the rest of the men. But the farmer said to himself, "Ah, I am not going to be deceived in that way. It's only a feint of his, to throw me off the scent; but he will very soon discover his mistake."

So he quietly waited until the fire had spent itself, and the crowd was beginning to disperse. Some of the people were gathering round Slade, and giving him great words of praise for his zeal and activity, when the farmer stepped up to the centre of the circle, and taking Slade by the collar, called out to the constable, "I give this man in charge for setting fire to my ricks."

The constable was so astonished at this, that it gave time to the indignant Slade to make a struggle for his liberty; but the farmer kept a firm hold on him until the constable took him into custody.

"It is false, I tell you," exclaimed Slade. "I was passing by, on my way to the next town in search of work, when I accidentally noticed the smoke, and immediately turned back to give the alarm."

"That is a very fine story, indeed," retorted the farmer. "I saw the smoke myself long before you gave the alarm; and I also saw you slowly slinking away from the yard after you had done the mischief."

Poor Slade winced at this, and he could not make a positive reply to the accusation; but he said, "You cannot say that you saw me set fire to the ricks."

"That, indeed, I cannot," replied the farmer; "but it seems that even you do not dare to say right out that you did not do so."

"Yes, I do dare. I did not set fire to the ricks."

"Ah, well, that goes for nothing. Of course you would say so, in the hope of getting out of it. But no such luck for you, I can tell you."

"Besides," put in the constable, with a knowing wink, "if you was sich a innocent little chap as you wants to make out, why did you make sich a desperate struggle to escape as you did just now?"

"Ay, that's it," echoed the crowd.

So poor Slade found that all his arguments were of no use, and that circumstances were dead set against him. Oh, why did he not pass by a few moments earlier, and thus have discovered the actual perpetrator of the mischief? But he felt it was a punishment upon him for nourishing revengeful feelings against his former master. And off he was marched to the house of the magistrate.

And now the poor farmer had a second trouble to endure: Johnny had disappeared, no one had seen him for two or three hours.

"Perhaps he saw the fire, and was frightened," suggested Betty. "He's sure to be somewhere on the farm."

"Let him be, then," said Farmer Maynard. "He will be sure to find his way home—trust him for that."

But the smoke died out of the ashes that remained from the burnt ricks, the sun went down in the west, and the moon peeped up from the east, and yet no Johnny appeared. Here was a new sensation for the villagers. Farmer Maynard now began to be alarmed, and called out his weary servants to look for the wanderer. Lighting their lanterns, they scattered themselves over the farm, shouting, "Johnny, Johnny!" but no answer came. The news spread through the already excited village, and every hole and corner was ransacked—to no purpose.

The distracted father dismissed his men, and the villagers went home to bed; but all night the farmer wandered about the fields and lanes, with his lantern in his hand, searching for the missing one, and calling out his name. By degrees, a dreadful suspicion grew upon him: had Slade anything to do with it? What if Johnny had caught Slade in the act of setting the rickyard on fire? It was very likely. Johnny had last been seen going in that direction, a little while before the fire had broken out. The rest now seemed terribly evident. Johnny had witnessed the crime, and Slade, in a frantic effort to escape discovery, had made away with the boy, and become a—murderer!

The next morning Farmer Maynard was found lying on the doorstep of his house, insensible, and white as death. In a few minutes he recovered from his faint, and was removed to his bed; but he was soon raving in the delirium of fever against Slade as the murderer of his son; all of which Betty and the doctor heard and thought upon; and that day a second and graver charge was laid against the unfortunate labourer.

And now it is time for us to see what has become of Johnny.

We have said that Johnny, as soon as he saw the mischief he had done, ran away. Fortunately, or unfortunately, as the case may be, he escaped the notice of poor Slade, who was passing along on the other side of the rickyard. Fear gave him speed, and he tore away with the swiftness of a hare, until he got out of sight of the farmyard; going down an unfrequented road, and in a direction in which he had never been before. Once only he paused, and then for sheer want of breath. He had gone about a mile, and thought he could trust himself to rest on the stile he had just reached. The very picture of misery looked the panic-stricken, panting boy, as he gazed back, his eyes and ears on the alert for sight or sound of the pursuers he so much dreaded. As he sat there to gain breath, he had time to think upon what he had done, and upon what he must do. Would the rickyard be burned down, or would some one have seen it in time to save it? How foolish it was of him not to have run to tell his father of the mishap, for then perhaps it would be got over quickly and quietly. And where was he going? He did not know. None of his father's relatives, or friends that he knew of lived in this direction, unless it was many miles away—nearly up to London. (Johnny, you must know, being only ten years old, had very vague ideas on such matters as these.) Perhaps he would be lost in the woods, or on the wilds, and die of starvation, like the poor babes he had read about in the picture-book, and be covered over with leaves by the robins. Or perhaps a terrible policeman, such as had once appeared at the village fair, clad in blue cloth with large white buttons, would seize him and take him to that horrible place for homeless people, the workhouse, where his only food would be water and dry bread. Many a like dreadful fate did he picture to himself, until he trembled with apprehension, and the tears trickled down his cheeks.

He now thought of turning back, and begging his father's pardon. Was a rickyard worth very much money? He was afraid so; he had heard his father speak of it so ardently and hopefully, as the means for paying his debts. Well, he would go home again, and suppose if, after all, the rickyard had been saved?

Just then, a strange glare of light shot up into the sky, and in it the poor boy seemed to read his doom. It was all on fire! He was too frightened to return now. He had once heard that people who set fire to anything, were sent to prison for life, and even hung. Again he was panic-stricken, and sped on for his very life.

Now all this running and resting, speedy though it was, had taken some little time from an afternoon, which had already begun gradually to merge into evening, and it was now growing decidedly dusky. Johnny now found himself on the threshold of a vast-looking wood, which looked very dark and frowning within. Still, he would not stop, but hurried on, stumbling over old fallen branches, and scrambling through thickets of thorns, which scratched his face and hands till they bled. The darkness grew thicker and thicker, and at length, when Johnny had gained the other end of the wood, he found himself abroad in the starless night, foot-sore and bleeding, not knowing which way to turn for shelter, unless he made towards the one little glimmering light which shone from a distant window. Thither he resolved to go, and crawled painfully along the stony path which led towards the spot.

It was a farmhouse, and very much like his own home. So it was with some return of confidence that he opened the gate, and was going up to the door, when after him rushed a monstrous-looking bull-dog, which barked and snarled so savagely, that the startled boy fled to the high railings at the side of the yard, determining to put them between him and his assailant. Johnny was a very good climber, but fear took away his discretion: he slipped off the top rail, and, with a cry, fell to the ground stunned.

When he awoke, he found an old man bending over him, with a lantern in one hand and a horsewhip in the other. The sight of the whip brought back the boy's recollection, and he cried out—

"Oh! please, sir, don't whip me! I didn't mean to do it!"

"Heyday, little chap," said the old farmer, "didn't mean to do what? You've not been after my apples, have ye, boy?"

"Oh, no—no, sir!" cried Johnny, as he slowly raised himself from the ground. "I've come a long, long way; and please don't ask me about it any more, because I'm afraid to tell."

"What ha' ye bin a-doing then, ye little scamp?" questioned the old man, shaking the little intruder by the arm.

"Oh! oh! don't!" screamed Johnny; "my arm hurts me so;" and he sank again to the ground in a faint.

He had broken his arm in the fall. When the farmer (he was a kind-hearted old fellow) discovered this, he took the little truant in his arms, and bore him into the house, shouting—

"Here, Polly, quick! this poor little bairn has gone astray and broken his arm. Put him into the little cot, and I will go for the doctor."

The doctor soon arrived, and oh! the pain of setting the bone. Poor Johnny was quite broken down, and sobbed until he went to sleep.

But the farmer and his dame, good souls, did not go to sleep so easily. This mysterious advent quite upset them, and they had scarcely the patience to wait till the morning, to satisfy their curiosity.

When the morning came, Johnny looked pale and weak, but very placid. His grief and anxiety seemed to have worn themselves out, and all he could think of now was, his weak arm—he did not know it was broken—and the prospect of a nice warm breakfast of bread and milk, which the dairy-maid, who rose earlier than the old couple, said she would give him almost directly. When, therefore, the farmer's wife questioned him about his strange adventure, he answered readily, and told her everything, although much of his old terror returned, as he realised his strange position.

"Pray don't take me back again!" said he, with tears in his eyes.

Can this be our blustering young Captain John?

"Now, don't cry, my little man," said the old dame, soothingly, and trying to conceal the astonishment she had felt at Johnny's wonderful story.

"You have done very wrong, and ought to be sorry for your misconduct; but you must control your feelings, or your arm will not get better."

So they kept him two or three days, the farmer having gone to Mr. Maynard, whom he found as we have related, to explain the cause of his son's absence. Johnny quickly recovered, for his nurse, the farmer's good dame, was as attentive to him as a mother could be—so Johnny thought, and he was about right; but he, poor boy, had never known the tender care of a mother.

And now I must take the reader back to the old scene. The village is suffering from its third excitement. News of Johnny has arrived; the whole truth is out, and the innocent prisoner is released. Farmer Maynard still lies on his bed, but he is again conscious, and is anxiously awaiting the return of his repentant little son. He has lost much, and suffered still more, but he will not upbraid the cause of his misfortunes; his only words of greeting will be words of affection and forgiveness.

A small crowd is now waiting at the gate, and foremost may be seen portions of the disbanded regiment of the Queen's Own Cocktails. Presently a light cart draws up at the gate, and a kind-looking old man, with a pale-faced little boy in his arms, alights and enters the house. I will not describe to you the meeting between father and son; but had you witnessed it, I am sure the tears would have come to your eyes, as they did to poor, faithful Betty's.

And so Johnny has returned home, having learned—and, we trust, profited by—his first sharp lesson. He will have other lessons to learn, though; not so severe, perhaps, but more lasting. The consequences of this one thoughtless and disobedient act may cling to him all his life long.

There, my boy, I have at last got to the end of my story. I do not care how hastily you may throw it aside, or forget the mere incidents I have related, so that you remember its simple teachings, and bear in mind the old proverb, "You cannot play with fire, and not be burned."

THREE CHAPTERS IN A PAINTER'S LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

"HE called my hair a golden glory," thought Marion Riddley, as, after the last fête of the season, she sat before her toilet-table; and as the remembrance of the words, or, perhaps, still more, the look that had accompanied them, recurred to her, she lifted a long tress of her beautiful hair, and letting it droop over the back of her hand, sat gazing at it until it danced through the tears that rose for very happiness.

Next afternoon, Marion and Walter Chesney met in the park, and while Mr. Riddley was talking to a friend, Marion found an opportunity to say—

"We are leaving town to-morrow, Mr. Chesney." She was on horseback, he on foot, so that as Marion spoke in a low tone, and leant a little forward, she looked almost directly into Walter's eyes; only for an instant, however. Something she saw there made her eyelids droop, and the blood rush to her face. Then wishing to hide her agitation, she hurriedly explained, "We are going to pay some visits first, and then on to Scarborough."

"And I am off to Germany; poverty is sometimes a hard taskmaster, Miss Riddley."

"Oh! don't say that; you know that

"Many things impossible to thought Have been by need to full perfection brought;"

and Marion's sweet face grew shyly earnest as she spoke.

"Come, May," cried her father, "we must toddle on; I've an appointment at six."

"Good-bye, then, Mr. Chesney," whispered Marion; "and don't lose heart."

Walter held the little gloved hand very closely in his as he said, "Good-bye, and au revoir. I shall think nothing impossible now."

Mr. Chesney walked straight home to his lodgings, where he dashed off the outline of a picture, to be called "The Painter's Dream," and to which he subjoined the quotation spoken by Marion Riddley. He sat at it for an hour or two, until, satisfied with the creation and story, he laid it aside, and began a note, in which he wrote—

DEAR MISS RIDDLEY,—My prospects in life depend materially upon the success I may be enabled to make at the Exhibition of the Royal Academy next spring. I have chosen a subject. May I ask, as the greatest favour and kindness, that you will let me have a small piece of the beautiful hair God has given you, that I may endeavour—alas! I fear but feebly—to imitate its golden glory, wherewith to clothe the spirit of my picture?—Faithfully yours, WALTER CHESNEY.

Having sealed his letter, Walter walked to Davenport Street, where he left it, and a card, in charge of a footman, who, having that morning received his dismissal, revenged himself by putting both in the fire.

Walter waited anxiously, day by day, for an answer, and none coming, he concluded that his request had offended Marion, or that she, like many another of her sex, had only been amusing herself with his admiration, and now intended him to feel that their intimacy was over. Young love does not stop to reason. Walter's pride took fire, and before a month was over he had reached Dresden, and was working down his misery and disappointment, determined to achieve the success he had told her of, and prove that he at least did not intend to lose the world for love.

Autumn passed; November found him back in London, busy with his great picture. The Riddleys were not in town; Walter passed their house very often in his walks, and each time saw the long, dismal-looking blinds hanging limp behind the dirty window panes.

CHAPTER II.

THERE are many streets in East London which the light and air of heaven seem to shun; and to the garret storey of one of the most dilapidated dwellings therein, I must take my reader. The room was low, almost dark, the faintest amount of winter twilight only stealing through the small skylight. The walls were black, or green, from damp, the plaster peeled off, and in many places the tiled roof lay bare, allowing plenty of ventilation. Beside a grate, where, on a handful of cinders stood a broken tin teapot, a human figure was crouching, but whether male or female you could not be certain, until a long deep sigh, as of one drawing breath after a paroxysm of pain, caused the head to turn, and the heavy dark beard became visible.

"Are ye better, darlin'?" he said. "Sure the cinders are contrairy this day—bad luck to them! Ye'll never be able to ait the broth, av it does come broth, which I'm not hopeful of."

As he spoke the teapot tilted, and the contents were emptied upon the ashes, sending up a cloud of white dust.

"Och! dear, dear! the broth is lost!" and the man burst into tears. "Nelly, machree, it's gone, every drop av it."

There was a movement in the corner of the room, and a young woman, gliding up, threw her arms round his neck. "Dinna greet, pet," she said; "the Lord's aye mindfu' of his ain. He'll never let us starve till we've done our work; and when he let's death come we may lie down in peace and thankfulness."

"Ay, thankful!—you say rightly, Nelly; it's been a bitter life to drag the likes of you down to."

His wife laid her cheek against his. "I'm thankful, indeed, Denis dear, for the Lord's mercy in letting me know how far above riches and the world's goods true love can make a bodie. Na, na, pet, keep up heart. Ye mind what ye've often told me, that 'it's always darkest the hour before day.'"

"What a comforter ye are, darlin'! Sure the Lord must want ye in heaven. Where are ye going, machree?" he added, hastily, seeing Nelly putting her shawl over her head.

"To follow the Lord's guiding. Lie doon and get a sleep, Denis. I'll wake you when I get back, and the time will no' seem sae heavy if ye can dream."

So Nelly went out, along the slushy, dripping streets, down which came an east wind that pierced through the poor thing's scanty clothing, making her hurry on, until, breathless, and half stupid with cold, she stopped in front of a hair-dresser's shop.

The window was brilliantly lighted, and two resplendent wax figure-heads displayed the triumph of the owner's art, while rows of plaits, curls, and false hair, of all colours and designs, told their own tale of woman's vanity. Nelly only stood long enough to recover her breath, and read a card, which at night, and at night only, lay in a prominent position in the window; then, pushing open the swing door, she went up to the counter, behind which sat a shopman making a wig. He looked up as Nelly came in. "Well, what do you want?"

"You buy hair, sir—a bodie's ain hair?"

"Yes; do you want to sell any?"

"If you please, sir."

"Take it down."

Nelly obeyed, and unfastening, shook out the coil, which rolled down in a heavy golden shower below her waist. The man turned the gas higher, and looked at the hair with greedy eyes.

"How much do you want for it?" he asked.

"I dinna ken, sir; the Lord jist sent me."

"The Lord!—Lord who?"

"The Lord o' heaven, sir."

"Oh!" and a smile passed over the speaker's face, as he thought, "The woman is an imbecile; I'll get a bargain here." Then speaking aloud, he said, carelessly, "Didn't he put a price upon it when he sent you?"

Nelly stared, a faint flush came up into her face. "Oh, man!" she gasped, "dinna make game o' me. I hae a husband deeing wi' fever, and no' a bawbee to buy bite or sup!" and a sob choked her voice.

"Well, well, don't excite yourself. I'll give you five shillings for it."

"And I will give her five guineas," said another voice; and Walter Chesney, who had been watching the scene from the doorway, came into the shop. Pushing back her hair, Nelly gazed at him with wild, incredulous eyes.

The shopman coughed, and winking at Walter, said, "I suppose she'll say the Lord sent you too."

"Hold your tongue, sir!" was the stern answer; "you need not add blasphemy to robbery. Here, poor thing, fasten up your beautiful hair. I am a painter, and I shall be very glad to give you all I said, and much more too, if you will sit to me for a picture I am doing. You said your husband was ill," he went on, when they were in the street; "will you take me to see him? I am half a doctor, and might be of use."

"It is sic a pair place, sir; jist a garret."

"Never mind that, I have often been in a garret before; and, after all, it's better than the open street in such weather. Have you been long so poor?"

"For a year, sir. Denis lost his place through the fault of anither man, and then he fell ill wi' fever, and the bairn died, and what wi' trouble and work, I got ill, and——"

"Oh," said Walter, interrupting her, "that's enough to bring you to a garret. Well, we won't talk of it any more at present. Tell me what part of Scotland you come from?"

"Perth, sir; Killin is my hame. I was in service in Stirling whan I married Denis, and he was an officer's servant."

"I come from Perthshire myself," said Walter, "so you see you were right when you said the Lord sent you out to-night, for he has put it in my power to help you, and also to help myself. I have been trying to get a model to please me for a long time, and so you see it is a mutual obligation."

"Deed, then," began Nelly, but the sobs came, and she said no more, though from her heart went up a silent thanksgiving to the Lord, whose doing this was.

Walter did not leave poor Denis in the garret; he took him to the nearest hospital, where, fortunately, some of the doctors were private friends of his, and ready, as they always are, to do a good or kind action. Nelly he took to his lodgings, placing her under the care of the old woman who acted as housekeeper.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE PERFECTION OF SCRIPTURE.

"The law of the Lord is perfect."

PERFECTION! It is a high claim and one which men do not readily admit, since they find it difficult—nay, impossible—to judge of. A very strange reflection this is, that men refuse to acknowledge a claim because they have not the means of substantiating it. Does, not justice dictate the other course—of admitting the claim when we fail to find evidence to invalidate it? No. In this case it would, to say the least, be a dangerous precedent to allow every claim to perfection because we cannot dis-prove it. There are a thousand claims thrust under our notice every day, which we cannot disprove, but which it would be manifest folly to admit on that account. Moreover, the very nature of the case in question prevents man from being a fit arbiter in judging of perfection, since the Book which makes the claim of perfection thrusts man down from the office of judge, by declaring man's imperfection. Are we, then, brought to the conclusion that we must admit because we cannot disprove? No; for on this principle we must accede to the claims of the preposterous frauds and impostures which come to us in the garb of religion, if they claim perfection. All the miserable burlesques of creeds would come trooping round us, demanding our faith, but denying our right as men to judge of their perfection.

Is it, then, true that a religion is presented to us—a revelation purporting to teach us truths unknown to mortal ken—to unfold to us Divine mercies unreachd by the most extravagant flights of human hope—and yet we are without any means of determining whether the religion so presented to us is genuine and authentic? No; this is not true. There is, I believe, a safe mode of testing, and one which Scripture itself invites— which He who is the life and light of Scripture propounds—“By their fruits ye shall know them.” The truth is that, when we hear of the claim Scripture lays to perfection, we alter—almost instinctively—our ordinary modes of thought, and prepare to apply a test alike inadequate and unfair. There dawns upon our minds a lofty vision of perfection. We expect to find boundlessness in the range of subjects treated of, and exhaustiveness in their mode of treatment. It is an illusive expectation. God, in mercy to the limit of our faculties and the shortness of our lives, has not burdened our minds and our earth (which “could not contain the books which should be written”) with boundlessness and exhaustiveness. The indulgence of this expectation is an alteration of our ordinary modes of thought. Perfection does not, in daily parlance, convey to our minds these vast, these oppressive notions of boundlessness and exhaustiveness; it rather conveys to our minds completeness of design—or, to take one word which seems to embrace all that we need—adaptation to the end in view.

To take a familiar case or two. I look at the human eye. I find that it is an organ of very delicate construction, arranged in such a way that all the points of an object outside it are conveyed, with almost faultless accuracy, by a wonderful series of lenses and humours, to a network of very fine nerves, which carry the impression to the brain. I notice that the aperture through which light enters the eye is capable of contraction and extension; so much so, that whereas the diameter of the pupil at one time measures only one-tenth of an inch, at another time its measure increases to one-quarter of an inch. I see from this that the eye is constructed with the view of meeting lights of varying intensity. But I know that, notwithstanding this power of regulating the quantity of light to be admitted, there may result, from the refractions of the light within the eye, scattered rays, which might interfere with the clearness of vision, by producing a blurred image. Yet there is no danger of this taking place in a healthy eye, for I discover that the retina (or network of fine nerves spoken of) is embedded in a black substance, which absorbs all the scattered rays, and prevents any marring of the image. The result of this investigation and these discoveries (and many more, for the wonders of the eye are numerous) leads me to exclaim, “The eye is perfect.”

Now on what have I grounded this opinion? On the discovery that the eye is eminently—nay, exactly—fitted to the purpose for which it was designed; or, in other words, I have considered its adaptation to the object of its creation, and on that I have formed my conclusion that it is perfect. But suppose a merry fellow should object to my conclusion, and say, “Nay, good sir; the eye is a wonderful organ, but not perfect, for I see that the vibrations caused by my speech will not penetrate the sclerotica, nor reach the brain by pulsations through the aqueous and vitreous humours.” I should scarcely be inclined to answer such a captious questioner, that the eye was only made for sight, and not for hearing; for I should regard the objection as indicating folly or perversity. Yet the objections made to the perfection of Scripture are, many of them, not more wise than this, and often more perverse. Men will not retain in their mind the fact that a limited range of subjects, and limited information on some of the topics revealed, is not inconsistent with the claim to perfection; and this, too, in the face of the Scripture declaration which confesses to a limitation. “We know in part,” says the apostle. There is a limit put to our knowledge. Though God has revealed to us eternal life, there are things God has not revealed. Our knowledge is not boundless; and even on those topics which we preach to men we are limited—there are bounds we cannot pass. Even in the subjects which God has revealed, our information is not exhaustive; for not only do we know in part, but we prophesy in part.

Still, however, the claim is advanced—“The law of the Lord is perfect;” and its perfection is to be measured by its adaptation to that end for which it was given. We are to study its design, and consider how it fulfils that design; or we are to apply the test of our Lord himself: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Our inquiry now is, What is the object which Scripture is designed to produce? We have not far to look for an answer to this question. The psalm which advances the claim to perfection, tells us the design of God's Word: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul."

I do not suppose that any one will quarrel with the object here proposed, or that any will be hardy enough to assert that the object is uncalled for, as men do not stand in need of conversion; but though I do not anticipate this, it will aid our reflections a little, if we consider that the history of the world proves incontestably that men believe that there is a fatal propensity towards evil among them, which ought to be overcome. For, first, we have laws to protect the peaceable citizens from the idle and insubordinate. We have all sorts of punishments, arranged on a graduated system, suited to the various transgressions of the laws of which men may be guilty. Then, as we all admit that prevention is better than cure, we have bars to our shutters, and locks and bolts to our hall-doors; and, on the same principle, we have reformatories, and penitentiaries, and refuges, and other institutions, by means of which we hope to check, if not to eradicate, the evil. But when we have done all this, we find that there are some kinds of ill-conduct which we cannot touch by any of these means. Our notions of liberty are so sensitive that we cannot punish men for misbehaviour which all honest people heartily condemn; and for such we have another kind of penalty, and it is a very severe one. The law cannot touch, but society can frown; and the transgressor finds the laws of society more numerous and more relentless than the established laws of the land. Now all these laws, and institutions, and customs show that the world acknowledges that men stand in need of conversion.

But we may well ask how the means which men have adopted for the conversion of mankind from their evil propensities, have succeeded? There have been two plans tried by men for this object. There is the plan we have spoken of—viz., the institution of laws and customs, and this we may call the repressive system; the other plan is the way of reasoning, or the argumentative system. This has been tried of old: "Show man that the way of virtue is the way of happiness, and that the way of vice is the way of misery. Convince him that the restraint of his passions will be a joy far greater than their indulgence. Prove this, and leave common sense to work out the result." But common sense could not; the seeds of the disease were not so much in the disordered brain as in the corrupt heart, and this, argument could never cure. In some few natures the reasoning might produce an effect, but these were very few, and the effect was more formal than real, more moral than spiritual; and the repressive system confessedly only reached the outward conduct; it never dived into men's hearts, and confronted their motives, and wrought a cure there.

So in the highest sense these human systems fail in effecting the conversion of the soul. But does Scripture accomplish this? Yes; for this cause it was given and came into the world. You have only to compare the marked improvements in mere morals since the introduction of the Christian revelation, to see what a power has been at work, and how the great soul of civilised society has been transformed. You have only to observe that where the revelation of God is freest, and the teaching of it purest, there the infractions of established law and criminal convictions are fewest.

But we have greater works than these. The effect of the Word of God is to turn the sinner from darkness to light; and under its influence we see the licentious man becoming chaste, the intemperate sober, the dishonest upright, the lying truthful; and this not merely in a negative way, but in a way which reveals the existence of an active principle for good deep-rooted in the heart.

And the reason of this power is plain. The Bible speaks to man as he is. There is no affectation of a variable holiness, but a simple and decisive statement of man's fatal proneness to evil. The source is pointed out, and the salt is cast in at the fountain-head to heal the deadly waters; or, in other words, though the Scripture reasons with men, it reasons in love, and brings to men the most powerful motive as a substitute for the base motives which led them astray.

It is when we contemplate the effects which Scripture by God's power has accomplished, and the effects which it is calculated to accomplish, that we see wherein its perfection consists; even in being thoroughly adapted to bring the sinner back to the Father's home, whence he has strayed.

It must not be supposed that this is the only result which revelation is calculated or intended to produce. This is only one, but a chief one, of many. We may at a future time speak of these others; but this one serves well to illustrate in what particulars we should look for the perfection of Scripture.

CHANGE.

"One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever."—Eccles. i. 4.

MAN is changing—the earth is unchanging; yet the man of science tells us that even this solid globe is being slowly but steadily altered. When we would mention what is permanent, we speak of the "everlasting hills." If we would recall far-distant ages, it helps us if we remember that upon the same hills, with just the same shape and colour, the men of those ages gazed as we do.

And yet they are not quite the same. Rain and sun and storm are leaving their marks upon the scarred and seamed precipices. What the globe is at the present moment results from steady change carried on through ages. Strictly speaking, Nature is never at rest. Change and progress are the law of the universe.

Yet the above passage is practically true: the world "abideth for ever," if its age be compared with the sixty, seventy, or eighty years allotted to us. We wonder at the May-fly, which is born in the morning and dies in the afternoon. Yet why should we wonder? Its little life is brimful of happiness. It looks to no future; it dances out its little existence in the sunlight, and perhaps more happiness is crowded into its few hours of being than into the lives of creatures which live longer: and it does not startle us that a fly should live a fly's life. But how extraordinary—how difficult to reconcile with God's goodness, if to man, made for immortality, with thoughts and feelings reaching far beyond this lower world, were allotted only a life as brief as "the vapour, that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away!" We will not believe it. God will not leave us in the dust. His own promise and invitation is—"Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead (Isa. xxvi. 19)." Do we then put contempt on the present life? Far from it. It is bright with a light thrown back upon it from eternity. But shut out that light, and "how great is the darkness!" Look at man's gifts, and capacities, and longings; are they all to be crushed down into the horrible pit? must we not believe that man was made for immortality, and that his troubled and sin-stained life here is but the prelude to an endless, a glorious life, untroubled and unstained, under the eye of Him "who has overcome death and brought life and immortality to light?" Yet why should I depress my fellow-man, by telling him that he is a changing creature in an unchanging world, unless

I had something more to tell him? Who by taking thought can add a single moment to his life? very well; then if this world be all let us give up taking thought. Let us (so the Epicurean argues) try to make the best of it, to forget that it is short, to crowd into it as much pleasure as possible. This, let the sceptic say what he will, is an odious and degrading creed, "of the earth, earthy;" but the question is, does it not follow, by all rules of common sense, from a denial of man's immortality? Tell a man that he is to die like an animal, and why, he will ask, should he not live like an animal? Tell him of a noble life, purchased by Him "who has loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood," a life in that Presence which is fulness of joy, and you make him a new man, because you kindle in his heart a new hope.

"One generation passeth away, and another cometh." We find it hard to conceive this perfectly. We walk through the streets of London, and as we look into the faces of the thousands who meet us, we can to some extent feel that they are human beings like ourselves, "fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter." But they are not more human, not more capable of joy and grief, than the men who, hundreds upon hundreds of years ago, hurried through the streets of Corinth or of Rome. Yet they have all long since returned to dust; and perhaps in hundreds of years hence, men will think of London as we think of the cities of the past. It is difficult to get hold of the fact that the men of the past were not shadows, but men of flesh and blood, in whose hearts swept as strong gusts of feeling as in ours; who were as alive to every thrill of pleasure or of pain as ourselves; for whom life had as intense an interest, and death as deep a gloom.

So, again, let us look at the march of events in our own day. Seventy-nine years ago the greatest event in modern history, the French Revolution, began. Who himself remembers it now? It is a reminiscence only of those (how few they are now!) who at ninety years of age have their memories unimpaired. We spoke lately to a very old lady who remembers seeing her mother crying because Marie Antoinette was beheaded. We saw in France last year another, who, when a little girl, was condemned to die by the guillotine, and only was saved because of the fall of Robespierre. Now she sits day by day in her arm-chair by the window, waiting quietly for her call home. Yet when most of us were children, there were many who could freshly recollect the Revolution. In five years scarcely one will remain; in ten years not one.

Yes, and we are slow to remember that when we are called away, it will be "the present" to millions having life strong within them,—that the sun will shine as brightly, and the birds sing as cheerily, and the sea roll its waves as majestically to the shore,—and that in cities men will hurry as eagerly to their business, and that the chatter and noise of the world will be as loud as ever. Thank God, that beneath the changing lies the unchanging, and that when our earthly house of this tabernacle shall be dissolved, "removed as a shepherd's tent," we shall, through God's grace, have "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!"

There is no use in dwelling on our perishing life here, unless it lead us to seek that life which is "hid with Christ in God." One of the noblest poems in the English language is "An Elegy in a Country Churchyard." It is beautiful and touching, but it is only part of the truth—

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth ere gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."
